

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

NEW YORK CITY, January 30, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in order.

Mr. Lawson, you will please take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN R. LAWSON—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. What are the social conditions—the social life—of the miners in coal camps?

Mr. LAWSON. The social life of the miners in coal camps has been very little, Mr. Chairman, particularly in the closed camps, where the mine operators have what we may term absolutism, or have practiced it, and where despotism prevails, because of the fact that they own the—not only the mines, but all of the grounds, all of the buildings, and the places of recreation, as well as the schools and church buildings. I had not quite finished reading this matter that I was putting in the record last evening, about the accidents that occurred.

Chairman WALSH. Just finish where you left off last night.

Mr. LAWSON. I thought perhaps you might just as well get it in consecutively.

June 18: George Yohannovich, Montenegrin, miner; age, 35; married; 3 children; was killed by a fall of rock at the Royal mine, operated by the Royal Fuel Co., in Las Animas County.

November 17: Juan Vigil, Mexican; miner; age, 51; married; 9 children; was killed by a fall of rock at the Morley mine, operated by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., in Las Animas County.

November 27: John Garlic, Pole; miner; age, 36; married; 3 children; was injured by a premature shot at the Oakdale mine, operated by the Oakdale Coal Co., in Huerfano County; died at the Pueblo Hospital November 28.

December 16: Thirty-seven men were killed in a dust explosion at Vulcan mine, operated by the Coryell Mining Leasing Co., in Garfield County.

That makes a total of 81 men—a total of 81 children, rather, and 27 widows; 44 men. The question, Mr. Chairman, I want—or the point to which I want to draw the attention of the commission—is the number of widows and the number of fatherless children left because of those coal-mine disasters which have happened in our State; and I want to repeat that the fatalities in the State of Colorado are so much higher than any place else in the world—so much so that it shocks humanity.

As has been stated yesterday, we just take the deaths of the miners killed in the mines and the compensation paid to them, not including any of the injuries—they get a rate of $305.40 apiece. What are those poor widows; what are those fatherless children going to do with that $304 to start out in life? That is one of the things that I think ought to be considered; I think that is the human side that seems to get so little consideration from the operators of these great corporations.

I might go back just a little way and again draw your attention to the thing I mentioned yesterday when I said that a young man goes into a coal camp and seeks employment. Let us assume under all of the conditions I have recited that he gets employment, and he is compelled to remain there because he does not know where else to go. He has to keep his mouth shut against conditions, because if he does not do so he is going to be discharged. Let us assume that working under those bad and dangerous conditions that so many men have been compelled to work under—in fact, I have been compelled to work under them myself, and that is the reason I speak about them as I do; this young man works there, and let us assume that he has been injured, quite badly by the way. He is surrounded, not by his friends, not by people who have taken an interest in him, but he is in this land owned by the corporation that owns the homes, that owns the boarding houses, that owns every single thing there is there.

Then he is taken to the company doctor, a man not chosen by him or by his fellowmen, but a man selected by the company and paid out of the money checked off from his wages by that despicable check-off system we hear so much about. This man, because of his lack of experience, because of his lack of knowledge in the medical profession, experiments on this young man; then finally he finds that he is not able to do anything for him and he sends him to the company hospital in Pueblo, where the man dies.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this matter, that so far as the company hospital is concerned, it has a good reputation in Colorado, and I do not want to say anything that reflects on it, but I want to call the attention of the commission to the fact that it is a company hospital. Now, this young man dies there; and who sits at the inquest over the remains of his dead body? I say it is a company coroner, a man with a selection of men who are friends of the company, and the reason I say that is this: In all of the years, so far as my knowledge goes that coal has been mined in the State of Colorado, only two verdicts that I can recall have ever been rendered not in favor of the coal companies. So, I say again that it is a company coroner.

They have a habit, a rather stereotyped affair in giving their verdicts, to say this or these men—this man or these men have committed suicide or were killed by their own carelessness; and let me just repeat a note that was made on one case in Colorado, of a young man that was killed to illustrate my point, that without a union and without a union card in his pocket as his credential he has no friends. This coroner in his note said: "No relatives and damn few friends." That, Mr. Chairman, is the reason I say that it is a company affair, and I do not know exactly, but perhaps after all the company has something to do with the cemetery the man is buried in. If the county is not able to furnish schools, if the county is not able to furnish churches, I am not sure but the company also furnishes the cemetery the poor fellow is buried in after all. But it does not matter so much about the men to me, they are not so important to me as the men who have families, the men who have family ties and leave those behind them, who leave a number of fatherless children with nothing to face the world with. Those are the things which I believe should receive the deep and earnest consideration of this commission in making their report.

Men often face danger because of the fact that they have a feeling that the property of the company even deserves all the protection they can give. I recited yesterday, in a brief way, one of the incidents that happened in a mine that was the property of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in which I worked. I told how the mine took fire and the mine was filled with water, and in the meantime it exploded. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that after that water was pumped out of the mine I went back into the mine with a number of other men to help clean up the mine and put it in condition to work; and while we were working in the mine word came that something had gone wrong. A man came running into the entry in which we were working, running quite out of breath and very much excited, and the thing I can remember best was that he called to me. He called my name. Everybody stopped working to inquire what was wrong. He did not get close to us, but just close enough to call out his message, and he said, "Jack, go in and tell the men to come out; go inside and tell the men to come out; tell every one of them to come out." The men he had reference to were working about a mile farther back in this entry. We knew that the mine was filled full of marsh gas. We knew that the men were back in there and that there were miles of entries so filled with this explosive mixture; the most dangerous thing, excepting the dust, that can be found in a mine anywhere. We had been informed just the day before by the fire boss, who told us he felt it was his duty to tell us that the mine had begun to develop fire, and that there was danger of the fire and the gas coming together.

It was necessary to go in 1 mile farther than where we were working and notify the men and see to it that every man was notified. To see that every man was notified that there was danger, and that they must at once leave the mine. I want to say that in doing this I don't want to leave the impression that it was any great act of courage on my part—it was an act of duty that a coal miner has never yet failed, to my knowledge, in performing. Mr. Chairman. That is one of the things in a coal miner's life. They have never, to my knowledge, failed to do their duty, either in protecting life or limb or in assisting to preserve and protect the property of those they are working for. I mention that in passing, Mr. Chairman, just to illustrate what I said about the dangers to all of the people who toll in the mines.

Chairman WALSH. Going back to my first question, please, what has been the social life of miners in the camps and coal mines? I want you to as briefly as you can, but broadly, include all of that—that is, what their broad social life is, and so far as education and religion are concerned, and then what their social life is so far as having a good time is concerned—a little pleasure and amusement, and the like of that, if they have it.

Mr. LAWSON. The pleasure and amusement afforded men who work in the mines, particularly in the closed camps—I want to talk particularly about those, Mr. Chairman, because I think I can get at this more specifically and had mostly in what is commonly called and known as the company saloon in these camps. In these camps the men are not permitted even to meet in their fraternal orders; they are not permitted to have societies even of their choice, very often. They are watched over and guided over and spied on by company detectives and company gunmen marshals, and if they should get together in a manner that seems to be in the least, in the minds of the marshals, suspicious, or if they should talk about the matters with which they come in contact every day, or if they should discuss the grievances that they have, or if they should talk about the wrongs that exist and prevail in the camps, they know they are put out of the camp. They know they can not remain there and work. Even the company marshal has the power to drive them down the canyon, and he has done it many, many times.

As far as the church part is concerned, we have the testimony in the congressional hearing of Dr. Cook and Rev. Dr. McDonald. These testimonies speak for themselves. They demonstrate that there is no social life, so far as the church end of it is concerned. They say they don't interfere with it, but I say to you that they do interfere with it and with the preacher or the minister of the gospel who lives in one of those camps; he has got to do and say the things that the company boss and superintendent wants him to do and say. And the same thing prevails so far as the school-teachers are concerned. As far as my knowledge goes, there is very little, if any, effort on the part of the company to provide night schools and to educate men who work in and about the coal camps.

In that connection I want to simply state this: That to give an illustration between the nonunion camps, the closed camps, and the union camps, or where the organization operates.

In Colorado to-day, my colleagues and myself, with the assistance of President Friend, of the Colorado University, and a number of his professors, he has agreed to extend the extension work of the State university throughout the entire State of Colorado to give the miners an opportunity for a higher and better education. So they do not have an opportunity to have any social life to speak of. And they are compelled to go out of the camp probably on Saturdays or Sundays, if the mine is not working.

Chairman WALSH. What are the ordinary amusements? Do they have theaters or social gatherings of any kind or prize fights or anything?

Mr. LAWSON. They have an occasional dance. They have not theaters in their places of amusement that I can recall now. They have occasional dances, and once in a while there is a meeting, probably held by the church people. But so far as my knowledge goes I can not in my memory recall where they have any real place of amusement except in one place that has been mentioned to this commission. I happened to be in the camp when it was opened up first. Mr. Osgood, in Denver, drew your attention to the club they had formed in one of the C. F. I. camps when he was president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. I do not remember if he said where it was or not, but that was at Coal Basin. Coal Basin is located about 10,000 feet above sea level and far away from any other town. It is not a large camp. It was not a large camp and does not exist now. But they started the club there. And I want to say when that club started it started on what I thought and what appeared to me as being a good basis. But I want to say it did not run very long on that basis. It was not very long until the club was practically worthless so far as the purpose it was intended to serve was concerned. That is the only one, Mr. Chairman, and the only place I can now recall where there was anything gotten up, any place provided for social recreation for the men who work, I mean.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you during the strike of 1903 in the Colorado coal field?

Mr. LAWSON. I was in New Castle, Mr. Chairman, during that period. I might stop just a moment to draw your attention to one or two things that occurred in connection with that. In connection with that I would like to draw the attention of this commission to a statement made by Mr. Rockefeller, jr., before the congressional committee.

In 1903, as most of you know, there was a strike in the coal fields of Colorado. The men of the entire State struck. Just about that time the governor of Utah made the statement, if the press reports him correctly, something to this effect: That if the miners of his State should go on strike, every agitator and every man who went on strike would be driven out of the State. I think that statement was made either in the latter part of November or early part of December, and to show the significance that was attached apparently to that statement by some people, on the 17th day of December, 1903, the homes of five of the local leaders in New Castle, of which I happened to be one, were dynamited and blown up; and I want to say in connection with that, Mr. Chairman, that no one has ever been punished for the crime.

I want to state just as briefly as I can also in that connection—I don't know whether it has any connection or not, and I hope it has no connection—but I want to draw your attention to the fact that on the 6th day of April, 1914, Mr. Rockefeller made the statement that so far as his company was concerned they would not recognize the United Mine Workers of America; that they would rather lose all they had invested in the mines in Colorado, which meant in effect that it was a fight to a finish so far as they were concerned. On the 20th day of April, just two weeks to a day, Colorado had its Ludlow. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, I hope it had no connection, but I want to draw the attention of the commission to that. That is the point I want to make. I want to draw to the attention of this commission that men of such great power, these great captains of industry upon whose word hangs so much in the minds of especially the gunmen in the industry, that they should be extremely choice in their language and careful what kind of statements they make.

Chairman WALSH. You mentioned something about the use of scrip in the company's store. Has not that been discontinued by all the companies in Colorado—the use of scrip?

Mr. LAWSON. The use of scrip, Mr. Chairman, has been discontinued by most of the stores. I want to—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Is there a law in Colorado now forbidding the use of scrip?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And it is being observed, isn't it?

Mr. LAWSON. There was a law passed abolishing the use of scrip and truck system in 1899 placed on the statutes of our State—15 years ago. January 1, 1913, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. posted notices that scrip should be abolished from among their camps.

Chairman WALSH. Well, had it been partially abolished previous to that time, or wholly abolished?

Mr. LAWSON. It may have been partially abolished, Mr. Chairman; I am not sure. But it was being used quite extensively up to that time, and I want to say in connection with the scrip, lest the commission may not fully understand, that a man who went to work in any of those mines, notwithstanding the fact that they had a company store operated by one of their subsidiary companies, of course—but I can not see the difference—a man must take scrip from the mine before he could get anything out of the store, unless he had the cash. But should a man go to the mine clerk, where he had to go first and get the scrip which he may have coming to him—let us assume he had $20 worth of scrip coming—he went and drew the $20 worth and went to the store and spent $10 of that in groceries and merchandise and things of that kind that he might need. When he quit his job, if he quit then, he could not get that scrip cashed and get $10 from the company which issued it to him, but he had to take it to perhaps the saloon keeper or the storekeeper or somebody else and give it to them at a 10 per cent discount.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Lawson, you said something about "checkweighmen." Very briefly, I wish you would state what a checkweighman is. I am going to ask you some other questions about it, and I know it is a long subject, but please state briefly—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). I shall be brief, Mr. Chairman—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I do not mean your testimony generally, but on that.

Mr. LAWSON. A checkweighman is a man selected and employed by the miners and paid by the miners out of their wages to check the weights of their coal, with the company weighman, a man whose duty it is to go on the tippie outside of the mine and watch the cars as they go over the scales and see that the coal is properly credited to each man in accordance with the true weights.

Chairman WALSH. Now, is there not a law in the State of Colorado requiring or permitting employees, at their option, to select their own checkweighman?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir. In 1897 the checkweighman law was first adopted in Colorado. April 11, 1912, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. posted notices that the miners should have a checkweighman if they so desired. Now, I want to say in connection with that something just briefly, Mr. Chairman, something else. Some operators in testifying stated that the miners had a perfect right to have a checkweighman. If they wanted, they could have a checkweighman on any tippie. I happen to know that is not a true and correct statement. But there was one mine there pointed to in Colorado that had a checkweighman. That was the Starkville mine at Starkville, in Las Animas County, in the southern part of Colorado. That mine, when the strike came on—as I say, to show how much the checkweighman means to the men—when the strike came on that mine quit work and never was able to turn a wheel until the strike was settled, because every man went on strike there and remained on strike. The checkweighman without an organization to back him up is not strong enough to enforce the just demands of the men. He is of no value to the mine and the men realize that. They know it is not of any use to go and select a checkweighman in the manner that those men are being selected to-day in the State of Colorado to represent the miners of that State, for the simple reason that safe men will be selected and the operators will have a very large hand in the selection, to see that the coal is properly weighed from the operators' standpoint. That is the reason that the miners have no confidence in the statements that they can have checkweighmen without an organization.

Chairman WALSH. You stated that during the strike of 1903 your home was blown up. Just describe your home after the disaster.

Mr. LAWSON. Well, the entire side of the building, Mr. Chairman, was blown out or blown in, as the case may be. It happened most fortunately for my wife and baby, a little 3-year old daughter, at that time that we had moved what had originally been the bedroom away—or I might state Mrs. Lawson had. I did not have much to do with it. She insisted that we would not use what had originally been the bedroom, because it was too small for a bedroom, and we would use what had been the dining room. Now, the powder or explosives were put under the window of the bedroom, and had we been in that room I am satisfied I would not have been here to tell the story to you to-day and neither would my family be alive and as well as they are.

Chairman WALSH. Was your family in the house at the time?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; my family was in the house. In fact we were all in bed asleep when the first explosion took place, which my home was honored with, if I may use the term.

Chairman WALSH. What effort was made to apprehend the persons who had committed the crime?

Mr. LAWSON. There was not much of an effort, Mr. Chairman. At a mass meeting of the people of New Castle I was elected as a member of a committee to search out and see if we could locate the people who had committed the crime; and after quite some research—a detective also in the meantime had been employed—we gathered together enough evidence so that the district attorney, Mr. John C. Gentry by name, told me personally we had enough evidence at least to convict some of the men who were involved in the dynamiting. But they were not ever arrested, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Why not?

Mr. LAWSON. For the same reason that very, very few men, if any, have ever been arrested and tried, let alone convicted, who have committed any depredations against the miners who have been on strike in our State.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true, as published in the press, that you had an interview yesterday with Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr.?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would kindly state the substance of that interview.

Mr. LAWSON. Yesterday morning, I might state, Mr. Chairman, or rather to go back a little further, I was told several days ago that Mr. Rockefeller had sent an invitation for me to come to his office and meet him. I was unable to go, and yesterday I was informed on two occasions that Mr. Rockefeller desired to meet me, and he would remain in his office until 1 o'clock if I would go down and call on him. I believed it was a proper and right thing for me to do, to accept the invitation, and so Mr. Doyle and I went down to his office and met Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Mackenzie King there, and we had an informal meeting. I want to say it was a very pleasant, agreeable conversation. We discussed several things. We discussed the Colorado situation in a very informal way. I informed Mr. Rockefeller that I did not think very much of the plan outlined in Colorado to bring about an adjustment of the grievances, and suggested that in my opinion the best way would be for him to arrange with himself and some of his officials a meeting with our international president, for instance, or some of our international officers, Mr. Hayes or Mr. Green, and have a conference with them, and if that was held I believed that a plan could be evolved that would bring peace to the coal-mining industry of Colorado. Outside of that there was not much else said concerning the Colorado situation except he asked me about my experience in coal mines, and we talked about those in a most informal way. I want to say that the meeting was friendly. I went there and met him as one American citizen meeting another. I did not go there as an official of the organization. I went there as a citizen, and met him as a citizen. That is about the extent of our visit.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Were you present yesterday when Dr. Eliot was testifying?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; I heard most of Dr. Eliot's testimony, but not all. I could not catch all that he said, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me read to you this from his testimony, and let me ask you in how far you agree with Dr. Eliot on these points:

"Question. In answering questions submitted by some of my fellow commissioners you stated among other things that you regarded it as unethical and unwise to elect or to reelect officers of the organization"—

Meaning the unions—

"convicted of crime. Do you know of any instances where that has been done, where unions have elected or reelected officers who have been convicted of crime?"

"Answer. 'No' is rather a strong word. I only have such knowledge as one gathers from the publications of the moment. Those publications have given me the impression that in regard to the dynamiting convictions the unions reelected men who had been convicted.

"Question. You have reference to the case of John Ryan, president of the structural-iron workers?"

"Answer. That is one of them.

"Question. Do you regard that as a mistake on the part of organized labor?"

"Answer. I regard it as something worse than a mistake.

"Question. How would you describe it?"

"Answer. As a serious moral offense against the community as a whole.

"Question. I gather also from what you said that you regard the greatest enemies of organized labor to be within the ranks of organized labor, rather than without the ranks of organized labor; and I infer from that—and if my inference is in error I would be glad to have you correct it—that you regard a unionist an enemy to labor if he becomes a lawbreaker in the so-called interest of unions?"

"Answer. I do."

Now, how far, Mr. Lawson, do you agree with Dr. Eliot in his attitude?

Mr. LAWSON. Let me answer in this fashion, Mr. Weinstock, that question, because of my knowledge and experience and observation that great corporations and great combinations of capital nowadays can take any man or any woman and convict them of any crime. And until the time comes when the laboring man has the same standing in court that the millionaire has I do not agree with Dr. Eliot. However, I do not know anything about the merits of the case of the structural-iron workers. That is something I never studied carefully, and I want to make this statement: I have nothing in common—I have no interest and do not believe that a criminal of any kind ought to be fostered or encouraged. I do not care whether he is the humblest laborer or the greatest millionaire that ever put his foot in this country.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You believe that criminals ought to be punished whether they are within or without the ranks of labor?

Mr. LAWSON. I believe that all criminals ought to be punished; yes, sir. Society can not help but insist on their punishment.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is your attitude, Mr. Lawson, in the matter of the observance of law—what is the citizen's duty, as you understand it, in dealing with what he considers a bad law. Should he take it upon himself to violate it because he thinks it is a bad law, or should he use his influence in educating others to aid him in having the law changed?

Mr. LAWSON. I think, Mr. Chairman, in answer to this question, that every man owes it to society to live up to and obey every law; and if the law is not a good law, to use his influence to have it taken from the books or have it amended. In that connection I want to draw your attention to one or two things here so that I can make my point clear.

In Colorado in 1885, nearly 30 years ago now, a mining law was adopted and placed upon the statute books of our State. So far as I can remember myself, no attention was paid to it by the men who operated the mines of our State. In 1891, 23 years ago, a mine-guard or deputy-sheriff law was placed upon the statutes of our State, and so far as I have ever been able to observe this law was ignored by the operators. As I stated a moment ago—no; rather in 1889, 25 years ago, a law was placed upon our statutes which granted the miners of that State, or men or women in any other industry, the right to belong to a labor organization, church, political party, or society, if they chose. In 1897—17 years ago—an antioercion act was passed in our State, also in connection with the right to join a labor union. This, or these, laws have never been lived up to by the corporations of our State. As I said, the check-weighman law was passed in 1897—17 years ago—but only since April 11, 1912, has it been lived up to by the operators. The scrip system, in 1899—15 years ago—and the C. F. & I. posted notices January 1, 1913, that they would now live up to this law. The eight hour a day law adopted in 1899—15 years ago—and the C. F. & I. posted notices March 1, 1913. Of course, in connection with the eight hour a day law we can say several things. The law was first declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, who said that the people of the State or the legislature ought to submit an amendment to the people to have it voted on, and when they did the people of the State of Colorado voted in favor of the miners having an eight-hour day by a majority of about 48,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that was through the referendum?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes. Well, it was not through the referendum, because it was submitted to the people as an amendment to the constitution at that time. We did not have the referendum then. So the eight-hour day law has been in controversy ever since that time—15 years ago. Then we find that in 1911 the legislature adopted an eight-hour day law and the operators of our State, under the initiative and the referendum, submitted that law through petition back to the referendum of the people; and then they initiated a fake eight-hour law, and the people of the State, who were not able to understand or distinguish the difference but who were anxious that the miners should have an eight-hour day law in our State, voted and elected both—the original bill by something like 37,000 majority and what I term the fake eight-hour day law by something like 3,700 majority, with the result that the members of organized labor were compelled to go into the legislature and through that channel to the Supreme Court, who declared that the legislature could annul any initiated measure; and in that manner he was successful in getting through the present eight-hour day law, which, by the way, was the same that was submitted to the referendum and held up two years longer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it, then, that you have the initiative in Colorado, and the referendum and the recall?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir. If you will pardon me, I just want to make this one brief statement in connection with the eight hour a day law. We have here—on March 1, 1913, the C. F. & I. posted notices that they would accept the eight hour a day law and miners would work eight hours. Yes; we have those things.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, coming back to my question, your attitude is that the law should be observed whether it is a good law or a bad law; that if it is a bad law the remedy lies in educating the voters so that they will have the law changed or correct the law?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir. I want also to give you the names of two other laws, while we are at it, so as to get that all in completely.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am not interested particularly in the law. But I want to get at the principle and to find out what is your attitude that you take, which I take it is that you reflect the sentiment—your sentiment is the sentiment of your fellow unionists on that subject?

Mr. LAWSON. I think I reflect the sentiment of most of them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you know, doubtless, as the commission was made to know, one of the reasons offered by the operators in Colorado for refusing to deal with or recognize the United Mine Workers of America was the charge that they made against the United Mine Workers of America that they were lawbreakers?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; that is one of the charges they made.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, as proof of that—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just a minute, that they were what?

Mr. LAWSON. They were law violators.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The operators refused to deal with the United Mine Workers on the ground that they were lawbreakers?

Mr. LAWSON. I admit that was one of their charges.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And as one of the proofs that the United Mine Workers of America were lawbreakers this was offered in testimony at Denver. I am now reading from the Denver record of our hearings in Denver.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Page 2630.

Mr. LAWSON. I have that here [picking up bound volume].

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Not the congressional hearing.

Mr. LAWSON. Oh, your hearing in Denver?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; our hearing.

Mr. LAWSON. That is all right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They said, and I want to call your attention to a pamphlet issued by the coal-mine managers, series 1 under title "Facts Concerning the Struggle in Colorado for Industrial Freedom." On page 12 of that pamphlet the following appears:

DENVER, COLO., April 22, 1914.

Organize the men in your community in companies of volunteers to protect the workers of Colorado against the murder and cremation of men, women, and children by armed assassins in the employ of coal corporations serving under the guise of State militiamen.

Gather together for defensive purposes all arms and ammunition legally available. Send name of leader of your company and actual number of men enlisted at once, by wire, phone, or mail, to W. T. Hickey, secretary of the State federation of labor.

Hold all companies subject to order.

People having arms to spare for these defensive measures are requested to furnish same to local companies, and where no companies exist send them to the State federation of labor.

The State is furnishing us no protection, and we must protect ourselves, our wives, and children from these murderous assassins. We seek no quarrel with the State, and we expect to break no law; we intend to exercise our lawful right as citizens to defend our homes and our constitutional rights.

John R. Lawson, international board member, district 14, U. M. W. A., also president State federation of labor; John McLennan, president district 15, U. M. W. A.; E. L. Doyle, secretary-treasurer district 15, U. M. W. A.; John Ramsay, national organizer, U. M. W. A.; W. T. Hickey, secretary State federation of labor; E. R. Hoage; T. W. Taylor; Clarence Moorehouse; Ernest Mills, secretary-treasurer, W. F. of M.

It was pointed out that that was a call to arms in violation of the State law; that the miners were defying the State authorities; that they were acting as rebels; and that they were doing unlawful things in an unlawful way.

Now, doubtless, there is some answer to that?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am sure the commission will be glad to hear it.

Mr. LAWSON. In the first place I want to point out the thing I have always said, that the operators have used every subterfuge, have not failed to make statements that are not true concerning miners who were their former employees. And when they state that that is a violation of any law I want to deny the fact, and I want to ask the question, if you will permit it, Mr. Weinstock, to point out to me wherein that message is any violation of law of Colorado at all. I deny it is a violation of law in that message.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It seems to me, Mr. Lawson, if you put the question to me, any call to arms means war, and that there is only one power in the United States that has the right to declare war, and that is the Government itself. That is, if I organize men with arms to fight the State authorities, I am certainly not a law-abiding citizen. I am certainly a lawbreaker, in fact, I am a rebel.

Mr. LAWSON. Do you understand, Mr. Weinstock, in your statement in answer to my question that if you and I were neighbors—let us assume on a farm—and you called to me to come to your home and bring my gun, that your home was being invaded by outlaws, that your family was in danger of being exterminated, as well as yourself, would you be violating the law of the State?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think if I issued a call, circulated all over the State, and called on everybody to arms I would be violating the law of the State.

Mr. LAWSON. What would be the difference, asking one man and asking every man?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I can stand in front of a house or a building without violating anything, but if I bring a thousand men to stand in front of that house or building I am.

Mr. LAWSON. What offense?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am obstructing the sidewalk.

Mr. LAWSON. That is all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And interfering with the rights of the public.

Mr. LAWSON. I grant that. But that is all. I simply state, Mr. Weinstock, and I want to state as quietly and as positively as I know how, that there is nothing in that call, so-called call to arms, that is in violation of our State law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mrs. Harriman asks me to allow her to ask a question.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I want to know the date when the miners were armed, the strikers were armed—September 13, was it?

Mr. LAWSON. The date they say they were armed, Mrs. Harriman, according to that call, I think was the 23d day of April, or three days after Ludlow.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The 22d?

Mr. LAWSON. Twenty-second—I beg pardon.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Two days after Ludlow?

Mr. LAWSON. Two days after Ludlow.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. When the deputy sheriffs who were appointed by Jeff Farr, the sheriff of Huerfano County?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, ma'am.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. When he testified that they were armed?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. As soon as he appointed them?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. What was the date?

Mr. LAWSON. September 1, if I recall.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Before September 1, or September 1?

Mr. LAWSON. About September 1, 1914.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. 1914?

Mr. LAWSON. 1913 I mean to say.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Ludlow was 1914—April, 1914?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, ma'am.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Do you know of any strikers being armed before those gunmen, deputy sheriffs, were armed by the C. F. & I. Co.?

Mr. LAWSON. No; I do not know of any, Mrs. Harriman, but if you will pardon me, because of the many indictments against hundreds of our people in the State of Colorado because of those disturbances, I will have to decline to go into the details of the things that have taken place. I happen to be one of the many individuals indicted on a number of charges, and if you will excuse me, I will have to decline to go into the details as to the arming of men and things of that kind. I will be glad to answer any questions, however, that you may ask if I can that are outside of that particular zone.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I wanted to ask some questions in that connection, but under the circumstances, as you explain, that there are indictments out and it would embarrass you to make answer, I shall refrain from asking the question. There is one other point on which I would like to get your statement, Mr. Lawson. In the document that you read yesterday afternoon to the commission among other things, as nearly as I can recall the language, you made the statement and went on to say that you believed that the United Mine Workers of America were worthy to be recognized and dealt with because they always observed their contracts?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That they had not violated any of their agreements?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I made that statement—pardon me, or a statement similar to that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That was the substance?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that was the gist of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Again quoting from the proceedings at the Denver hearing, I want to read this, which was offered in testimony by the operators, and ask the answer to it, if there is an answer.

I have here a clipping from the Coal Age, a publication issued somewhere in the East, under date of December 20, 1913, which contains—I will not read the whole thing, but will just take the heart out of it, and you can answer it. It is issued by the Association of Bituminous Coal Operators of Central Pennsylvania, 301 Betz Building, and addressed to Mr. Patrick Gilday, president district No. 2, U. M. W. A., Morrisvale mines, Pennsylvania, dated Philadelphia, December 12, 1913, and it says:

"DEAR SIR: The executive board of the Association of Bituminous Coal Operators of Central Pennsylvania held a meeting here to-day, approved and directed that the following communication be forwarded to you at once."

And then it goes on through several whereases, and I will just deal with the one touching on broken contracts.

"Whereas rules 12 and 13 of said agreement provide 'should differences arise between the operators and mine workers as to the meaning of the provisions of this agreement, or about matters not specifically mentioned in the agreement, there shall be no suspension of work on account of such differences, but an earnest effort be made to settle such differences immediately.'"

Then it goes on to say further:

"Whereas, notwithstanding the fact that rule No. 15 provides 'the right to hire and discharge, the management of the mine, and the direction of the working forces' are vested exclusively in the operator, and the United Mine Workers of America have absolutely disregarded this rule in that they have at numerous times served notices on substantially every operator belonging to our association that unless all of the employees working for such operators should become members of the union on or before certain dates mentioned in said notices that they, the mine workers, would close or shut down the operators' respective mines, and in many instances did close the mines for this reason, and refused to return to work unless such nonunion employees were discharged. This conduct is in direct violation of your contract, and specifically interferes with and abridges the right of the operator to hire and discharge; of the management of the mine and of the direction of the working forces; this conduct in violation of contract on part of the mine workers, as well as that mentioned in the preceding paragraph, has resulted in more than 100 strikes during the life of our scale agreement; and

"Whereas, notwithstanding the fact that the operators appealed to you as president of the United Mine Workers of America of district No. 2 to enforce and carry out your contract, and your repeated admissions that the mine workers were not living up to their contract, but that you individually were doing all in your power to compel performance thereof, nevertheless it has been open and notorious that your subofficials, organizers, and like employees have been continuing this line of conduct down to the present date."

Then it goes on to say:

"Be it resolved, therefore, That the operators enter a vigorous protest and demand of Patrick Gilday, president, and executive board of the mine workers of this district an immediate cessation of the conduct hereinbefore recited, and that they strictly enforce on the part of the mine workers their covenants contained in said contract, and in event of the failure to cease such conduct within the next 10 days that the president and secretary of the operators' association shall call a special meeting of the members thereof for the purpose of considering the final dissolution of its association on the specific ground that it is useless to enter into contract obligations with a body that steadfastly refuses to fulfill the same and which no official apparently has power to enforce.

"Yours, truly,

"W. R. ROBERTS, Secretary."

Will you tell us what you know about this case, Mr. Lawson?

MR. LAWSON. I would like to know if that is all that is contained in that, if you know what happened as a result of that?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; we do not, and for that reason we invite your statement in that connection.

MR. LAWSON. I think, in the first place, Mr. Weinstock, the Coal Age is the official journal of the coal operators. This statement is published concerning district No. 2, a partially organized district. I do not know very much about the statement or the conditions that prevailed over in Pennsylvania, but I want to reiterate my statement, that if that condition prevailed and was taken up with the international executive board of the United Mine Workers, those men, if they were under contract and had violated the contract, would either have returned to work or gotten out of the organization.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You note the claim is made here that there were a hundred strikes in violation of the contract.

MR. LAWSON. Yes; I have heard that claimed so many times all over the country that it is familiar to me.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it a fact?

MR. LAWSON. It is not a fact.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many strikes did take place in violation of the contract?

MR. LAWSON. There might have been—and I will be as fair as I can in this matter. Let me admit that there may have been here and there in this country a local strike, wherein some members of a local union who were not perhaps good union men succeeded in misguiding members of that particular local. Those very few instances have been charged up against the United Mine Workers of America as a violation of contract, when, as a fact, in nearly every instance I can recall that has ever come before the international executive board—and I have been a member of that board since 1905—the matter has been taken up, and the men have either gone back to work and stayed at work under the contract or the charter has been taken away from them and they have been put out of the union.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You notice that in this connection Mr. Gilday, the president of the district, is quoted as saying that he had not been able to enforce the law, but that he was doing the best he could—that up to that time he had failed to enforce it. Now, I gather from what you said—he says here:

"Be it resolved, therefore, That the operators enter a vigorous protest and demand of Patrick Gilday, president, and the executive board of the mine workers of this district, an immediate cessation of the conduct hereinbefore recited, and that they strictly enforce on the part of the mine workers their covenants contained in said contract."

And before that it said:

"Notwithstanding the fact that the operators appealed to you as president of the United Mine Workers of America of district No. 2, to enforce and carry out your contracts and your repeated admissions that the mine workers were not living up to their contract, but that you individually were doing all in your power to compel performance thereof, nevertheless it has been open and notorious that your subofficials, organizers, and like employees have been continuing this line of conduct down to the present date."

Now, seemingly the officials there were utterly unable to carry out their part of the agreement. There is nothing to indicate to us that these men were disciplined or that the charter was taken away, or that they were ordered to go back to work, unless you had testimony to that effect.

MR. LAWSON. In the first place, I wanted to again call your attention to the fact that the Coal Age is one of the official journals of the operators.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The Coal Age is not saying this; this is a resolution passed by the operators.

MR. LAWSON. That is the same thing, so far as I am concerned.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The Coal Age simply published it.

Mr. LAWSON. The operators are making the contention there that these things are taking place, and until I could know all of the facts and what action was taken by Mr. Gilday or by the international executive board, I would not be in a position to answer that question as you would desire to have it answered, but I am not willing to take the operators' statements that the miners of any State have violated the law without having more full information.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not know, then, what action was taken by Mr. Gilday?

Mr. LAWSON. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your answer, then, is that you can not state more specifically because you are not familiar with the facts?

Mr. LAWSON. As I stated in the first place, in every case that has ever been brought before the district organization—those men—if there have been any violations, and I do not pretend to say that the coal miners' union is so perfect yet that every man in the organization is trying to do everything he can to keep the contracts, any more than the operators do, but I have found a good many dozens of operators in my experience who had no regard whatever for a contract, Mr. Weinstock.

But until we know what action Mr. Gilday has taken, and until we know what action—in the event he failed in his duties—the international board has taken, it is not possible to get at the facts in the case and give an intelligent answer to your question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think it is material for the commission to know what the facts are in this case, otherwise the charge that the coal miners were guilty of contract breaking would stand uncontradicted, and I think, in the interests of the United Mine Workers of America, Mr. Lawson, you should get the facts and transmit them to us for our records.

Mr. LAWSON. I will try and get them, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennan wishes to ask some questions.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Lawson, have you any idea as to the number of mines being operated in the central district of Pennsylvania?

Mr. LAWSON. No; I have not; I can not say how many, but I know there are a great many.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you think it would be an exaggeration to say there were over 1,000?

Mr. LAWSON. No; I do not think it would; I am satisfied there are a great many more than that, but I have not got the exact number.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, contracts are agreements entered into between the United Mine Workers, as an organization, and the operators' organization, are they not?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. If there were violations of the contract or of the terms that are embodied in the contract by individual miners or by a bunch of miners who are on the shift in a mine, would that be a violation of the contract by the United Mine Workers?

Mr. LAWSON. It would not, but it has been so considered by the operators, and that is the way they get these many violations, Mr. Lennan.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you know anything of the alleged violation of contract which took place in the Danville district of Illinois two or three years ago, and the subsequent action of the miners of Illinois in that case?

Mr. LAWSON. I can not recall the details of it.

Commissioner LENNON. Never mind then.

Mr. LAWSON. I remember something about it, but I can not recall the details.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you know as a member of the executive board of the United Mine Workers of any incident where individual miners have broken contracts or the terms of a contract and it had been brought to the attention of the general executive officers where they have not undertaken to the utmost of their ability to see that the individual members complied with the agreement?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; there have been a number of cases of that kind that have happened in our organization. It had some, I think—one or two in the Southwest; I think there have been one or two in Illinois, and I think perhaps one or two in Pennsylvania of that kind. I went once myself to a local union in our district where the operators claimed a violation of contract and I found a number of grievances there; I think seven grievances the miners claimed, and the men had gone so far that they quit. The operators complained of it. and the president of the district requested me to go with him to the local union and see if we could not get the matter straightened out. I went to the local meeting with him and learned that the men had quit their places because they claimed they were justified in so doing. They claimed that the pit boss and the superintendent had been so arbitrary and had violated the terms of the contract themselves to a point where they could not stand it any longer, and they finally quit the mine. I took a copy of the agreement out of my pocket and I took a copy of our international constitution out of my pocket and read both of them, or parts of both of them, and I said, "Why, it does not make any difference whether the operators have violated the contract or not; the fact remains that you yourselves have not taken your grievances through the proper channel. Now," I said, "I want you to pass a motion in this meeting to wipe out the motion passed already calling the strike, to have it rescinded, and when you pass that motion I want you to pass another motion putting those men back to work." They passed both motions as I asked them to do, and asked me if I would go with them or with the president of the district to the mine the next day to take up their grievances, and I told them I would. I told them in talking to them about this matter, "You have violated this contract and the international organization will not stand for it, and if you do not go back to work to-morrow morning, as an international officer I will take your charter off of the wall myself."

The next morning we went to the mine; we went to the pit boss and the superintendent. There was a good deal of feeling there amongst those two sides. I listened to them a little while and got them all out of the room, everyone except the pit boss, the superintendent, and the president of the district, and asked them what the trouble was. I said to them, "Although the men are wrong they insist on an adjustment of their grievances, but they will go back to work at once because they have agreed to do that. Now, let us find out how far the grievances claimed by the men are right." We went over them one by one, and they admitted to me that every one of the seven grievances—that in every one of the seven grievances the men were correct in making their complaint, and they adjusted them and they got the men back to work, and they never had any more trouble. That is the way the organization does business concerning those matters.

Commissioner LENNON. If the individual operators in any State where you have collective bargaining with regard to contracts fails to live up to the terms of the contract, do you then charge the operators as an organization with having violated the contract?

Mr. LAWSON. Positively not. The miners do not charge up to the operators, or the operators' association, any violation of contract because of the fact that one individual operator, or in fact a group of operators, has violated the contract.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, I want you to make clear, and this is the first time I have ever indicated by any premise how I wanted a question answered. There have been a number of witnesses who have testified as to what collective bargaining consists of; quite a number of them have indicated that it is an attempt on the part of the unions to secure a controlling voice, or at least a potent voice, in the financial management of the companies, in the business management of the corporation or individual employer; that it goes into all of the ramifications of the business of the employer. I want you to tell us what collective bargaining is as understood by the United Mine Workers and as applied by them; just what it covers, and whether it does cover at all any of these things that I have mentioned which have been testified to, directly in some instances and indirectly in some others.

Mr. LAWSON. Collective bargaining by the United Mine Workers of America is the negotiating and the reaching of a written agreement between the miners and the operators, the terms of which are specified in the agreement.

The miners have always conceded the right of the operator to employ the men he chooses, to discharge the men he chooses, so long as the men discharged have done something that the company is justified in discharging them for. The miners do not have anything to do with the operating end of the company; they do not have anything to do with the selling of their coal or the dictating to them what they shall charge for their coal; they claim that is the operator's business.

So far as the question of the miners interfering in any manner with the operating end of a corporation or coal company, I want to say this, that while in Denver before a State joint legislative committee the operators were contending, or pretending—let me put it that way, for that is all it was, just another subterfuge—that if the miners would put up a bond for their good behavior, if they would incorporate just enough so they would do differently than they were doing, then perhaps things would be all right. I asked how much bond they thought we ought to put up, and I forget just the amount in dollars and cents agreed on by the operators. This was Mr. C. L. Bond, of Denver, who represented the operators of our State as president of the operators' association at that time. I said to him, "Do I understand you to say, Mr. Bond, that the miners of Colorado should put up a surety bond guaranteeing they would not violate their contracts in any manner?" He said, "Yes." I said, "Are you willing that the company should put up the same kind of a bond that they would not violate their contracts?" He said, "That would be right." I said, "You know that the miners themselves have not the amount of property or money to enable them to put up a bond themselves?" He said, "Yes." I said, "You know the district organization or the local organization has not enough money to put up this bond?" He said, "Yes." "Then," I said, "the international organization will be compelled to put up this bond for the miners." He said, "Yes." "Then, do I understand that the international organization should put up a bond for men they have never seen and over whom they have practically no control and do not know who they are? Do I understand you to say that the miners should have something to say about who should be employed?" And he said, "The miners should say who should be employed in the mine, as to every man that should be employed in the mine." I said, "Mr. Bond, I have been in this organization a good while and as an official for some time, but the time has not yet come when I am willing to ask or to accept any such concession from the operators, because we do not ask it. If the miners should select all the men themselves who are going to work in the mines, or put all of the men out of the mines they do not choose to keep there, they could bankrupt any company in this State. On the other hand, if the miners put up a bond the operators could bring in men who would continually violate agreements, and under that bond the operators could bankrupt any international organization."

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Lawson, that is pertinent, of course, to the general conditions and the existence of these contracts, or collective bargaining, but I will ask the question a little differently. In presenting these agreements to the employers does the United Mine Workers of America endeavor to cover anything except the wages, the hours of labor, protection for life and limb, and the conditions that have to do with the workmen and their employment in the mines?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir; it does not.

Commissioner LENNON. That is what it covers?

Mr. LAWSON. That is what it covers, exactly; things of that character. I will put it that way.

Commissioner LENNON. Just one or two other questions. Were you present at the Denver hearing at the time Mr. Welborn testified?

Mr. LAWSON. I may not have been there all of the time; I was not able to be there at all of the hearings. I was there a part of the time.

Commissioner LENNON. Are you aware of the fact that he testified that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. expended, I believe it was, $30,000 for arms to arm the deputies and the gunmen that were operating in southern Colorado?

Mr. LAWSON. I either heard it or read it in the press.

Commissioner LENNON. That testimony was given. Has the union, so far as you know, in Colorado, ever approved a violation of law, or have they ever permitted their members to violate the law?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir; not in one single instance, so far as I know.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you know of any people who have been charged with violations of law in connection with the contest in Colorado who were, for instance, members perhaps of the Protestant Church or of the Catholic Church or of some military society, where those churches or societies have been charged with criminality because of these individual members being charged with crime of some kind or other?

Mr. LAWSON. Not that I know of.

Commissioner LENNON. How do you account for it, then, that if a union is similarly charged—that if a union member is similarly charged with the commission of some offense that the union is immediately charged with being the criminal?

Mr. LAWSON. It seems to be the common custom of employers of labor in this country who are opposed to organized labor to charge every crime in the culendar to the door of labor; it seems to be one of the subterfuges they use so much; one of the things they give out to the public, leaving the inference that the organization is a lawless organization, and also that it is despotic in its dealings, when the fact of the matter is that it comes as near being a democratic organization as any in the country. Every man in the organization has an opportunity to voice his sentiments. He has an opportunity to cast his ballot. He has an opportunity to speak on every question.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Lawson, in the industry in which you have spent your life work, of course there must have been union and nonunion workers. What has been your observation as to law-abiding citizenship as compared between the two? Which of the two have had more of its numbers arrested for drunkenness, for wife beating, and the abandonment of their families and children, and the other crimes and misdemeanors that are committed usually in and among the members of industrial communities?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, if I could give a particular and specific answer to that question I should say, first, the very men who are selected by the operators through the sheriffs of those southern counties, that they are the men who have violated those laws and principles the most; and, in fact, there are a great deal more of those men found in the ranks of the nonunion miners than those in the ranks of the unions.

Commissioner LENNON. I think that is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard has a few questions to ask.

Commissioner BALLARD. I understand you to state, Mr. Lawson, in those camps in Colorado, run or operated as nonunion camps, the men do not have the pleasures and do not have clubs; they do not have theaters and the ordinary pleasures that men in the cities and towns and other places have.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; that is my knowledge.

Commissioner BALLARD. Are there not some camps in Colorado where they do treat with the union and where they are unionized?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. In those camps do the men have clubs and theaters, and are there not better schoolhouses than in the camps that are not unionized?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; the men in any camp of any size have a union hall of their own where they hold their meetings, and other public meetings are held there, too. Let me cite as an illustration the camp of Lafayette or Louisville or Superior or Marshall or Erie or Frederick, in the northern fields. They have halls which they own or lease, but Louisville and Lafayette have their own halls and have their meetings every week, and they go there and meet, and the hall is open to anyone else who wants to hold a meeting. They have a little theater and other forms of amusement; in fact, they enjoy a good deal more liberty, as well as social pleasures, than they enjoy in the closed camps.

Commissioner BALLARD. There has been some little confusion perhaps about checkweighmen. One of the mine operators in Colorado testified that in selling coal which was shipped on the railroads an accurate weight was kept of it, and the companies, in fact, have books to show that they paid their men for as much coal as that showed, and that therefore there had been no discrimination against the men in the amount of coal as to the amount of the coal, and that the men had really gotten pay for all of the coal mined, because it tallied with the amount of the coal sold. Is that true or accepted by the laboring men?

Mr. LAWSON. That question, Mr. Ballard, brings to mind one of what I call the cheapest and smallest tricks the operators have been known to employ in this way: It is perhaps true that the railroad weights—I will assume that it is true that the railroad rates may tally with the amount of coal paid to the miners, but wherein does the miner get justice and get the correct weights if the operator or the pit boss or superintendent—and I am assuming, of course, they are all operators, because they are under their jurisdiction—wherein I say do they get justice or their just weight if those superintendents or pit bosses take from 100 men so much coal and give it to other men in payment for dead work or day labor performed? You see that in mining the work is nearly always on the contract basis and the men get so much a ton. There is no checkweighman on the tippie. The coal comes out and the weigh boss—why, it is a common thing that I do not think anyone will dispute—the weigh boss on top helps push the cars. I have stood on many of the tippies and seen it myself; he will push the car clear across the scale and dump it without paying any attention to the weighing of the coal. They keep the checks underneath the car to keep them from being stolen. Then he takes the check back to the little weighing room and looks and sees how much that man was paid for the day before or the week before, and if it is 2,000 pounds he takes his pencil and marks 2,000 pounds or any other amount he feels like putting down. He guesses what it is on that car and has no other way of knowing. In that way there is a great deal of coal purloined from every car. I will admit that there are some exceptions and that there are some operators who are honest enough to see that the men get their just weights without having checkweighmen to keep watch over it. But where the superintendent comes to check up the amount of coal on a railroad car, if he employed you to do dead work, which would amount to $300, $400, or $500 in the pay period, he could take from this amount of coal on hand and pay you that with so many pounds of coal, and in that way pay you for the dead work. And that is the way it is done, and that is why the operators are able to say, "Why, we do not take their coal; the same amount of coal is paid for." And they can show on their books they have paid for so much coal, when they have stolen it from some man and paid it to another for payment of dead work.

Commissioner BALLARD. I understand it, but never did before. But the man that gets the coal in payment would he not have some ticket showing that he received coal and not money for dead work?

Mr. LAWSON. No; it would show he has been given so much coal, he has so many pounds of coal a month, and that is added to the other tonnage. In all probability the man would know that he was paid in coal, but he could not tell where the coal came from; he would not be in position to go to the boss in a nonunion camp and say, "You stole this coal from some other man and gave it to me." He would not stay there long if he did.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is the way it is done, is it?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. There is another question. We have heard a great deal of the check-off system, and I would like to have that explained a little more in detail and whether or not your miners' union always insists on that method of collecting your dues?

Mr. LAWSON. When the men or miners in any district go into a joint conference with the operators they each submit to the other parties a written agreement. Then they take both of them and sit down and discuss them and go over every detail until they arrive at a conclusion, when the contracts are signed. Usually in that contract it stipulates that the check off shall be one of the provisions and that from the wages of every man will be checked his dues, assessments, etc. Now, in Colorado, let me speak for our district, and there are so many districts alike, but I prefer to speak of that one—we have had the check-off system there since 1906. We signed our first joint contract with the operators and have had that system from that time up until now. Each man signs a blank form which states that, "I hereby desire to have my dues and my assessments, etc., checked off by the company." And that is given to the clerk. It is given to him as a protection to the company against any criticism. Then when the pay day comes around at the end of the month or whatever time the checkweighman turns into the clerk the number of names and the amounts of the dues or assessments, to be deducted from the wages of every man, and they are deducted in the same manner as they deduct powder, oil, house rent, board, doctor, and everything else. But there is no dissension; there is no dispute in the matter at all; the men agree to have it checked off.

The point, I think, in your question is this: Suppose a man comes and he is not willing to agree to the check off. Well, assume that he is not willing to agree to the check off of his powder, of his oil, of his tools, of his tool sharpening, and all other things that contribute to the management of the mine. If he says, "I am not willing to be checked off," he must mean it all, and the boss says, "I will not employ you then," and he is not employed.

Commissioner BALLARD. In this way the mine operators collect the dues for the labor unions?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Is that done in any other labor unions that you know of except the United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. LAWSON. I am not sure. The United Mine Workers of America operate, perhaps, differently than most other unions, and their work is so much of it contract work that it demands a different form of bargaining with the operators.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman has a question.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Is anybody taxed for the saloons?

Mr. LAWSON. The saloonkeeper has been taxed, according to my understanding, in Colorado, and the testimony adduced before this commission and the congressional investigating committee is to the effect that the saloonkeeper is taxed 40 or 50 cents a month for every man that works in the mine as rental in certain of those coal camps.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Who is that done by?

Mr. LAWSON. By the company.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. As your experience in dealing with employers—has your experience in dealing with employers taught you that for the purpose of inspiring that mutual confidence that is necessary to the making of an agreement, and that mutual respect that is necessary for the maintenance of it, that there must also be a mutual apprehension in regard to what the result of breaking the contract would be? In other words, the fear of each for the other if unfairly dealt with?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And any system of dealing between employer and employee that has not that element of fear in it is valueless?

Mr. LAWSON. That is correct.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has it occurred to you or is it your belief that the refusal to sell homes to the men in these closed camps is founded on the economic advantage that accrues to the company from its ability to evict or the stifling of competition in the sale of material and goods to the men?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; that, in my judgment, is the real reason at the bottom of the whole thing. They will not sell them homes for the reason that if a man quits or is discharged or if he violates their local town laws in any manner, by going out, for illustration, to Trinidad or Walsenburg or any other place and buying groceries, they may discharge him, and he can not remain in the house; he must leave the camp and take his family with him.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the course of your dealings or connection with these industrial problems in Colorado has it ever been brought upon you personally criminal assault from any employer?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, I have been followed around. I expect, probably as much as any man in this country. Mr. Garretson, by some of the company's thugs. I have been arrested and thrown in jail and accused of carrying a gun when I did not happen to have a gun with me, and I have also been shot down on the main street of a little town in the West in broad daylight by an operator, because of the stand I had taken in the strike of 1903. Several little things like that have happened. [Laughter.]

Chairman WALSH. Ladies and gentlemen, please make no audible expression.

Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask a question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say you are under indictment in Colorado at the present time?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; a few.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many times have you been indicted?

Mr. LAWSON. At the present time I think there are about 19 indictments against me; I think 19 specific charges, 14 for murder, a couple for assault with intent to kill, 1 for arson, and I think 3 for conspiracy in restraint of trade. They got rid of 3 a little while ago for trying to impeach a judge for throwing some of our boys in jail in the northern field, but I think there are 19 still pending.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many indictments were there altogether in Colorado during the strike?

Mr. LAWSON. I do not know how many indictments there have been altogether, but I think it would run up into the thousands if they were counted, but I think there are something over 300 men under indictment now in the different counties.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is in connection with this late strike?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; in connection with this recent strike.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are there any indictments against the operators?

Mr. LAWSON. Not one.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were there any suits or cases brought against the operators, individually or collectively?

Mr. LAWSON. No; there was not any against the operators that I can recall just now, except the operator who I said shot me on the street in New Castle in 1903, but I was speaking about this present time. No; there was a number of the militia who were tried by the military court in Colorado for the murder of three men who were killed after they had been taken prisoners, and also for the murder of the 14 women and children that were murdered in Ludlow, but those people have all been exonerated and turned loose. In fact, they are still, I understand, in the employ of the operators.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is, they were turned loose by the lower court?

Mr. LAWSON. Turned loose by the military court, the militia.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was done in the case of the man that shot you?

Mr. LAWSON. Nothing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He was exonerated or discharged?

Mr. LAWSON. He was not—I will tell you what happened to him.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did I understand you to say that he was arrested or that suit was brought against him?

Mr. LAWSON. He was arrested and taken home and gotten out of the country.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who was he arrested by?

Mr. LAWSON. By a deputy sheriff, one of his friends.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was he ever brought to trial?

Mr. LAWSON. I was just going to tell you about that. When the case came up for hearing, the night before the hearing, the district attorney, John L. Gray by name, of the ninth judicial district of Colorado, got up just before court adjourned and nolle-prossed the case. He said, "These charges come out of the strike we are just going through and it is a strike charge and I do not believe we ought to press the case." So the case was nolle and never came to trial.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He was an operator?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Operating a mine in that district?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And he left the country, you say?

Mr. LAWSON. No; he is still in the country.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I thought you said he was taken away.

Mr. LAWSON. He was taken away for that period. He was not in jail. He was taken off and hid out by some of his friends. He was arrested by Deputy Sheriff Ritter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was he active in the strike afterwards?

Mr. LAWSON. No; he was not very active in the strike afterwards.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Why did he shoot you? What was the particular reason assigned for it?

Mr. LAWSON. It happened something like this, if I can tell you briefly. I would rather that some one else should talk about this.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If there is anything you do not want to answer because of its reflection, you need not do so.

Mr. LAWSON. No; but I would prefer that some one else should talk about me than to talk about myself.

The fact is that an article appeared in a paper he ran also and I was informed that another man had written the article. A little fellow that weighed about 230 pounds. I met him one day and asked him to explain it. The result was that in my desire to have it explained he struck me, and when we got through this other fellow took it up in his paper and challenged me to meet him in New Castle, which was our home. I met him in a barber shop a few days afterwards—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). And what was implied in his challenge to meet you; was it to debate or combat?

Mr. LAWSON. He challenged me to meet him and fight him. He talked about the fight this other fellow and I had, and he was not satisfied, and said he wanted to meet me, and three or four days afterwards I happened to meet him in a barber shop and we spoke to each other and I said, "I understand you have challenged me in your paper." And I said "I have." I said "You know those things don't get any better after they have aged," and we talked quietly about it, just as quietly as we are talking here, and he invited me into the street. I said, "Your wife and babies are in the buggy out there in the street and you had better take them home." He said, "You don't need to think about them; I am able to take care of them," and I said, "You had better do that and if we have any differences we can settle them all right." There was no talk about a gun or anything of that kind; I did not have any gun with me as it developed later. He insisted that we go out in the street and I said, "All right; the street is good enough for me," and I did not have any hat or coat and my vest was open and he went into the street and I jumped off of the sidewalk, which was 2 or 3 feet above the roadway, and he walked to his buggy and pulled a pump shotgun out from under the lap robe and turned around and threw a shell into it and invited me to take my medicine, and I did, and that was about the extent of it.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman has another question she wishes to ask you.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I want to know when was martial law declared in Colorado?

Mr. LAWSON. It has not been declared since 1903, to my knowledge, Mrs. Harriman.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Not declared since 1903?

Mr. LAWSON. No.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Did not the militia make arrests?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; the militia made many and many arrests.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Did any of these people arrested serve terms in prison?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, madam; a great many of them; some are in there yet.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Who tried those cases? Before whom were those cases tried?

Mr. LAWSON. A great many of them have not been tried—in fact I don't believe any of them have been tried, or with very few exceptions. The military commission never tried any cases, but they held persons there sometimes as many as 40 days at a time, and then turned them loose; did not prefer any charges against them in a civil court at all.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. How many?

Mr. LAWSON. Oh, I couldn't say. There must have been hundreds of them altogether. There were so many that we did not keep count of them, Mrs. Harriman. It got to be such a common thing that—women even were arrested and held in jail. It did not seem to make very much difference who they were, as long as they were in sympathy with the strikers.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you this question: If the conditions were such as you have described in the closed mining camps, why didn't the miners move away from there?

Mr. LAWSON. If I knew who asked that question I would ask him where they were going to go to. The miners, like most other workmen, have got to keep on working every day to keep the wolf from the door. And they are brought into those countries, or mining fields, or induced to go into them, with the understanding that conditions are pretty good; and after they got there—I am speaking of the closed camps now again—after they get there they find, to their great disappointment, that they are not what they seemed to be, and they are not able—they have not got the money to move their families away from there, and they would have to leave the State almost to find a place to work.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock says he has another question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the operators were guilty of lawbreaking or crimes, has any effort been made on the part of the unions to have them indicted?

Mr. LAWSON. The unions in Colorado have discovered some time back, Mr. Weinstock, that where the operators have such a great influence and such a great part in electing the officials of our State, and particularly the judiciary in these counties, it is not of very much use trying to have them indicted. At least we have decided not to bother them at the present time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You say you do not think it worth while to have them indicted because the operators have the power to elect the officials of the State.

Mr. LAWSON. I say they have in a large measure the power and they do exercise that power; yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask this question, Mr. Lawson: In nearly every State in the Union the wage earners are in the majority of the voters. Does that hold with Colorado?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The majority of the voters there are wage earners?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes. That holds good, in my judgment, in Colorado.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are the wage earners in Colorado in sympathy with the miners?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; the great majority of them, and have so expressed themselves.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, you have the recall there, have you not?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then if officials are elected that, in the judgment of the workers, are incompetent or dishonest or unfit, what is to prevent them from applying the recall?

Mr. LAWSON. The recall is such an expensive article or luxury, I should call it, and so cumbersome yet in our State, that it would be quite a good long time before we could recall any officer. And we understand that the question of recalling officials is not always the best thing to do, because of the fact that you can not get to the people to get them to understand the grievance. And while it is true that the wage earners are in a majority, it is a most unfortunate thing that they do not all possess the intelligence that they should possess and the understanding of politics and its ways.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, are we to understand from that, Mr. LAWSON, that despite the fact that the people of the State of Colorado have given practically to the workers the right to prevent bad laws being put on the statute books by virtue of the referendum and the right to put on the statute books laws in their interest and in their protection by virtue of the initiative, and the right to recall derelict officials, despite the fact that the people of Colorado have given those blessings—political blessings—to the wage earners of the State—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). That democracy in Colorado is practically a failure?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes. I want to make this statement quite frankly and quite candidly. Democracy in Colorado has been a most miserable failure for some years.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Isn't that a most serious reflection on the people of the State of Colorado?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I think it is; and I think the same reflection might be spread out to other States than Colorado in this Union.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If democracy is a failure, then wherein lies any hope?

Mr. LAWSON. In making it effective.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, how else would you make it effective than to put the ballot in the hands of every voter in the State to enact laws which will be in the interest of the majority of the State?

Mr. LAWSON. I will tell you how I think it could be made effective—by every man at the head of or in every corporation complying with the laws himself and giving to the working people social and political liberty and industrial justice. Then democracy will reign in their or in any other State.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, if the people of the Commonwealth give to the workers of that Commonwealth every opportunity, by their votes, to enact such laws as seem to be in their best interest, and they either will not or can not or decline to avail themselves of those possibilities, what more can be done?

Mr. LAWSON. How can you avail yourself of a law, if the men whom it applies to refuse to live up to the law and the officials of certain counties fail or refuse to prosecute them. In other words, it amounts to this much: It is getting to the place, in my judgment, where men must recognize it as their duty to society to live up to the laws themselves without being penalized, without being convicted of wrongdoing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Don't you see, Mr. LAWSON, that when it is admitted that the majority of the voters in Colorado, as in other States, are wage earners, and when it is admitted that the law makes it possible for them to legislate in their own selfish interests if they want to, because they have the power of the majority vote, and they fail to do that, that it is an awful reflection upon the intelligence and civic spirit of the wage earners themselves?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I will plead guilty to the indictment so far as the wage earners are concerned; and I also want to say that it is a greater reflection upon the people who understand the law and have the intelligence to know what law means, to violate it continually and every day.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then how can you hold the operators responsible for the neglect of the wage earners themselves in performing their civic duty?

Mr. LAWSON. I am not finding the fault with the operators for the wage earners not doing their duty; but I am finding fault with the operators violating every law that pertains to labor and mine inspection in our State year after year when those laws are on our statute books. That is the fault I am finding with them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The remedy had been placed, according to your own statement, absolutely, in more recent times, in the hands of the workers, and they have failed to apply the remedy.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; and they will eventually apply the remedy. It will take time for them to be educated to the place where they will understand that they must effectively wield the ballot and not let the other fellow do all the dictating to them. And that time is coming, in my judgment.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am asked to put to you this question: That the Survey—a weekly publication called the Survey—in an article on the Colorado strike, states that wages are generally conceded to be good in Colorado. Have you any comment or correction to make on that statement?

Mr. LAWSON. I did not get that last part.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The Survey, in an article on the Colorado strike, states that wages in Colorado are generally conceded to be good. Have you any comment or correction to make on that point.

Mr. LAWSON. I have got this comment to make on it, Mr. Weinstock: That the wages of Colorado are lower than Wyoming, Montana, and Washington; and, in my judgment, they are not conceded, by me at least, to be good, and I want to say this in connection with that, for fear I may be misunderstood or misinterpreted. It is not what a man earns in Colorado that counts; it is what he gets when they get through with him.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You were saying a little while ago, Mr. Lawson, that if an applicant for a job at a mine should refuse to pay for the things that he uses—his powder, his fuse, and other things—that the company would refuse to employ him?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of course the company would be thoroughly justified in the refusal to employ him if he failed to do that—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). Pardon me. Let me get this—if a man refuses to let the company check off his wages the amount of the store and rent and powder and all tools, blacksmithing, and so forth, that they will be justified in discharging him?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Perhaps I did not understand the situation. I understood the situation, as you explained it, to be substantially this: If I, as a miner, for instance, am employed in a mine, there would be furnished to me by the company at my expense—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). Powder, fuse, and certain other things that would be necessary; and they would be deducted from my pay.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, of course, if I started out and said: "I propose to use your powder and your fuse, but I am not going to pay you for it. I am not going to allow you to deduct it from my wages." I can understand that, under those circumstances, the company would be justified in refusing to employ me.

Mr. LAWSON. Would you permit me again to get it clear in my mind, to ask this question: You are the employer, now, and I am a miner coming to you for employment. Suppose I say you shall not deduct from my wages powder, oil, or anything else. I will pay it on pay day. What would you say?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I should say to you, if I were dealing with you personally, "That is all right, Mr. Lawson. I know you and I have confidence in you." But if I were employing 5,000 men, the great majority of whom I knew nothing about, who might be here to-day and there to-morrow, I do not think I could afford to take chances on it.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; you would check off my wages.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But, now, supposing, as an applicant for a job, I said to the mine owner, "I am perfectly willing you should deduct from my pay the things I have bought and used, but I am unwilling you should deduct from my pay the dues to the union, because I am unwilling to join the union." Then, what would happen?

Mr. LAWSON. Now, to illustrate my answer to your question, I will have to ask another question. Assume that you are the employer and I the miner who comes to you, and I say: "I will not submit to my dues being checked off. You have made an agreement with the rest of the miners in that mine, and I say that I will not comply with that agreement because I will not permit my dues to be checked off by the organization, or to the organization." Would you employ me?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Not if I, as the applicant, had agreed that it should be checked off. In that case it would be a violation of agreement on my part. But if I came in as an applicant, without having any agreement—

Mr. LAWSON. No; you are the employer and I am the applicant for a job.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Oh; that is quite right; if I, as an employer, entered into an agreement with the union that I was to deduct from each worker a certain sum and turn it over to the union, of course I would want to stand on my agreement.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; there is the check off exactly, and that is the way it works.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; all right; but the part I want to get at is this, Mr. Lawson: Why should the union demand for itself privileges that it is not willing to concede to others—for instance, a church organization or a fraternal order could not come to the employer and ask that the employer shall deduct from the wages of the miner his church dues or his fraternal dues. Now, why say that he must deduct the dues for a union?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, I don't know any difference—any reason why they should not come along and deduct church dues if it is agreeable to a man to pay church dues, and other moneys out that way. I happen to know that I have paid, through the check-off system, contributions to the sisters who used to come around. In fact, I don't remember ever refusing one. I would say, "Why, yes, I'll give you a dollar. Just mark it down there." And it was taken off my wages; taken out just the same as oil or anything was taken out. I had agreed to it just the same as a man agrees to have his dues checked off.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But isn't that one of the reasons, Mr. Lawson, that is given by the employer for refusing to go into a contract with the United Mine Workers of America, because they claim that the union demands, as one of the conditions, that the employer shall deduct from every worker, whether he is willing to agree to it or not, the union dues, and that unless the employer will agree to do that, will agree to use his machinery for the collection of the union's dues, they will not enter into a union agreement with him?

Mr. LAWSON. I contend, Mr. Weinstock, that is not the reason, but a subterfuge that they give. They do not use it as a reason. There is no reason in it because they check off themselves at every mine. They have done it to my knowledge for more than 35 years. They do use it for a subterfuge, because they do not want to enter into collective bargaining with the employees, and they think that sounds well in public to people who do not understand what the check off really means—people who do not understand that the operators themselves inaugurated that system.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I can easily understand, Mr. Lawson, that where the employer is in perfect sympathy with the union he might be extremely willing and anxious to enter into an agreement with the union and would co-operate in an agreement of that kind; but where the employer reluctantly deals with the union, that he would raise that as one of the objections to doing so.

Mr. LAWSON. Well, of course, the difference between a man who does it reluctantly, or a man who deals at all, or willingly—I think the line is very finely drawn there, Mr. Weinstock. And if he agrees at all I imagine he does it willingly. You and I, if we reach an agreement, it will be a mutual understanding and be an agreement; that is all there is to it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do all unions in all industries establish the same condition that the employer must deduct from the worker's wages his union dues?

Mr. LAWSON. I can not state about that, Mr. Weinstock. I don't know much about any other organization.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know any other organization that makes that condition?

Mr. LAWSON. No; I can not recall any; but I want to say again that I do not know much about the workmen in other organizations.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think, from your point of view, the union is justified in demanding of the employer that he shall use his clerical machinery for the collection of the union dues?

Mr. LAWSON. Why, absolutely, as long as he checks off the other things arbitrarily or otherwise. He has just as much right to collect union dues from me and other men as long as we agree to it as he has to take off for powder or oil or the store or the doctor or rent or anything else. It is just the same rights. And I want to say this in connection with that; just one word in connection with that. Where the union is recognized, where it has an agreement, and where there is a complete check off, there is the most harmony and the best results gotten in any mine. Where there is no check off and the mines are what they call in some places the open shop, one half union and the other half nonunion men, the mine is a state of turmoil all the time, and they do not get the efficiency from the men in a mine of that kind.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Getting back to this democracy in Colorado—you attended our Denver hearing; at least I saw you there occasionally.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I attended some of them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And you heard the evidence of a number of the citizens from Huerfano and those other counties in that part of the State?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Regarding the political situation and the number of men having political liberty, how are the judges and the election boards, and so on, selected in those counties?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, they are selected a little bit like this: Of course, each party has a right to select its own judges. In those counties they have got enough men on both sides of the house to select safe men who are always with the company. That is the way they select them.

If you will pardon me I would like to answer a little more fully just a question Mr. Weinstock asked; that is, in connection as to why the people of Colorado did not recall the judges. I stated a while ago there were a number of indictments, eight indictments, against a number of other men, myself included, that have been quashed some time ago. We were indicted on eight counts because we attempted to impeach Judge Greeley W. Whitford, of Denver, for throwing about 32 men into jail. That is the reason that the people of Colorado do not or are not able to enforce the law, for the democracy does not reign there.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Had there been saloon keepers and mine bosses, and so on, on election boards?

Mr. LAWSON. Oh, yes; that is a very common thing in Colorado.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have there been election stations where there were no boards at all to go ahead with the work and the mine boss simply appointed a board, acted as the court, and appointed election boards?

Mr. LAWSON. I have heard statements of that kind, and I believe testimony was given to that effect. But there is something else in connection with that that is, I think, even more wonderful in Huerfano County, the domain of Jeff Farr.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am coming to that in a second.

Mr. LAWSON. Where the boundary line was changed?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am coming to the kingdom of Jeff Farr in a minute.

Mr. LAWSON. I was just going to say they changed the boundary line in that county wherever—changed the boundary line of the proceedings where men were going to vote, in their opinion, against the interests of the coal companies, or Jeff Farr; those boundary lines were changed so that those people had to travel for miles and miles and had either to go by foot or go around in a wagon to get into the precinct in which they lived.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you heard of them voting sheep in these counties?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that is a common thing with them and has been for the past; mules also and box cars and things of that kind.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In order to bring the necessary vote up for a certain proposition, a certain majority, if there was a number of sheep being driven by, they would count the sheep so many votes?

Mr. LAWSON. That has been a custom in Colorado to vote in that way. They always hold their returns back in those counties, and particularly those where they do not know the count; they hold it up until the rest of the returns were counted, and then they would call in and say, "How many do you need?" That is common knowledge everywhere.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, in this county Sheriff Farr is recognized as the king, as was said before our commission in our hearing in Denver?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He has been sheriff of this county for how many years?

Mr. LAWSON. I think about 16.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And he is practically recognized as the political boss in these counties?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; there is no dispute in that country.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He dominates not only in politics, but he dominates the entire liquor business of the community?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that is true; he and a few others dominate the entire liquor business in that county.

Chairman O'CONNELL. And he is a representative so said, he is a representative of the coal companies in these counties?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; and he does not deny it; and I don't think they do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He is the man who appointed in the course of 30 or 60 days, I don't remember just which, more than 1,000 deputy sheriffs, men he had never heard of before or had not seen, and did not know who they were?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Nor did he know where they went after he had appointed them or commissioned them, simply commissioned them and they were turned loose during the strike there, armed and turned loose without anyone having control of them at all?

Mr. LAWSON. That is correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. According to the evidence before this commission?

Mr. LAWSON. That is common knowledge.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And did not know where they were going, did not know anything with regard to them, and did not know who they were?

Mr. LAWSON. Men he had never seen.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They were just turned loose on that, for the purpose, for no other purpose than breaking the strike or committing crimes even to the extent of murder?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that is correct. That has been done even to the extent of murder.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all.

Mr. LAWSON. Common robbery is not paid any attention to among those fellows.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I have two questions which I have been asked to put to you: One is about whether you have any knowledge of the kind of receipts they give for post-office orders?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I had a hat full one time of company-store money orders that the men received when they asked for the United States post-office money orders. They had a habit, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., of issuing—the Colorado Supply Co.—the same thing, it is a subsidiary company, when a man or a person went to ask for a money order they issued them a company money order instead of a United States money order. That was very common also.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Do they still do that?

Mr. LAWSON. No. Mr. Welborn testified in Trinidad before the congressional committee that he stopped that as soon as he heard about it. But that was the first time he heard about it, by the way, I think.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Can anyone go in or out of the mining camps if they happen to be undesirable to the company?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, madam.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. And come into the camps?

Mr. LAWSON. They perhaps may come but they go out awful quick again.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. In other words, then, they can not go?

Mr. LAWSON. They can't stay there; that is what I want to state. They might get in but they can't stay in, Mrs. Harriman, very long.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Have you had any experience?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I have had some experience of that kind. I have gotten in any stayed in quite a while because they didn't know me, but that is the only way you can stay in those camps.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you, Mr. Lawson. You will be permanently excused now.

Amos Pinchot.

TESTIMONY OF MR. AMOS PINCHOT.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. PINCHOT. Amos Pinchot.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live, Mr. Pinchot?

Mr. PINCHOT. New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. PINCHOT. I am a lawyer, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Have you given any particular study to industrial matters and to the relations between employers and employees?

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have, for the last two years—the last three years.

Chairman WALSH. In a general way will you kindly state along what lines your experience and study has been?

Mr. PINCHOT. It has been largely along the lines of the relations between capital and labor, especially into the organization of large industrial companies, which we speak of as monopolies or trusts. I have from time to time taken active part in the investigation of troubles between capital and labor. I visited strike points and made reports.

Chairman WALSH. Have there been some questions submitted to you, Mr. Pinchot, covering certain topics that are under consideration at this hearing?

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Have you prepared yourself to reply to those, first by reading? I believe you mentioned to me yesterday that you had prepared some written answers?

Mr. PINCHOT. I received from the commission six questions, and in order to be specific I prepared the answers in writing.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, would you prefer to read from this point?

Mr. PINCHOT. I would rather, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. PINCHOT. If it is convenient to the commission.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will be very pleased to hear you in that way.

Mr. PINCHOT. The first question that was submitted to me, Mr. Chairman, is, "What is your opinion of collective bargaining?" At this stage in the world's development it seems to me utterly futile to discuss whether or not labor should have the right to bargain collectively with capital. We might as well, Mr. Chairman, discuss whether slavery or freedom is the better plan.

The idea that powerful, highly organized corporations should refuse to treat except with individual employees, who are utterly helpless to drive a bargain, is so feudal and barbarous that it is not worthy of serious consideration; at least it would not be if such corporations as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the United States Steel Corporation, and other great combinations of capital did not still take this antediluvian stand. I call the attention of this commission to the fact that even college presidents and professors of economics, who are often the last to look at labor questions from a human or practical point of view, have in the last few years again and again reiterated the necessity of the recognition of labor unions and collective bargaining. In 1913, Seth Low, ex-president of Columbia, made a strong statement urging the fundamental justice and practical necessity of recognizing labor unions. And last year Prof. Seligman, of the same university, pointed out that where collective bargaining existed labor troubles were minimized. Even the more enlightened presidents of our great railroad systems admit not only the fundamental justice, but the need to both employer and employee of recognizing unions and bargaining collectively. Within a few months, the president of one of our largest systems told me that to deny recognition to a union was a thing which, from the point of view of both morals and expediency, was hopelessly out of date.

If I belonged to the labor class I would spend whatever spare time I had in strengthening my union and forcing its recognition by my employers. For I would be well aware that through recognition of the union only is it possible to break the system of so-called benevolent absolutism by which our great corporations are taking away every right from labor except the right to work at a wage hardly large enough to supply physical efficiency.

In the old slavery days, Mr. Chairman, Abraham Lincoln said that if some smart Yankee could invent a strong-armed man without a head he would receive the everlasting gratitude of the advocates of slavery. He also said that no man was good enough to govern another man without that man's consent. But in the system of Golden Rule absolutism, of which so many advocates have appeared as witnesses before your commission, complete control—a control touching the most vital things in a man's life, and fixing the conditions in which he must work and live and try to support his family—is assumed by the employer. And in spite of the obvious injustice and impracticability of this régime, we find many men of general education and refinement coming before this commission and defending the continuance of this system.

In the questions submitted to me a second question was: "What in your opinion is the cause of industrial unrest in this country?"

My answer to that question is as follows:

In my opinion the cause of the industrial unrest in this country is the fact that there are more men than there are jobs all the time, and in hard times often a dozen men for each job. This results in a condition where the men are bidding against each other for the jobs. The line which we ought to take in attacking such a situation is to develop industry to a point where there are more jobs than there are men. And this can not be done simply by forcing the employers to recognize the unions and assent to collective bargaining.

When the employer admits the right of labor to share in fixing the conditions under which it shall work and live, it is a step in the direction of giving the men who have the jobs some degree of freedom and a living wage. But it does not provide jobs for the jobless men. This can only be done by opening up opportunities for more industry and consequently for more labor. The real duty of labor unionism goes beyond the establishing of collective bargaining. It is to cooperate with all intelligent citizens in forcing the public to realize the paramount necessity of increasing the total of productive industry, so that the opportunities for both capital and labor will be increased—so that a point will be reached, Mr. Chairman, where employers will be bidding against each other for men instead of men bidding against each other for employment. To-day in this country, which contains to an almost unlimited extent the natural resources and raw materials which are the bases of both industry and labor, a condition of restriction exists which limits industry and therefore limits the amount of labor which is used in industry. This is the bottom of the labor trouble.

In almost every great industry the things which both capital and labor must have in order to apply themselves are so cornered or controlled by a small monopolist group that business can not be extended and employment can not be increased, and there results on the one hand a restriction of product and consequent high prices to the consumer, and, on the other hand, a restriction of labor and consequent unemployment and poverty in the labor class. This is what all of us who are interested in legitimate enterprises or in the labor situation must turn their minds to. Mr. Chairman, I will be specific.

Last year the Legislative Assembly of New Jersey made a report which stated that 87 per cent of all the anthracite coal of the United States was owned or controlled by a close combination of 11 railroads, in which the Philadelphia & Reading alone controlled 63 per cent of all the unmined coal. This cornering of the anthracite coal deposits, which are a basis of both industry and labor, produces a condition of restriction in industry and labor. In the last three years in which reports are available, 89 per cent of the anthracite coal mined in the United States was produced by this combination of railroads, which was commonly and correctly termed "the coal trust." The fact that this monopolistic group controls both the coal deposits themselves and the railroads which transport the coal makes it utterly impossible for new capital to break into the situation in a large way. The vast majority of this coal is held by the operators out of use, partially in order to profit by a rise in price and partially to prevent competition. While this condition exists, Mr. Chairman, while the thing which both labor and capital must have access to in order to apply themselves is held out of reach by those who will not use it themselves, it is evident that a vast limitation of industry and of labor is the result. It is patent that in this one example of the monopolistic control of hard coal we have a key not only to the high price of the necessities of existence, but to the fact that men are bidding against each other for jobs instead of jobs bidding against each other for men.

The same condition exists to a great extent in the soft coal deposits of Colorado. Mr. Rockefeller disclaims control over these coal fields on the ground that he is only the controlling force in one company of the group. But nevertheless we know that Mr. Rockefeller is morally as well as financially the controlling factor in the situation of southern Colorado. We know that there is no competition in this one field, the soft coal industry in southern Colorado, and we are aware that during the recent strike the monopoly of the owners was so open that a committee representing them advertised over their own names that if the people of Colorado would help them to put down the strike they would, in return, put down the price of soft coal.

The Steel Corporation owes its ability to prevent competition and to fix prices in the steel industry to the same two elements, the ownership of vast tracts of the best iron ore and coking coal, and the possession of the railroads necessary to transport the ore and coal. Mr. Schwab, himself, who was the Steel Corporation's first president, testified in 1912 that from 80 to 90 per cent of the steel produced in the whole of the United States is made from ores from the Lake regions from Michigan and Minnesota. This percentage may have changed somewhat since he gave his testimony. Mr. H. K. Smith, the Commissioner of Corporations under President Roosevelt and President Taft, is authority for the statement that 75 per cent of all this merchantable ore was bought or leased by the Steel Corporation at or shortly after its organization. Mr. Gary has admitted on the stand before the same inquiry that the Steel Corporation held what he termed an "ultimate monopoly" in this country's ore lands.

Mr. James J. Hill, in 1912, said that all of the available ore on the northern American continent, both large and small deposits, was preempted. And Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Schwab both testified that no large new steel business could be initiated in America on account of the existing control of ore lands.

In addition to this control of natural resources as a means to restrict both industry and labor, the Steel Corporation owns the railroads which haul the ore from the lake regions to its own plants and those of the independents. The result is that the Steel Corporation, through its ownership of roads, can assemble the raw materials necessary to produce a ton of steel or pig iron from two to three dollars cheaper than an independent in the steel business.

Mr. Gary, in 1912, stated on the stand that this differential in transportation between the trust and the independents amounted to about $2. An estimate was made for the investigating committee of Congress at this time which placed the differential at $3 or more. The Steel Corporation does not prevent competition, restrict industry, and limit the opportunities of labor by making steel more cheaply than the independents, for the actual mill costs of the corporation and the independents is approximately the same; but owing to its control of ore and transportation, it can begin the operation of making the steel at its plants with an advantage over independents so large that no independent can compete in the steel industry, and no new capital can go into steel making except with the Steel Corporation's consent.

Again, in addition to this, the customers of the steel trade are largely the railroads; and the groups which control the steel trust also control the railroads. So that one who would compete against the Steel Corporation in selling rails would not only have to buck against the differential which I have described above, but would have to sell rails to the railroads in competition with the Steel Corporation which practically controls such railroads.

The beef-packing business is under much the same limitations as the hard coal, the soft coal, and steel business. Through its relation with the railroads it can and does obtain transportation upon a better basis than any independent. The recent complaint of the Argentine packers who have tried to break into the American market has demonstrated this fact. For instance last year the Armour's stated that they owned $11,000,000 worth of private cars. The railroads ice these cars. If at the end of a year the Armour's send in a bill to the railroad for damages on account of defective icing or delays in transportation, who is to say whether this bill is really a just charge upon the railroads, or a rebate which the beef trust gets as an advantage over outside competitors?

Miss Ida Tarbell, who has testified before this commission, long ago published a story of how the Standard Oil fortune was made and industrial competition restricted, and finally killed by Mr. Rockefeller's criminal alliance with the railroads. The story of that episode is told when we say that Mr. Rockefeller went to the railroads and said, "You must ship for me cheaper than for anybody else." That ended competition. By this simple means industry and labor were restricted in the oil trade and prices were fixed.

Later on the Standard Oil found a cheaper method of transportation in pipe lines, and last year the Interstate Commerce Commission, speaking of the Standard Oil Co.'s pipe lines, said:

"The possession of these pipe lines enables the Standard to control the price of crude petroleum, and to determine therefore the price which its competitors in a given locality shall pay."

And now I want to call your attention to the next sentence in the Interstate Commerce Commission's statement:

"In any industry, whoever controls the avenues of transportation of either the raw material or the finished product can speedily drive all competitors out of business."

Here we have the highest authority in the land plainly stating that through the control of transportation a corporation can cripple or destroy industry, and this means that it can also close opportunities of labor. This power still exists to-day unabated. It has never been broken. As laws have driven monopolies from old forms of rebating they have discovered new ones. Division of freight rates favoring those who initiate business, leasing properties to railroads at fancy prices, granting liberal damage claims, deliveries made to private terminals without charge, and a hundred other devices by which railroads favor great corporations have not only kept rebating alive but have actually largely increased it.

Commissioner of Corporations Garfield informs us that it was utterly impossible to prevent or even trace the methods of establishing transportation differentials or rebates which the Standard Oil Co. and other great industrial groups pursue. Last year's disclosures before the Interstate Commerce Commission of a dozen different kinds of rebating on gigantic scales has taught us that this control over industry and labor has not been weakened up to date and that we can not expect it to be weakened as long as production and distribution remain in the same hand.

The lumber industry is subject to much the same concentration of ownership as the other great industries which I have mentioned. And, finally, the land itself is becoming more and more concentrated in the hands of fewer people. I have high authority for the statement that the tenant farmers are increasing four times as fast in this country as the owner farmers. I have myself visited farms in Texas ranging from 200,000 to 1,300,000 acres. In the East and the West alike the land, every 5 acres of which is a potential living for an unemployed man, is being more and more held out of use. The firm of Miller & Lux boasted when I was in California that it could drive its cattle over its own lands from San Francisco to Los Angeles.

Every day an immense influx of thousands of men and women land from Europe upon American soil. And yet the opportunity for labor on the soil is more restricted yearly as the number of foreign laborers pours in. Unemployment will continue to increase. The power of those great employers, whose economic interest it is to see that at least two men are asking at the same moment for one job, will continue to increase until we take effective steps to make accessible to industry the natural resources—the mines, the great water-powers, the timber and agricultural tracts—which are the absolute necessities of both new capital and new labor.

To this problem all thoughtful, serious-minded citizens must turn their attention; to this the labor unions as much as the general public must devote their efforts; and to this capital—for after all the major portion of capital in America is not identified with the great price-fixing monopolies, but hostile to them because it is oppressed by them—must also bend its energies.

Mr. Ford said in his testimony before this commission that the Government should own the mines and other natural resources, which are the foundation of industry and labor. This is the only doctrine in which there is any hope.

The monopolist group will fight this doctrine to the death, but not until it prevails will we realize the maximum of industrial development, of democracy in industry, or a fair opportunity for employment on equitable terms.

The methods of accomplishing these ends, Mr. Chairman, Government ownership of railroads and of natural resources, are not mysterious and they do not involve insurmountable financial problems. But we could better afford to make the change at any price than to continue as we are going. Through the restriction of industry and the consequent power to fix prices of products and oppress labor the people of the United States are to-day giving up to private monopolies more than a million dollars a day at a conservative estimate. I can prove these figures. Rather than allow this enormous exploitation it would be cheaper for the Government to issue bonds and buy at once some of our major railroad systems.

The condition of nonuse of natural resources through their cornering by monopolies can be attacked as it has been attacked in England with success, as well as in Denmark and France and Germany, by a supertax upon unused land; and by land I mean all of the natural resources which are the source of energy and the raw materials of production. All of this talk, Mr. Chairman, about ameliorating conditions by economically unsound palliatives amounts to walking around in a circle. It is useless, and a growing realization of its futility is producing a demand for intelligent consideration of fundamental economic problems.

The next question, Mr. Chairman, which was asked of me was: "What do you think of the Golden Rule policy as advocated by several gentlemen and a lady who have testified before this commission?"

My answer is the Golden Rule policy simply amounts to saying that because capital has in the past controlled labor it must continue to do so, only its control is to be tempered by a Christian spirit. My opinion is that such a course does not suggest a solution.

The Golden Rule policy was as applicable to slavery as a solution as it is to the absolutism in industrial conditions which exist to-day. It was just as reasonable to hope that the increasing enlightenment and Christian spirit of the southern slaveholders would do away with the wrongs of slavery as it is to hope that manufacturers to-day by this principle will gradually come to solve the problem through individual fair treatment of their employees. When Lincoln said that no man is good enough to govern another man "without that man's consent," he did away with the Golden Rule policy once and for all. To-day no man is good enough to govern another man and fix the conditions under which he must live and work, without sitting down and compromising with that man.

Industrial absolutism, the supreme power of a few individuals over a great body of men working for them, can not, in my opinion, even be materially mitigated by the Golden Rule policy. For experience has shown over and over again inasmuch as the interest of the employing few often conflicts with the interest of the employed many, disputes arise, and when disputes arise, we have seen in Colorado, in Pennsylvania, in Calumet, Mich., in Paint Creek, W. Va., in Lawrence, Mass., in Paterson, N. J., in Carteret N. J., and in a dozen other strike points, the Golden Rule has been hung up in the closet and the Winchester repeater, loaded with buckshot, has been taken out in its stead.

This will go on indefinitely, especially as the most sincere advocates of the Golden Rule are absentee landlords, who remain utterly oblivious to the living conditions of the employees and whose only instructions to their agents at the plants are suggestions as to financial management. The utter ignorance of actual conditions in Colorado which Mr. Rockefeller has not only confessed but insisted upon is a typical instance of how those who advocate the Golden Rule also maintain an impersonal absolutism which makes the whole Golden Rule plan a tragic farce.

Mr. Rockefeller's claim that the actual management of the mines is left to the local managers may be nominally true, but it is not true in fact. It may be true that no specific orders have been issued to managers to get the last cent out of the employees. The fact remains that these managers know that they can hold their jobs only so long as they turn up an amount of profit that is satisfactory to the owners. They also know that as long as this profit is forthcoming no inquiry will be made by the owners as to how the profit is obtained. Under this system even good-hearted managers are tempted by the fear of losing their jobs to oppress the employees by forcing them to accept low wages, by robbing them of a part of the proceeds of their labor through company stores, high rents in company houses, and other devices. The cornerstone, Mr. Chairman, of this system of industrial exploitation is that the owners shall keep themselves in ignorance of the actual acts of oppression practiced by the managers in charge of the property.

That this ignorance of working conditions is an essential part of the system of exploitation is disclosed by Mr. Rockefeller's testimony both before this commission and before the congressional committee as well as by his correspondence. This shows that he was familiar with such details as the building of churches on the C. F. & I. property, the hiring of Mr. Elbert Hubbard to carry on publicity work, the retaining of Mr. Ivy Lee at $1,000 a month, the existence of clergymen of socialistic views in the mining camps, the hiring of an automobile for imported clergymen in the mining district, and the payment of members of the militia out of the company's funds.

But as to wages and living conditions in general and especially as to the tyranny of the company over the thousands of men and women who are dependent on it, Mr. Rockefeller claims, and I believe his claim is true, that he kept himself in the most complete ignorance. In his testimony before the congressional committee he goes so far as to state that he was unaware of the existence of the slightest discontent on the part of the miners.

"Do you know," asked the chairman of the congressional investigating committee, "whether there are any grievances or any claimed by the miners out there?"

"Mr. ROCKEFELLER. By our miners? No.

"The CHAIRMAN. No grievances at all?

"Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Not that I know of."

This statement Mr. Rockefeller practically repeated in his testimony before this commission on Tuesday, January 26.

Ignorance on the part of the actual controlling interest of an industrial corporation and the delegation of full responsibility to the management at the plant, becomes an asset to business under the present system of absentee control. It works to the advantage of both Mr. Rockefeller, using him merely as an illustration, and of Mr. Welborn. For Mr. Rockefeller is protected because he can plead ignorance of actual conditions, and Mr. Welborn is protected because he can maintain that his first duty is toward the company.

This is exactly what happens not only in Colorado, but in almost every similar situation.

For instance, the strike at Carteret, N. J., is a particularly pertinent example. The Liebig and Clark & Williams plants at Carteret are subsidiaries of the American Agricultural Chemical Co., a combination incorporated under the laws of Connecticut. The chairman of the board of directors lives in Boston. The vice presidents live in New York, in New Jersey, and in Cleveland, Ohio, and the directors are scattered all over the country. One of them, Mr. A. Barton Hepburn, is a director of the Rockefeller Foundation. Last October the directors informed the local superintendent, whom I know, and whom I believe is an intelligent and decent man, that wages of the employees should be cut 20 per cent.

In January the employees decided that they could not continue to support their families on $1.60 a day. They struck, and next day, in order to protect the property of the company 100 gunmen were sent for and sworn in as deputy sheriffs. The result of the importation of these gunmen in Jersey was practically the same as that of Mr. Welborn's importation of gunmen into the coal fields of Colorado. On the 19th of January, O'Brien's gunmen shot into a mass of unarmed strikers and kept on shooting for 15 minutes, although the strikers fled and offered no resistance. Again using Mr. Rockefeller merely as a type of absentee landlord, his innocence of knowledge of conditions upon the property gives him the privilege of appearing before the public as free from responsibility for the atrocities in Colorado as Little Eva in Uncle Tom's Cabin was guiltless of the acts of Simon Legree.

Mr. Rockefeller before your commission has again and again emphasized his appreciation of the fact that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was making unsatisfactory financial returns upon his father's investment. He has demonstrated clearly his belief that his father's money under Welborn's management was not yielding enough. He says it has only paid a savings-bank percentage. Counting the actual dividends which the Rockefellers chose to take out of the company, this is technically true. But it is far from true that Mr. Welborn's management was weak in regard to the annual earnings, which were put back in the company in the form of surpluses.

Moody's Manual shows, just as Mr. Rockefeller, jr., states, that preferred dividends were not paid until 1912 and 1913, when 5 per cent and 43 per cent were declared, respectively. But it also shows that in 1910, 1911, 1912, and 1913, the company earned and carried forward as surplus over charges $1,500,000, $1,200,000, $1,800,000, and 1,700,000, respectively. This is a remarkable tribute to Mr. Welborn's efficiency in getting profits out of a concern which not long ago was in a deplorable financial condition. It is also a testimonial to the business acumen of the controlling interest that chose and retained Mr. Welborn in the position of managing president and gave him a free hand to do anything he liked at the plant.

In its analysis of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Moody's Manual for 1914 remarks upon its progress during the last five years in strengthening its finances and adding to its available revenues.

It continues: "The surplus which the company has recently been showing has now accumulated to such an extent that the company is in a position to pay back unpaid dividends on the preferred stock, and during the fiscal year ending last June, 43 per cent of these back dividends were paid, leaving about 29 per cent still to pay. It is probable that with another year's business equaling that of 1913 the company will have no difficulty in paying the remainder of these back dividends and will be in a position to disburse moderate payments on the large common-stock issue." As a matter of fact, the next year was a bad year, on account of the strike, and showed a deficit, instead of a surplus, of, I think, about $800,000.

The next question that was asked me was: "What is your opinion as to the influence of large donations by the Rockefeller or other foundations on schools and universities?"

My answer, Mr. Chairman, is nothing more powerful and subtle than the influence of such donations upon institutions whose existence is largely dependent on donations.

Some years ago an arms company offered the Audubon Society of America a large annual income for a stated period for protecting birds. As I remember it was $25,000 a year. The arms company imposed absolutely no conditions, and, in the letter offering the money, it expressly stated that it did not seek to hamper the activity of the association, although it hoped—merely hoped—that the association would not take a position hostile to repeating shotguns for the purposes of killing game.

After considerable controversy, the association decided that the feeling of gratitude which its directors would naturally have toward the arms company, and their natural desire that the donation should be continued beyond the period stated, would inevitably have a very real influence upon their future attitude. The gift was rejected, with thanks. I have since heard members of the association state very frankly that they thought they had a narrow escape from losing a considerable degree of liberty.

In spite of every good intention, we can not get away from the fact that when we accept large benefits from anybody we want to pay for them, and we also want to act so that the benefits will continue. And in this very creditable desire to pay one's way, as well as in the expectation of more benefits, in the future lies the danger to independence.

Some cynic has described gratitude as a lively sense of more favors to come.

The Rockefeller Foundation is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York with a charter so broad as to include almost every human activity. On the other hand, its control is absolutely a Rockefeller control. A majority of its directors are men who are or have been employed by Mr. Rockefeller, and who have publicly expressed the opinion that the Rockefeller system, as exemplified in the Colorado coal fields, is a high expression of American industrialism. The Rockefeller Foundation has an immense annual income, which will probably average about $5,000,000. The General Education Board, whose report has just been published, is also a Rockefeller concern. Into the treasury of the board Mr. Rockefeller has paid $53,000,000, a part of which was in bonds of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Assuming that the Rockefeller Foundation, as well as the General Education Board, may have to do with educational matters as well as investigations, I can see a grave danger in the acceptance by universities, schools, and institutions of donations upon a large scale from such sources.

Take, for example, the influence upon courses of economics in schools, colleges, and universities. Suppose a young instructor of economics were giving a course of lectures upon industrial production and the relations between capital and labor. It is natural that in his lectures he would want to go very fully into such subjects as price-fixing monopolies, the recognition of unions, collective bargaining, etc. He might analyze production under the private monopoly system and expose its dangers to consumer, to industry, and to labor. Again he might give his frank opinion of the results of absentee landlordism and of the whole structure of undemocracy and concentrated absolutism which companies like the C. F. & I. and the United States Steel Corporation have inaugurated and successfully maintained throughout their plants.

Now, what I say is this: The gratitude which the faculty and trustees of a university ought to feel to an instructor who showed the students the utter unsoundness of production under a system of absolutism might seriously conflict with the gratitude which they could not but feel toward those whose gifts were making the university prosperous and useful.

I say that this instructor who treated with frankness and intelligence the economic system for which the directors of the educational board and the foundation stand would find himself in a peculiar position. He would gradually realize that, somehow or other, through nobody's fault perhaps, there had arisen a feeling of strain, or at least, a lack of sympathy between himself and the members of the faculty and the trustees, whose duty it was to care for the university's financial well-being. Sooner or later he would become convinced that full appreciation of his efforts in this particular college or university had been rendered exceedingly improbable. His chances of a Sabbatical year, the acceptance by the university of his lecture courses as textbooks, the probability that he would be sent to represent the university at important conferences—these and many other things would seem to have become more remote, because he had committed the error of preaching a doctrine hostile to the sources from which the university had drawn and probably would continue to draw large and necessary sums of money.

Mr. Chairman, I speak advisedly and after some inquiry when I say that the smaller colleges of this country are full of instructors and professors who have not been deliberately driven from larger universities on account of economic opinions unfriendly to benevolent exploiters in industry, but who nevertheless have found their chairs in the large universities untenable, and have left them owing to influences which were irresistible but too subtle to complain about aloud.

I do not say that this has been anything in the nature of a conspiracy on the part of the interests who give millions, but the ever-present and powerful spirit of acquisition, which is an integral part of the consciousness of our monopolistic combinations, has moved instinctively along logical, self-protective lines.

In 1815, when Metternich saddled Austria, Prussia, and Bavaria with a system of feudal absolutism, his powerful weapon against the spread of what he called "revolutionary ideas" was control of education by vigilant censorship of universities. The decree of the conference at Carlsbad provided that this censorship, and now I quote, "without directly interfering with scientific matters, should give salutary direction to instruction, having in view the future attitude of the students." Thus Metternich guided the thought of the rising generation so that the young men who graduated from universities should be free from the talat of democracy.

The Rockefeller Foundation and the education board are doing to-day, less openly but quite as effectively, what Metternich did in 1815. They are providing to the best of their ability, conscientiously if you will but none the less effectively, that our young men in the course of their education shall gain as little understanding as possible of the problems of industrial democracy. To-day, Mr. Chairman, our universities are teaching practically nothing in the realm of up-to-date economics. To-day they choose to deal with issues which are dust-dry, which are dead, and have already passed into the region of history.

But we need not go back to 1815 to find examples of the control of thought by influence exerted over educational institutions. The militarist movement in Germany offers a still more vivid illustration. For 20 years official Germany has been instilling into the people the necessity for a world-wide extension of German institutions. The writings of von Bernhardi and Treitschke carry one message, and that message is the duty of exercising power that rests upon those who are fit for power. That is the bottom of militarism—of a doctrine utterly and diametrically opposed to democracy. In order to carry forward the militarist gospel so that Germany would accept the theory that it was her destiny to impose German kultur upon the world, with a powerful but benevolent hand, the Government directed its attention toward the universities. It saw to it that the men who held the principal chairs of economics and history should be in sympathy with its policy.

When we read of the expenditure of $57,000,000 by the General Education Board, when we think of the annual expenditure of $5,000,000 by the Rockefeller Foundation, our minds irresistibly compare the probable results of this, in its relation to things industrial, with the known results of the activities of Metternich and of the German militarists in the field of things political.

A few days ago, Prof. Ross, of Wisconsin, speaking of our great foundations, said: "Thousands of experiences have shown the tendency of boards to administer a charitable foundation in a narrow or class spirit or according to obsolete ideas or exploded theories."

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will adjourn until Monday morning at 10 o'clock. I desire to announce that, on account of the other uses to which these two rooms in this building will be put so incessantly during the coming week, the further hearings of the commission will take place at the Metropolitan Building, No. 1 Madison Avenue, in the assembly hall, on the eleventh floor. We will adjourn to meet at the Metropolitan Building at 10 o'clock Monday morning.

(Thereupon, at 1.05 o'clock p. m., on this Saturday, January 30, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock Monday morning, February 1, 1915, to meet in the assembly hall in the Metropolitan Building, New York City.)

NEW YORK CITY, February 1, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Welstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in order. We will proceed now. Mr. Pinchot, will you please resume the stand?

TESTIMONY OF MR. AMOS PINCHOT—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed now.

Mr. PINCHOT. When I stopped reading on Saturday, Mr. Chairman. I was quoting the statement of Prof. Ross, of Wisconsin, which he made last week—I think it was the early part of last week—in regard to the Rockefeller and other foundations. He said:

"Thousands of experiences have shown the tendencies of boards to administer a charitable foundation in a narrow or class spirit or according to obsolete ideas or exploded theories. To make these foundations safe, the whole basis of control should be changed."

That is the end of his quotation. [Reading:]

"It seems to me that, if these great foundations are allowed to exist, one of the problems of this commission is to suggest a means of control which will, to some extent, insure their being used in the interest of the public and in accordance with democratic principles."

The next question which was asked me by the commission was: "What suggestion can you make looking toward the more peaceful settlement of industrial disputes?"

My answer is: There are many things which can be done to facilitate a more equitable adjustment of the questions arising between capital and labor. I have mentioned collective bargaining as a fundamental principle which is to be insisted on at this time. Discontinuance by the operators of the practice of using irresponsible private armies will also help.

But there is one matter which seems to me of immense importance. Labor should be able to feel that its side of the controversy will be fully and fairly treated in the public press.

In my opinion there is no one element, not even the attitude of the often isolated and ignorant controllers of industrial corporations, which gives labor a feeling of such helplessness and bitterness as its knowledge that the merits of its side of the question will not be presented to the public through the press. When I speak of the press, I refer to the newspapers in general, and particularly to one of the great news associations, whose business it is to furnish information to the newspapers.

There are two major news furnishing associations—the Associated Press and the United Press. The former sells news chiefly to morning newspapers, the latter to evening papers. The United Press is conducted by a group of younger men who have a broader attitude toward industrial questions, and who usually give fair treatment to both sides in their reports of conflicts between labor and capital, but the Associated Press, under older and more conservative management, take affirmatively the side of capital.

I was informed by a representative citizen of Colorado, himself a newspaper man of high standing and a subscriber to the Associated Press, that the failure of the Associated Press to carry news impartially in the labor troubles was a serious element in giving the strikers the feeling that they could not hope for justice.

Last year in the strike which occurred in the soft-coal districts of West Virginia the Associated Press gave characteristic evidence of its partiality to the operators side of the case. I will mention one instance, which is typical.

Early in February an armored train, later described in the testimony before the Senate investigating commission as the "Death Special," was run during the night through the tent colony of strikers at Holly Grove, W. Va. It was 10 o'clock, and the miners were just going to bed, when suddenly the armored train poured a heavy fire from rifles and machine guns into the tents with fatal effects. I quote now from the testimony of Lee Calvin before the Senate committee. He was on the armored train in the capacity of a guard and at the invitation of the sheriff of the county. He says:

"It came down to Charleston for us and we got on the train, about 9 or maybe 10, some where around there, and went on up to Palmt Creek, * * * and I was leaning out of the window that way [indicating] and they commenced streaming fire out of the baggage car—you know—flashes, reports, and cracks from the machine gun at a lot of tents, and the train went along with a stream of fire, which continued coming out of the Gatling gun all along."

That is the end of the part of the testimony of Mr. Calvin that I have quoted.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The testimony presented where?

Mr. PINCHOT. Before the committee of the Senate of the investigation of the strike in Michigan [West Virginia] in what they called the Calumet & Hecla group of mines. [Mr. Pinchot corrects this reference below.]

Mrs. Estep, one of the miner's wives, who with her husband and family was going to bed at the time shooting began, described the incident as follows:

"We heard the train come shooting, and he hollered for us to go to the cellar, and he (her husband) went out the front door. Him and some more boys that were in there, they ran out of the front door and I went through the kitchen, and I never got any farther than the kitchen door. We were all trying to get to the cellar. He was standing right at the corner of the cellar near the kitchen door where I was standing, hollering for me to go and get into the cellar."

That is the end of the quotation. At this point her husband was killed and some members of her family were wounded. The whole matter was fully covered by the investigation, and the accuracy of the evidence of both Calvin and Mrs. Estep was fully established.

An examination of 12 leading papers carrying Associated Press dispatches shows that the Associated Press reported the matter as if the miners had made an unwarranted attack upon a passenger train. I quote from one Associated Press dispatch in the Los Angeles Times:

"The first serious outbreak in over a month occurred Friday (the 7th) when a passenger train was fired on. Mucklow was riddled with bullets and a number of persons shot down."

The commission can find this in the Los Angeles Times, Associated Press dispatch for February 11, 1913, page 1, column 1.

I also desire to call the commission's attention to another typical instance of suppression and perversion of news by the Associated Press in regard to labor troubles.

In December, 1913, a great strike was in progress in the copper mines of Michigan.

I would like to correct what I said a moment ago. You asked me where the testimony appeared concerning the Mucklow incident, and I said it appeared in the investigation before the Senate committee that investigated the Michigan strike. I was speaking of the West Virginia strike, of course. The word "Michigan" was a mistake.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see.

Mr. PINCHOT. On December 26, Charles H. Moyer, president of the Western Federation of Miners, was kidnaped from his hotel and shot in the back by a committee of citizens representing the mine operators. Moyer's account of the shooting, which was substantiated by the evidence before the congressional investigating committee—this was not a senatorial committee at this time; it was a committee of the House which Congressman McDonald instigated—is as follows:

"I had taken down the telephone receiver to telephone a friend when the mob entered the room. They shouted, 'Where is Moyer?' I turned around and told them I was Moyer. Then they attacked me. I was struck on the head with an automatic revolver. I was leaning forward, and the man with the revolver stood over me. When he hit my head the revolver exploded and the bullet entered my back. Then the crowd began to go mad. I was dragged from the room, down the stairs, and out into the street. Frequent changes were made of the men dragging me along, when two had exhausted themselves in kicking me in the back and beating me, two others would grab my arms and begin upon me anew. This kept up until we reached the Houghton depot. The mob kept shouting 'Kill him! Hang him! Throw him into the lake!'

Moyer was then put on the train. He found himself in charge of guards, who he says had instructions to kill him if he tried to get off. The Associated Press's account of this, as sent out under the date of December 26 and published in the Chicago Record-Herald on December 27, page 4, is as follows:

"Charles H. Moyer, president of the Western Federation of Miners, was put on a train and sent out of the copper country strike district to-night. It is believed he will go to Chicago. Moyer, it is said, refused to make a retraction satisfactory to the committee. A short time later he and John Tanner, an organizer of the Western Federation, were observed on a street car going from Hancock to Houghton. Just across the bridge connecting the two towns, and about 400 feet from the structure, is the depot of the copper-range railroad. There it was noticed that Moyer and his companion boarded a train bound for Chicago. They were accompanied by three men who seemed to be guarding them, although there was no visible demonstration of force or coercion."

That is the account which the Associated Press sent out of the shooting and the deportation of Moyer.

Both in the West Virginia and Michigan strikes the Associated Press grossly misrepresented the real condition of affairs. This was due in part to the fact that in West Virginia it got its information from a man identified with the coal companies, while in Michigan, during a large part of the strike, the Associated Press received its information from two newspaper offices controlled by the mine operators. They had no man there of their own during a large part of the strike, but got their information from two newspaper offices which belonged to the mine operators. But whatever the machinery may have been through which suppression and misrepresentation occurred, the fact remains that it did occur, and that it resulted in blinding the public to the actual facts until congressional investigations brought them out. It also produced, upon the part of the strikers, a feeling of intense and natural bitterness, and a belief that the merits of their cause would never be fully brought before the American people.

I have quoted this, showing these dispatches, because I think they represent cases that are typical, because most of the cases of misrepresentation and suppression have been less easy to demonstrate. But these two cases are so plain that I thought they ought to be in the record. And with regard to that I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that in all probability the testimony which I give in regard to the Associated Press will not be carried throughout the country by the Associated Press wires. There is a rule, which I believe is contained in the by-laws of the Associated Press, that any newspaper editor, people that subscribe to the Associated Press, will be disciplined if he prints as news in his paper matter that is deemed derogatory to the Associated Press.

I believe that it is of the highest importance that an investigation should be conducted by this commission or some similar body into the handling of news in labor controversies. The influence of public opinion can only be justly exerted when the public is put in possession of the facts.

The next question which the commission asked me was: "Do you believe that the solution to industrial troubles is through the Government taking a larger part in industrial life?"

My answer is: I do not believe that either the city, the State, or the Federal Government should go into industrial production. Industrial production should be conducted by private concerns. I believe in competition in industry. I do not hold with either monopolist or socialist, for both advocate the elimination of competition in industry. In order to have competition in industry, which spells efficiency, we must make transportation and the raw materials which are the basis of industry accessible to all on equal terms. That is why I advocate Government ownership of railroads and Government ownership of natural resources, with a leasing system such as is now in practice with regard to water power on Federal property. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. I notice, Mr. Pinchot, that the rule that you say the Associated Press has does not appear in the written answers. Will you repeat that rule?

Mr. PINCHOT. I could not repeat it verbatim, Mr. Chairman, but there is a rule that the members of the Associated Press, the newspapers which belong to the Associated Press throughout the country, are subject to discipline and the loss of the Associated Press franchise if they publish matter which the Associated Press governors, directors, deem to be derogatory or unjustifiable.

Chairman WALSH. Well, has that rule been admitted by the Associated Press any place?

Mr. PINCHOT. It has.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a record of it?

Mr. PINCHOT. I know of members of the Associated Press who have been disciplined. Mr. Medill McCormick, who was part owner of the Chicago Tribune, was disciplined for publishing matter in the Associated Press which the governors of the Associated Press deemed derogatory.

Chairman WALSH. What character of matter was it?

Mr. PINCHOT. I do not remember the particular case, Mr. Chairman. It is some time since Mr. McCormick described the incident to me.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been a public record made any place in any investigation in which the rule of the Associated Press has been set out?

Mr. PINCHOT. Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is. Last year Mr. Shearn, now Justice Shearn, was counsel for the New York Sun in the complaint which was laid before the Department of Justice in Washington, and that complaint, which Mr. Shearn handed in in the form of a written brief, contains the matter which you speak of.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be kind enough, inasmuch as you have referred to it, to ascertain where it can be obtained and, if possible, submit it to the commission?

Mr. PINCHOT. I have one copy myself, which I will submit to you, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

(A pamphlet entitled "The Freedom of the Press from Unlawful Restraints and Monopoly," in the matter of the complaint of the Sun Printing & Publishing Association against the Associated Press, being a statement of facts addressed to the Hon. James C. McReynolds, Attorney General of the United States, was subsequently submitted by Mr. Pinchot in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. That is all. You will be permanently excused. We are very much obliged to you for your attendance.

Mr. PINCHOT. Thank you, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. James MacKaye.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JAMES MacKAYE.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in perfect order—the entire house. We can not proceed until all discussion at the end of the hall is ended and there is perfect quiet.

Please state your name.

Mr. MacKAYE. James MacKaye.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, Mr. MacKaye?

Mr. MacKAYE. Engineer.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of engineer?

Mr. MacKAYE. Chemical engineer.

Chairman WALSH. Chemical engineer?

Mr. MacKAYE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. MacKAYE. Cambridge, Mass.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived at Cambridge, Mass.?

Mr. MacKAYE. About 20 years.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state definitely what branch of that profession you have practiced—that is, in what line and what your work has been, say, for the past 10 years.

Mr. MacKAYE. It has been in the investigation and development of industrial chemical processes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, please explain fully the nature of it, where you do your work, and the general character of it.

Mr. MacKAYE. The work is done largely in the laboratory or laboratories, and where investigations are required we, of course, use reference books, etc. Most of the work is carried on in the laboratory.

Chairman WALSH. Aside from your laboratory work, have you made any study of industrial problems?

Mr. MacKAYE. I have.

Chairman WALSH. Please state what study you have made, how extensive it has been along that line?

Mr. MacKAYE. It has been mostly in the nature of reading about them, and making an attempt to apply the engineering method to them.

Chairman WALSH. Please state with what concerns you have been connected, and what industries you have done engineering work for in the strict line of your profession.

Mr. MacKAYE. Practically all of the time with the firm of Stone & Webster.

Chairman WALSH. What is their business?

Mr. MacKAYE. Engineering in general, mostly electrical engineering.

Chairman WALSH. For what concerns do they do work?

Mr. MacKAYE. Well, so many different ones that it would be difficult to enumerate them, but I could give you a book that enumerates them—there are 60 or 70 under their control.

Chairman WALSH. In order that we may get a little better opinion during this testimony, please state what the large concerns are, whether they are transportation companies throughout the United States, and control, if any, that the concern has over those.

Mr. MacKAYE. They are connected largely with water power. They are popularly classed as one of the members of the so-called water-power trust, I suppose. Their largest concern in that line is at Keokuk, Iowa, where they have dammed the Mississippi River. They have large electrical interests in Oregon, Washington, Florida, Georgia, Massachusetts, Texas, and other States. They are interested particularly in electrical properties, transportation, lighting, and power; but, of course, Mr. Chairman, I am not here as their representative, you understand.

Chairman WALSH. I understand that.

Mr. MacKAYE. It is entirely in my individual capacity that I am here.

Chairman WALSH. I understand; but we would like to get the information gained by your experience, and the access that you have had to institutions that might stimulate your research along those lines personally, and that might give you the experience.

Mr. MacKAYE. I do not think that anything I have to say can acquire authority from any of their operations. With the management of such operations I have had nothing to do, as my capacity is entirely technical.

Chairman WALSH. Have you, as a result of your study, worked out a constructive plan, deemed by you to be of value in connection with the labor policies and methods of large corporations?

Mr. MacKAYE. I have a plan that would be along that general line.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please explain this plan to the commission?

Mr. MacKAYE. With your permission I will read the plan, because it is rather specific.

Chairman WALSH. Very good; please do so.

Mr. MacKAYE (reading):

SUGGESTION OF A METHOD FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS THROUGH COMPETITION BY PUBLICLY CONTROLLED COMPETITORS.

The method outlined herein for regulating industrial relations between employers, employees, and the public is applicable to all large-scale competitive industries, and may be extended to public monopolies. To determine its efficacy experimentally it should preferably be applied simultaneously in several industries of widely differing types, although much could be learned from its application to a single industry. Such an isolated experiment, however, would deprive the method of the advantageous interindustrial relations which are a proper part of it.

The method in brief is to establish, in all lines of industry to be regulated, competing and self-supporting industries, chartered by the Federal Government, and operating under regulations adapted to secure the greatest possible benefit to producers and consumers, these industries to be a means of establishing standards by which competing industries may be judged, and to which, if desired, they may be made to conform, either by extending sufficiently the competition of standard industries or by prescribing by law standard conditions of competition.

The method involves the following features, subject to such modification and extension as experience may suggest:

The appointment by the President of a commission to assume general charge of the work.

The creation by the commission, in each line of industry which they may select for regulation, of at least one large scale standard establishment or enterprise. In establishing these enterprises the commission should have the benefit of such expert advice as they may deem well to secure.

The appointment by the commission of proper officers to carry on the affairs of each such establishment, including a treasurer, a works manager, and a sales manager, or their equivalents.

The charter of each such establishment to be in the name of the officers specified as charter grantees.

The issue by the United States of bonds in amounts to be determined by the commission, subject to the control of Congress, sufficient to finance each of said enterprises.

The operation of each standard unit of industry should be open to inspection and study by the commission, and subject to the following 10 conditions of control:

(1) The fixing of minimum wages and salaries of operatives, including those of the grantees, either by a statistical board or expert of the Bureau of Labor or by the commission. The wages and salaries so fixed to be those current in the given industry for the same class of service, and to be varied only as said current wages and salaries vary.

(2) The fixing of maximum prices by the same or a corresponding board or expert or by the commission, said prices to be those current in the given industry for the same classes of product or service, and to be varied only as may be necessary to maintain competition.

(3) The prescription and enforcement by the commission of regulations fixing standards of products or service in each establishment.

(4) The prescription by the commission of regulations relative to safety, sanitation, and working conditions in general throughout each establishment.

(5) Probably, but not necessarily, the prescription by the commission of regulations governing the employment, promotion, and discharge of operatives, constituting a sort of civil-service system.

(6) The establishment of reserves for contingencies for the purpose of preventing excessive fluctuations of operating and maintenance expenditures.

(7) The establishment of mutual reserve deficit insurance between the several standard establishments to prevent the occurrence or minimize the amount of deficits resulting from causes beyond the control of the grantees.

(8) The establishment of mutual facilities for the transfer of operatives between the several standard establishments to prevent or minimize the discharge of competent operatives through unavoidable fluctuations in the demand for their services.

(9) The payment into the Treasury of the United States by each establishment, at the close of each fiscal year, of 6 per cent of its bonded indebtedness to meet interest and sinking-fund charges.

This is the most important section, Mr. Chairman—The division (either equal or in some other definite proportion) at the close of each fiscal year of any surplus, after all charges have been met, between the operatives of the establishment, including the grantees, and the customers thereof; each operative to receive a share of the operatives' allotment proportionate to his wage or salary, and each customer a share of the customers' allotment, proportionate to his purchases, during the fiscal year in question.

The advantages of the establishment of such standard industries are of three kinds—advantages of operation, of regulation, and of information.

The principal advantages in operation would be as follows:

Capital is procurable at a low rate of interest.

Thorough inspection by the commission of books, operations, products, and services is possible, subject to no harassing restrictions.

There is no conflict of interest between employers in the persons of the grantees and other operatives, because, in the first place, all have a common economic interest in making the surplus in each establishment as large as possible, and, in the second place, because the fixation of wages is removed from the control of the grantees.

There is no conflict of interest between producer and consumer in any matter affectable by the former, because, in the first place, they have a common economic interest in making the surplus in each establishment as large as possible, and, in the second place, because the fixation of prices, as of wages, is removed from the control of the grantees, leaving to them the sole function of directing the purely productive and distributive operations of the establishment.

The principle illustrated in the foregoing plan as modified particularly by conditions 1, 2, and 3 providing for control of production and sale by interested persons (the charter grantees) and the control of wages, prices, and quality of products by different and disinterested persons, I call the principle of divided economic function, because it divides these several functions of conducting industry (which under the present system are combined) in a manner essential to harmonious industrial relations.

The principle illustrated in condition 10 providing for the division of the annual surplus between producers and consumers I call the principle of conditional or proportional compensation, because it renders the compensation of the producer conditional upon and proportional to the service he renders the consumer.

By the adoption of these two principles the industrial relations which are most potent in producing the difficulties of modern industry—the relations which create the labor problem on the one hand and accentuate the problems of high prices on the other—are reversed. In place of a conflict is substituted an identity of interest of all parties concerned. Employer and employee pull together, because they have a common, substantial, and proportional interest in the efficient conduct of industry, and producer and consumer pull together for the same reason, since the method of organization so operates that, with given current wages and prices, the lower the actual price the higher the actual wage. Thus in place of the conflict inherent in the present industrial relations of the community, the method proposed substitutes not the neutral or indifferent relation characteristic of ordinary public operation but a relation actively reverse to that of conflict. By these devices the ordinary incentive of economic gain is made to result in an identity instead of an antagonism of interest throughout the community, and the way becomes open to combine the advantages and avoid the disadvantages of both the private and public methods of conducting economic operations and to convert the irrepressible conflicts of modern industry into equally irrepressible harmonies.

The principal advantages in regulation would be as follows:

The regulation would be through competition, and hence would have the advantages of that oldest and most natural form of regulation, a form which has operated since prehistoric times and is still in operation, though modified in considerable degree in modern industrial nations. The main advantage of the competitive form of regulation is that it is not arbitrary and tends to a natural equilibrium of industry through the law of supply and demand.

But competition, though having this advantage, has certain great disadvantages which can be eliminated by imposing proper restrictions, such as minimum wages, maximum hours of labor, safe and sanitary conditions of employment, and penalties for adulteration, misbranding, wasteful exploitation of natural resources, etc.

Such restrictions upon competition could, under the system proposed, be made uniform, applying to all units of an industry alike; that is, the competition could be made fair, the Government imposing no restrictions on any competitors of a charter grantee not imposed upon the grantee also, so that all would stand upon the same footing in these respects.

If it be objected that on account of certain advantages enjoyed by the charter grantees in virtue of their Government backing and their methods of operation the competition would not be fair to other operators not enjoying these advantages, the reply is that if, by means of the advantages cited, the charter grantees can serve the public interest better than their competitors, then to forbid their competition would be unfair to the public, since the public is entitled to the best and most efficient service it is possible to give it. Any other standard of fair competition is based on the view that the public exists for the benefit of industry, not industry for the benefit of the public.

By imposing restrictions thus uniformly the effect of the same upon industry could be directly observed in the units of industry operated by the charter grantees and thus the reasonableness or otherwise of the restrictions properly gauged. The justice of the complaints of those subject to restrictive industrial legislation could thus be estimated at its true value and modifications made accordingly.

Compared with other methods of regulation, particularly the common method of regulation by litigation practiced under the Sherman Law, the method proposed should be exceedingly cheap, because the charter grantees are self-supporting. Of course, it is conceivable that during some time of widespread and long-continued depression in industry, even deficit insurance would not prevent the occurrence of deficits in the business of the charter grantees, and thus the Government would become a loser through being the creditor of bankrupt concerns. But it is far more likely that during such times the establishments of the charter grantees not being subject to the disease known as "the timidity of capital," would tend to steady industry in general and thus forestall, or at least diminish, the severity of depressions. If sufficiently extended they would certainly have this effect.

There are, however, plenty of precedents for the risk of public money in order to perform a public service. The money invested in the Panama Canal, the Federal reclamation projects, and the Alaskan Railroad are examples. Forty-odd years ago the Government even issued loans to privately owned enterprises—the Central and Union Pacific Railroads—on the same principle. At any rate the method of regulation proposed merely substitutes a risk for a certainty of expense, since the adoption of alternative methods does not offer even the possibility of self-supporting regulation.

The advantages accruing from increased information would be the most important of all—some of the principal being as follows:

First-hand and detailed knowledge could be acquired of various factors in industry and their effect upon the welfare of both producers and consumers. Among them may be mentioned the effect of properly directed incentives, the working of efficiency schemes, such as those of scientific management under conditional compensation, the relation between size of unit and efficiency in various industries, the part played in efficiency by industrial training, the advantages of separating financial and certain other functions from productive functions in industry, the extent to which conditional compensation renders efficiency automatic, etc.

Under the conditions proposed it would be possible for the first time to fairly test a rule that, in theory, is supposed to guide the economic conduct of nations, but which can not be applied on any extensive scale for lack of data. I refer to the rule that whatever economic function in a nation can be performed best by the public should be assumed by the public, while whatever functions can be performed best by private enterprise should be left to private control. In order that this rule can be used we must have in the first place tests of what is "best" that shall include all aspects of the public interest, and shall not mean merely what is cheapest; and in the second place we must have a means of comparing the two modes of operation on even terms. Such a comparison can be made by causing public and private methods of operation to compete with one another under prescribed conditions of fair competition—an experiment not hitherto attempted on an extended scale.

The running ability of two men can not be compared if one runs on a track in running togs while the other runs in a crowded street carrying a heavy bag. No more can the ability to serve the public of two methods of operation be compared when the conditions under which they operate are not comparable. In the one case as in the other the competitors must be subject to the same restrictions or the result will not be conclusive.

Operation by charter grantees under the conditions specified has all the characteristics of the best present methods of public operation, except that it includes the devices of divided function and conditional compensation; devices adapted to remedy the inadequate incentive of public, and the misdirected incentive of private, operations.

Thus public operation at its best and private operation at its best could be compared on equal terms in a great variety of industries over a term of years sufficiently extended to give conclusive results. The two methods of operation should be tested by a variety of tests, including the relative success of the two methods in securing low prices, good quality of products, high wages, favorable working conditions, and efficiency generally, security of employment, progressiveness, economical use of natural resources, freedom from political corruption, development of good citizenship in operatives and other results representing the various aspects of the public interest.

By careful study and experiment along these lines, modifications in procedure being made as experience indicated the wisdom thereof, a body of knowledge could be secured which would enable the nation to find its way out of the economic wilderness in which it is wandering, and to deliberately adopt the method found to be best as a means of satisfying the material requirements of the people. It is not too much to hope that the practical abolition of poverty itself would eventually result from such a course of investigation, for, in the present condition of applied science, such a goal is not an unreasonable one to seek.

Research in the direction and by the means indicated, is likely to lead within a few years to one or the other of two national policies: Either a system of regulation in which competition will be maintained on a beneficent basis throughout industry, through the competition of merger-proof standard units of industry backed by the public; or to a gradual displacement of private operation in those industries least adapted to private operation, and their replacement by public industry. As to which of these results is the more likely to occur we can not at present definitely say. The evidence now available is not conclusive; but so far as I am able to estimate it the second result appears somewhat the more probable of the two.

Indeed, it seems rather likely that should the policy suggested be adopted by the United States, the present economic system would gradually develop into a central group of great nationalized industries, surrounded by a zone of regulated private industry, probably destined to dwindle relatively if not absolutely. At any rate, whatever system resulted from such a policy, it would not be founded on the dreams of Utopians or the dogmas of doctrinaires. It would be based, not on any theory, but on the carefully studied experiences of a nation which first takes deliberate steps to secure the evidence and then follows it; adopting the socialistic or democratic method of conducting industry where it is found to be best, and not adopting it where it is not found to be best. The test of actual practice deciding in each case whether the people shall attend to their own business or let private parties attend to it for them.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any questions to ask, Commissioner Weinstock?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What did you mean by the private parties?

Mr. MACKEY. I meant parties who are not responsible to the public through any machinery of democracy, such as the President of the United States, for instance, is responsible. I referred to directors of corporations, railroad or otherwise, and persons in like positions.

Chairman WALSH. I just have a few question that I would like to ask you about one or two points. You say that the study might be made of the manner of conducting industrial enterprises by the public and by private activity. Are there any such conditions existing in the United States to-day? Are there any industries so closely connected, geographically, as to the work of the industry itself, that the study could be made at the present time?

Mr. MACKEY. It could not be made on even terms so far as I am informed by any comparison now possible. Approximate results might be obtained, but nothing that would be conclusive.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, then, what would have to be done according to your idea, before conditions could be made for such a study, and would the whole plan have to be put in operation?

Mr. MACKEY. No; it could be applied in one or in a few industries.

Chairman WALSH. For instance?

Mr. MACKEY. I submitted to Mr. Manly, for submission to the commission, a plan specifically adapted to the Alaskan situation, in which these general methods are applied to the competition in the coal-mining industry in Alaska, and to the public monopoly in the Alaskan Railroad. This will indicate where a beginning might be made. But, of course, it might be made in other place also. Alaska, however, would appear to be a particularly favorable situation because of the control that the Government already has there.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed an operation of the municipally owned street railways in the city of San Francisco?

Mr. MACKEY. I have read the report issued by the Government on that matter, but I have not observed it directly.

Chairman WALSH. What reason would there be why the study could not be made in a situation of that kind, where a reasonably large mileage of street railway, urban transportation, was in the hands of the municipality, while a very large amount was still in the hands of private ownership?

Mr. MACKEY. An approximate comparison could be made. But I think that in the case of railroads that are adapted particularly to private monopoly the opportunity for comparison by competition would not be as good as in a mining or manufacturing industry.

Chairman WALSH. Is there no instance that your attention has been called to in the United States in those industries where a comparative study might be made with any benefit to the Government?

Mr. MACKEYE. Some specific instances which would be particularly favorable?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; and the study approximately favorable where the proper deductions have been made.

Mr. MACKEYE. I think that the best place would be in the coal-mining industry; but this is not a very carefully considered judgment, as I have not studied that particular matter very much.

Chairman WALSH. I note that you speak that there was a great variety of industries in which the plan could be readily worked out, and I thought I might ask you to state in a general way what those industries were and if your plan, for instance, could be put into operation aside from mining.

Mr. MACKEYE. I think it could be put in operation in any large-scale manufacturing or mining industry, and by the proper modifications could be applied to agriculture. Of course, it can always be applied to transportation systems and to public monopolies in general.

Chairman WALSH. You, I believe, have turned over to us a more elaborate consideration and statement of your plans?

Mr. MACKEYE. There is a more specifically stated plan in the printed copy of the Alaskan bill, which I have just referred to.

Chairman WALSH. And is that the matter that you have turned over to the commission? It came up on Saturday and I did not have a chance to personally examine it, and I do not know that the other commissioners have.

Mr. MACKEYE. That is the matter; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now please describe in a general way what that is that you turned over to the commission.

Mr. MACKEYE. It is the application of the general plan, which I have just read to you, to the Alaskan Railroad and to the mining of coal in Alaska.

Chairman WALSH. Would you kindly pass me that paper. [Paper handed to the chairman.] I will ask you first, in your opinion, what changes in legislation would have to be made to put such a general plan in operation in the United States?

Mr. MACKEYE. General plan?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MACKEYE. A general plan would have to follow—it would seem to me it would have to follow the application of the plan to certain specific instances, in order to see how it would operate. In other words, it should go through a preliminary stage.

A bill along the general lines of the Alaskan bill, applied to the railways in Alaska and the coal mines there, could be made to apply to any industry, only it would require a little modification, perhaps, in the financial handling of it, because in Alaska the Government already owns the land and the railway and would not have to purchase from private parties. This would not be the case where the plan was applied to many other industries where the Government would have to establish enterprises much as any private financier would do—only, of course, the Government could get capital at a lower rate than the financier.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made a study of the existing conditions in any industry in the United States so the plan might reasonably be expected to be put in operation without any change in the organic law of the State or Nation? For instance, your first suggestion was the appointment by the President of a commission to assume general charge of the work; that would require legislation, and does your plan as a whole contemplate any work to be done by this commission that would need any specific power from the people, in the way of a constitutional amendment, for instance?

Mr. MACKEYE. I am not lawyer enough to say just how that would be, in the case of the different industries, but I should say that if the Constitution permitted the present ship-purchase bill, permitted the Government to operate a coal mine, as I understand it does in Minnesota, and permitted it to operate other public utilities, such as the Alaskan Railroad, that it probably would permit it to operate almost any industry; but, of course, just what is constitutional and what is not can not be known, I suppose, until the Supreme Court has said something about it, and then perhaps it is not known.

Chairman WALSH. To start it, for instance, suppose an effort was made on the part of the Government to start in to-day to put the plan in operation, the first thing would be to at least consider those legal questions?

Mr. MacKAYE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, we do not know what the Supreme Court is going to decide, but there is an assumption that we are governmentally operating under both constitutional and common law, and perhaps an investigation might be made along those lines—the interpretation of our present laws that would give us at least an idea of whether we could do it; so the first approach would have to be thoughtfully studied out—a carefully studied out investigation as to the legal aspects of it?

Mr. MacKAYE. You would need the advice of lawyers to see just how to do it, of course.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any definite thought as to the creation of this commission, as to how it should be constituted, as to the particular lines it should work upon at once?

Mr. MacKAYE. I have not thought about how it should be constituted; I have not got as far as that. It should be composed of persons competent to study these particular matters, and the first thing it should do would be to make investigations along legal and other lines and to discover what industries it would be best to start experimentation upon.

Chairman WALSH. So that its first work would be of an investigatorial character almost exclusively?

Mr. MacKAYE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Would it require a very broad field of investigation? Have you given thought to how much work there would be to prepare the ground in investigating both the plan and the legal aspects that might be given it?

Mr. MacKAYE. I do not know just how to measure the amount of work that would be required. I do not know that I can give any definite idea. You can see yourself, as well as I, from my general description what would be required.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately. Is this a matter where the approach, we will say, to the beginning of definite work upon the plan would be a matter of months or a matter of years?

Mr. MacKAYE. I should think, if the commission would proceed diligently, it would be not more than six months or a year at the most.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. MacKaye; thank you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just a moment, please. I would like to ask a question.

Are you a Socialist, Mr. MacKaye?

Mr. MacKAYE. I call myself one.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson wants to ask a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. From your own consideration of this question, Mr. MacKaye, has it seemed to you that, provided the enterprises—semiprivate enterprises, which the Government has of various kinds in its history embarked upon—that what would be required would be special legislation in each instance of a permissive character rather than mandatory—that that is what would be necessary?

Mr. MacKAYE. In this case it would be mandatory from the commission, that is, they would have to establish these enterprises.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But permissive as to the enterprise?

Mr. MacKAYE. I suppose it would be best for Congress to take the advice of the commission as to the enterprise to apply the plan to, or else leave it to the commission to decide.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is your idea of the commission founded upon the original commission that was created to dig the canal?

Mr. MacKAYE. I had not that commission particularly in mind, but a similar commission would be perfectly suitable, I suppose.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. MacKaye.

Mr. John Mitchell.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN MITCHELL.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. MITCHELL. John Mitchell.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mount Vernon, N. Y.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am now a member of the New York State workmen's compensation commission.

Chairman WALSH. And prior to that time what positions have you held. I wish for the record you would sketch back from this time, say, for the last decade your activities either in the labor world or in industry.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I have held many positions, but principally from 1894 until 1908 I was active in the affairs of the United Mine Workers of America, having been its president from 1898 until 1908—a period of 10 years.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any connection with the United Mine Workers of America at the present time?

Mr. MITCHELL. I represent them as one of their delegates in conventions of the American Federation of Labor. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. I suppose during your term as president and in other executive positions you have held with that organization you have had much to do with the making of contracts with the United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And the maintenance of conditions under those contracts?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And investigations into those that had been violated by one side or the other, and such matters?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. So you have had a large first-hand knowledge of the mining industry, so far as it applies to the labor end of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, up until about seven years ago. It is nearly seven years since I retired from the presidency of the United Mine Workers of America; and for 15 years I was one of the vice presidents of the American Federation of Labor, and retired from that position a little over a year ago.

Chairman WALSH. Down to a year ago, then, you were still in close first-hand connection with these matters?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I would like to ask you first, Mr. Mitchell, if you have observed the effect of the creation of large corporations on the conditions of labor in American industry upon general industrial conditions?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; I have had some observance of the effects as to the formation of great combinations and the effect of those combinations on labor conditions in industry.

Chairman WALSH. Now, is the creating of large corporations improving the physical conditions under which workmen are employed, or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I should have to qualify my answer to that statement. Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. We wish, Mr. Mitchell, on account of your knowledge of this subject, that you would not confine yourself to the questions that we ask, but that anything that suggests itself to you growing out of or that you think would throw light upon our present investigation, that you would proceed at length?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, it has been largely—my own observation has been that it has been largely through the past 15 years that the great combinations of capital have come into being; that is to say, industry has been merged into great combinations within the past 15 years. The effect of these large combinations of capital and large control of industry has, in some instances, resulted in certain improvements in the conditions of employment, as, for instance, in the United States Steel Corporation. They have introduced systems of reducing accidents, of providing better sanitary conditions. On the other hand, the organization of these great combinations has tended to deprive the workman of what is to them their most fundamental right; that is, the right of association, the right of forming labor unions.

Now I do not want to detract one bit from the credit due great corporations for whatever good work they have done. On the contrary, I desire to give the fullest measure of credit to them for whatever good they have done. But I do say that the denial of the right of organization—I do say whatever improvements they have made in no way compensates the workingman for the deprival of their right of organization, because, gentlemen, in my judgment, there can be and there should be no permanent industrial peace unless that peace be founded upon industrial righteousness. And workmen can not be deprived of their right of organization and their right of collective bargaining except by depriving them of their right to attainment and happiness.

Now I understand one of the objects of the inquiry of this commission is to find the causes of industrial unrest. Of course I assume it is not intended that industrial unrest of itself is to be regretted; but, on the contrary, unrest may be and often is the most healthy sign of the times. I think that what is not only necessary, but inevitable, is a constructive healthy discontent among the people and among the workingmen; but that discontent must be a constructive discontent, a discontent which makes men want to build for better things, better homes, better citizenship, better civilization. Among organized workingmen I find that character of discontent, men who are striving for a gradual improvement of their conditions of life and labor; whereas among unorganized workingmen—that is, among those who are denied the right to organize—their discontent finds expression not in acts that make for constructive improvement, but it finds its expression in periodical rebellions and industrial revolutions, which is perhaps typified better in the strike of the workmen at Lawrence, at Paterson, at McKees Rocks, at Bethlehem, and in the coal fields of West Virginia, and in other places which I can not remember and which are not so well known to the public. But in all those great industrial outbreaks it was the denial of the right of association which led the men and women to go on strike. If these working men and women had been permitted to form trade-unions, had their employers recognized the regularly established unions of the trades, I dare say those conflicts would have been averted.

Now, among the great combinations of capital which come to my mind now, that have deprived the working people of their legal and moral right to organize, have been the American Woolen Co., which represents and controls the great woolen industry of the United States, the American Tobacco Co., the United States Steel Co.—these companies, particularly the United States Steel Co., making improvements in the sanitary conditions of their employees, have persisted in their opposition to the right of their workingmen to organize and to bargain collectively for the sale of their labor.

It seems to me, gentlemen, I repeat, that there can be no permanent industrial peace until workingmen have the right and exercise the right to collectively bargain with their employers for the sale of their labor. It does not matter that the head of some great corporation may be generous, that he may desire to improve the conditions of the working people. The working people are not satisfied with those gifts and benefactions which are given to them by their employers. What they want is not gifts; they want independence; they want security in their jobs—that reasonable security that makes them feel that they may not be dismissed from their employment without good cause, and that they can not have in the absence of united action.

The coal industry, with which I am most familiar, is, of course, an organized industry.

Chairman WALSH. Largely an organized industry?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; with the exceptions of Colorado, West Virginia, Alabama, and certain large districts in Pennsylvania, the coal miners of the United States are practically all organized. In Colorado, and in most of the districts in West Virginia and in parts of Pennsylvania and in all of Alabama, the right of organization and of collective bargaining is denied to the workingmen. The result of it has been that not only are the miners required to work for less wages and work longer hours in these nonunion coal fields but, as was testified here the other day by a representative of the miners, the death roll of this industry in the unorganized coal fields is so much higher than in the organized fields that it is impossible to separate the death ratio from the fact that the men are unorganized. As, for instance, Colorado has double as many fatalities and accidents that do not result in fatality per thousand employed as is the average for the United States.

Indeed, if you make a chart by States showing the rise and fall of industrial accidents, you find just as organization proceeds the ratio of deaths decreases. In Colorado, as I recall the last figures their death rate was 6 per thousand employed annually. In West Virginia about the same. In Alabama about the same. Whereas the average of the United States, including these States, unorganized, is about 3 or, to be exact, I think it is 2.85 per thousand employed, the lowest ratio being found in Missouri, where the rate is less than 1 per thousand employed annually.

When men are unorganized, and where they have no power of united expression, they will take risks—I mean unnecessary risks—that organized workmen will not take.

Furthermore, the mining laws in the States in which men are not organized are not so well enforced as in the States where the men are organized. As a matter of fact where the men are organized they have a political power—I do not mean a party political power, but I mean the potential political power—which results in the enforcement of the mining law and results in the enactment of mining laws.

Chairman WALSH. Does the large corporate type of organization, in your opinion, tend to produce a higher grade of workmen and a more constant citizenship, or otherwise?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the large corporations specialize more than the smaller ones, and to that extent the men are perhaps not so well all-round trained mechanics as they are in the smaller industries, and the very fact that in these great combinations of capital, in the industries controlled by these great combinations of capital, men work longer hours and for less wages on the whole, which must result in a lowering of the standard of living and consequently in a lowering of the standard of citizenship, because I think it is a truism that the standard of citizenship is inseparably related to the standard of wages. You can not expect a high order of citizenship among men who earn less than is necessary to maintain themselves in health and decent comfort.

Chairman WALSH. Has the high concentration of industry in the form of the modern corporation acted as a preventive, or has it accelerated the growth of trades-unions?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should say that it has acted as a preventive, that it has prevented the growth of trades-unionism, as indicated by the great industry to which I have referred. For instance, the steel industry was formerly—many of the skilled workmen were formerly—an organized industry. And my recollection is that when Mr. Carnegie was in control of the Carnegie Steel Co., that the skilled workmen were members of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers; that the unskilled men were not organized; therefore their wages were very low. But in the other industries, in those industries now controlled by the United States Steel Corporation, I understand that none of the members are members of the organization except those employed on their railroads; that all the men in the mills are unorganized.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed the extent, if any, to which potential control over labor conditions is concentrated in the hands of financial directors of the large corporations?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I have no knowledge of it at all.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any knowledge as to the extent to which control is exercised by the large financial interests in connection with these corporations in labor matters?

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps the most striking instance I can refer to is that of the settlement of the anthracite coal strike.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would go into that in a concise way; detail it, Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the anthracite coal strike was inaugurated in the late spring of 1902, and was inaugurated after the representatives of the miners' union had exhausted every means in their power to adjust their differences with the mine owners by negotiation and conciliation, and the strike continued until the late fall.

In October—I think it was the 2d day of October—1902, the President of the United States invited the presidents of the coal-carrying railroads and one independent coal operator—and by that I mean an operator whose mines were not owned by a railroad company—and he invited also a representative of the United Mine Workers to confer with him at Washington, for the purpose of trying to bring about a basis upon which the strike could be adjusted, and his efforts in that respect failed—failed because the representatives of the coal-carrying railroads would not agree to arbitration or to mediation or to any basis of adjustment. Some four or five days later—I think some two weeks later—the representatives of certain large banking firms in New York City journeyed to Washington and proposed a basis of settlement which, after being modified to meet in part the objections raised by me, did result in a settlement.

Now, in that instance, it seemed that the representatives of the financial houses, financial firms were able to control a situation despite the fact that those in active charge of the railroads had refused to make an adjustment. Now, that is the most notable instance of which I have knowledge in which there seemed to be large control of industry by the financial institutions of this country.

Chairman WALSH. Do you see any analogy between the situation now existing in Colorado and the conditions which existed in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania prior to this settlement?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I do not think the cases are parallel at all. In one case it was a banking firm, for instance, Mr. Morgan's firm, that I believe brought about and made a proposition to the President that resulted in a settlement of the strike.

Chairman WALSH. I do not mean with reference to any efforts that have been made to settle it heretofore—that is, I do not mean the suggestion of the President or the efforts of the Labor Department or anything of that sort—but do you see an analogy or analogies in the general situation out there with the conditions prior to the creation of the Anthracite Commission and the settlement of that question? For instance, were the owners determined, were the miners in a state of deep unrest, was the situation acute—if there is any analogy?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I think in that respect that there is a very close parallel. Of course, I know a good deal; that is, I did know a great deal about the situation in Colorado. As a matter of fact, the strike which has just terminated in Colorado by the men resuming work is a repetition of an occurrence there in 1903, when I was president of the United Mine Workers of America.

I think it was on November 9, 1903, that the Colorado miners, the miners of part of New Mexico and Utah, went on strike. Their demands were substantially the same demands that were made in the strike which has just been brought to a close. The strike lasted for nearly a year—that is to say, at any rate, it lasted from November 9 until about July 1—when the officers of the United Mine Workers ordered the men to resume work, as we were not able to financially support the strike and were compelled to advise them to call a convention and to order resumption of work, and to advise them that we could furnish no further financial aid.

The men did have a convention and refused to order the strike off, and what is rather unusual, they continued that strike for, I think, two months afterwards, even though they had no money upon which to live; that is, they were furnished no money by the United Mine Workers of America. But eventually they were compelled to return to work on the terms offered by the mine owners.

Chairman WALSH. Was there violence in that strike, and alleged invasion of constitutional rights, destruction of property—those concomitants that have gone with strikes?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I think so.

Mr. W. R. Fairly, who, by the way, was appointed by the President of the United States as one of the mediators to bring about an adjustment of the present Colorado strike, and Mr. James Mooney, representative of the United Mine Workers of America, while traveling between Starkville and Trinidad, Colo., were set upon by a gang of ruffians and were severely beaten, one of them having to go to a hospital and is to this day carrying the marks of the beating he received at that time. Mr. Fairly was many months before he recovered from the assault made upon him.

Mr. Evans, than whom there is no better citizen in the United States, a man whose home is in Ohio and who represented the United Mine Workers of America as its financial agent in Colorado during the strike of 1903, while traveling on a train between Trinidad and Denver, was set upon by armed guards and beaten into insensibility.

Mr. Wayohn, another representative of the United Mine Workers of America, was similarly beaten and sent to a hospital at Salida.

At the time they were assaulted these men were pursuing their own business in a peaceful way and certainly the men on the train traveling as passengers could have been engaged in no act that would have provoked anyone assaulting them, because they were assaulted far from the coal field. I dare say, as I recall the distance, it is something over 100 miles from the field where the men were on strike.

Now, men were deported, a large number of men was taken from the coal fields of Colorado over the Raton Pass into New Mexico and ordered not to return to the coal fields again.

There was violence on the other side, too. The violence was not confined to the representatives of the corporations. As to the amount of violence, of course, it is a long time ago and I can not remember—

Chairman WALSH. Give the general outline of violence on the other side—was there organized violence, was there conflict between the bodies of men and the authorities, or how was it?

Mr. MITCHELL. My recollection now is that the men who were attacked, these men who were standing waiting for strike breakers to persuade them not to go to work, were provoked into acts of violence, that there was from time to time overt acts committed between the strikers and the guards.

Now, of course, I had to depend upon reports made to me as to the causes. As far as I can remember these reports they were that the strikers had been provoked, had been goaded until they could no longer endure this provocation, and had to resort to fights.

However, I do not recall that there were serious fights between the guards and the strikers which resulted in the loss of life.

One of the guards—that is, one of the detectives—was killed in Denver, but it was while—the newspapers had at first charged that his death was the result of some act of a striker, and the investigation demonstrated, as much as it was possible to demonstrate, that he had been killed by one of his own men. The record there was that he knew too much, and he was shot, and found dead in the streets of Denver. I might say that the mining fields are 200 miles from Denver.

Chairman WALSH. Please outline the main provisions of the settlement made by or growing out of the Anthracite Strike Commission.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the commission recommended that there should be an advance of 10 per cent in the wages of all contract men, and that the hours of labor of men who worked by the day should be reduced from 10 to 9, which was equivalent to an advance in wages of about 11 per cent—eleven and a fraction per cent—that engineers and pump men who had formerly worked 12 hours per day should have their hours of labor reduced to 8 hours per day, and that they should receive the same rate of pay for 8 hours that they formerly received for 12 hours.

Now, this also applied to certain classes of firemen, so that on the whole the settlement resulted in an advance of about a little more than 10 per cent in wages.

It provided also that the right of the workmen to join their trade-union should not be denied, but that men who did desire to join the United Mine Workers of America should not be interfered with in their right to work. It provided for the creation of what is called a board of conciliation. This board of conciliation is composed of three men representing the workmen, and three men representing the employers, these six being given authority to appoint a seventh disinterested party to adjust any grievances that could not be adjusted by the board of conciliation itself. Now, when the time came to appoint the representatives of the miners on this board, a convention of the United Mine Workers of America was called—that is, a convention of the three anthracite districts of the United Mine Workers of America was called—and that convention designated the three presidents of the anthracite districts of the United Mine Workers of America as their representatives on the board of conciliation. Whereupon the mine owners refused to recognize them as the representatives of the anthracite mine workers. And another convention was immediately called and I recommended that either the miners in the anthracite field be permitted to select their own representatives free from interference on the part of the mine owners or we would stop work again. And thereupon Judge Gray, who had been chairman of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, intervened and decided that the United Mine Workers of America had the right to select these representatives and that the coal companies had no right, under the agreement, under the decision, to deny to recognize, to refuse to recognize the men selected by the United Mine Workers of America.

The result was that they then did recognize them and from that day to this that board of conciliation is in existence and all questions of dispute, except questions of wages—that is, all questions of dispute arising out of the decision of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission—are referred to this board and they have been continued to be referred to them.

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of the decision of the commission, if you can recall it, Mr. Mitchell, of the Anthracite Commission?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it was in April, 1903, that their decision was made, and their report is now in the records of the Labor Department at Washington.

Chairman WALSH. Was the strike going on in Colorado at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; the strike in Colorado began about November 9, 1903.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any effort at that time to apply the principles laid down in the report of the Anthracite Strike Commission in Colorado, it following so closely on that strike?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; there was no proposal made by either side. It was impossible to make proposals, because we were not able to confer. The president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. would not grant an interview or conference to any representatives of the United Mine Workers of America.

Chairman WALSH. Did they take the same position in 1903 that they have taken in this controversy?

Mr. MITCHELL. Precisely.

Chairman WALSH. Had that not been the position at least of some of the anthracite operators prior to the creation of the Anthracite Commission?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was their attitude up to 1901. May I say that the great strike in the anthracite fields in 1902 was not the first strike. In the fall of 1900 a strike was inaugurated involving nearly all of the mines in the anthracite field, and that strike lasted six weeks and was settled by a notice of an advance of 10 per cent being posted at the tipples and washers of the companies. In 1901 we then opened negotiations with the presidents of the anthracite coal carrying railroads for a conference looking to the making of an agreement, and we had conferences with them in 1901 and in 1902 prior to the great strike. As a matter of fact, the right of conference was never denied by the railroad presidents after the strike of 1900. Prior to that time they would not confer with us.

Chairman WALSH. Was that a position that had extended over a number of years?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I can not say that, because the miners' union had no strength in the coal fields until 1899; then its growth began.

Chairman WALSH. What has been the result of the agreement reached in the strike field in 1903 as regards wages and general working conditions in the mines?

Mr. MITCHELL. The wages in the anthracite coal fields are approximately 36 per cent—approximately 40 per cent higher now than they were prior to the strike of 1900. An advance of 10 per cent was made in 1900 and an advance of 10 per cent in 1902, which would indicate an advance of 20 per cent; that does not represent, however, all of the advance made. Prior to 1900 the men were employed on a sliding-scale basis, a so-called profit-sharing basis; that is to say, when coal sold at New York Harbor at a given price per ton—no; change that. When coal sold f. o. b. cars at the mines at $2.50 a ton, the miners received a certain amount per ton for mining it and a certain amount per day; I can not give the figures, because they varied so much. When coal sold at a less price than that there was a falling off in wages, and when coal sold at an advanced price over that wages were raised. It happened that prior to 1900 coal sold at the mines at less than the basis price, and consequently the miners' wages were from 10 to 12 per cent less than the basis price, so that the advance of 10 per cent in 1900 really meant an advance of 18 per cent, because the advance of 10 per cent was on the basis price; therefore really it was a gain to the amount of about 18 per cent.

The advance secured in 1902, or awarded in 1903, also provided for the payment of certain amounts for dead work, deficiency work, etc.; so in respect to that advance it really totaled about 18 per cent. Since that time, about two years ago, another advance of 5 per cent was made, so that it amounts to a total advance of wages in the last 15 years of about 40 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. What have been the results, from your observation, of the settlement of the anthracite controversy with respect to the living conditions and general social surroundings of the workmen engaged in the industry?

Mr. MITCHELL. There has been a decided improvement. The anthracite coal strike and the publicity given to it so shocked the finer sense of the American people, and I say, too, Mr. Chairman, that I think it called to the attention of the men who operate these mines the real conditions existing, and as a consequence there were put in force after that strike many improvements. In some of the camps, where the men had lived in shacks and huts, they were pulled down and rather descent houses were put up in their places.

My own observation has been that with the higher wages there has come a general elevation of the whole intellectual and moral standard of the people in that industry. Just to illustrate: Prior to the strike of 1900—by the way, the anthracite miners are largely non-English-speaking people. Many of them being recently arrived immigrants. They speak more than 20 languages, and they brought with them from their own countries the racial animosities that prevailed there, and the result was that it was difficult for them to live in peace together. The English-speaking miners failed to treat them with the proper consideration; that is, these fellow workers of theirs who did not speak the English language. It was hard to pronounce their names, and they often called them "Hunks" or by the name of John or Jim. And when I went among them I insisted that they should stop that practice and give these foreigners as much consideration as they demanded for themselves. I insisted that they should stop calling them Hunks, and to call them Mr. So-and-so, or to learn their first names and address them in that way. That was done, and as an evidence of how important it was regarded, this transformation—at the end of the strike several of the consuls of various nations and several of the bankers who do business with the immigrants and the representatives of all their great newspapers, came to Wilkes-Barre and presented me with the most beautiful badge, made by the man who designed the badge given to Lincoln by the freed slaves. And they said the reason for doing so was that I had succeeded in securing for their people that recognition which they were entitled to as American citizens. That condition exists there now.

I do not mean to say that these men are sufficiently paid. The anthracite miners are not sufficiently paid yet, and hours of labor are still too long, but they are infinitely better off now than they were 15 years ago.

Chairman WALSH. What have you observed as to the results on what might be called the democratic situation—the general political conditions? Have you observed any?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the first—perhaps I might illustrate the greater freedom of political action that followed better living conditions by stating that prior to the strike nearly all their representatives in the legislature were chosen from either the business class or from the employing class; that following the strike, when the men felt some greater degree of freedom, they were largely chosen from the working people. Inasmuch as the population is 75 per cent miners it might be expected that they would elect to the legislature some of the miners as members, and after the strike they did send quite a number of miners to the legislature.

I am not prepared to say that there was any attempt by the companies to control the political action of the men before the strike; I do not think it was necessary, inasmuch as the voters were largely men who were non-English speaking and without training in democracy, and it was rather difficult for them to find the means of properly expressing their political preferences.

Chairman WALSH. What effect, if any, did you observe this settlement to have had upon the character and habits of the men in the industry?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I suggested, in my answer to another question, the effect has been most desirable. There has been a marked improvement in the intelligence and moral standards of the people in the anthracite coal fields.

Chairman WALSH. Did the settlement of the controversy involve this question of the check off, so called—that is, the deduction from the wages of the men of their union dues?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; the settlement did not, with respect to the checking off of the union dues; but it did involve the checking off of checkweighmen and check-docking bosses. An anthracite mine is different from a bituminous mine. In the anthracite mine the weighing of the coal is not practical, although demanded in some cases by the men, but in some cases it is entirely impractical because of the peculiar physical condition of the veins. But there is another question similar to it involved. That is to say when men are paid by cubical measurement, as they are over there, the contention was there should be a man employed by the men to act as the company's representative to determine the amount of coal that is in a car, as required by the agreement. Under the old system, if the car was loaded to the water level, as required under the agreement, the man might be docked. The coal, as it moves a great distance underground and up to the surface, shakes down, and a car that might have left the working place at water level might be less than water level when it reached the place of dumping. The men were docked, and they demanded they had the right to employ a check-docking boss to see that they were not wrongly docked, and that was granted, and all the men working in the colliery were checked off for his wages. And this was done by agreement of the majority of the men.

Chairman WALSH. I refer particularly to the checking-off system as applied to union dues. You noticed in Colorado that the operators said it was obnoxious and tyrannical to have the companies do that. Was that dealt with in the settlement of the anthracite strike?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; the demand was made before the Anthracite Coal Commission that the anthracite miners of America should be recognized officially as members of the United Mine Workers, but that request was denied by the commission, although it did recognize the rights of representatives of the United Mine Workers of America on the board of conciliation.

Chairman WALSH. Is that what might be called an open-shop agreement?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; it might be called an open-shop agreement.

Chairman WALSH. After being put in effect, was it so recognized by the workers and operators as being a real open-shop agreement?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Has the so-called check system existed there since that time; that is, the principle of the company deducting the union dues from the wages or salaries of the employees still exist?

Mr. MITCHELL. With only one or two exceptions the companies do not deduct the union dues, but, Mr. Chairman, they do this: By agreement with the coal companies made subsequent to the decision of the anthracite coal-strike commission, the right of the union to have committees at the pay car or at the mine to collect dues from all of the mine workers is recognized, so that the present arrangement with the miners' union does give them every opportunity to collect dues from their members, although it does not require that the men must belong to the union in order to have the right to work there.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that the adoption in Colorado of the general provisions of the anthracite agreement would produce good results?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it would produce results so much better than prevail there now that it would be desirable. Personally, I favor the system of industrial conditions that prevails in the organized coal fields of the United States. I think where the companies and the representatives of the union bargain as to the conditions of employment, and their decisions are formulated into an agreement, that is the best method.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention been called to a proposed plan or to a plan adopted by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. with reference to dealing with their employees collectively?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have read the accounts in the papers. I think it is substantially that at each mine the men are to select a representative who are to go to Denver and meet the representatives of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I may be wrong, but my recollection of the testimony was that every 250 miners had a right to select one representative who would confer with the mine operators at Denver and with their representatives, and present any grievances that they might have, the labor representatives being selected at mass meetings of the workmen without any compulsion or without any observation, even of the employers. Is that about it?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Without the presence of the pit foreman?

Chairman WALSH. Without the presence of the pit boss or foreman, or any other representative of the employers. Now, assuming those to be the outlines, I will ask you what do you think of the efficacy of that plan for producing results?

Mr. MITCHELL. Simply absurd. It would result in no good at all.

Chairman WALSH. Why?

Mr. MITCHELL. Because the men would not be free to select representatives of their own choice. If they are unorganized, they will do as they have always done in unorganized districts. They will select the persons that the company wants selected. They may not do that by direct instructions, but where men have no security in their positions they will do what the company wants them to do. The men must be organized in order that they may have freedom to select the proper men to represent them. No good at all can come of it, because, as a matter of fact, the men at the mines will not believe that they are being really and truly represented by those selected in that way.

Chairman WALSH. Now, have you observed any efforts having been made in the past to so have conducted the affairs between employers and employees in large corporations upon which you base your conclusions which you have just given?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; prior to 1897 the coal industry of the United States was an unorganized industry. In 1897 the coal miners of the United States—of all the Central Western States—went on strikes, and they made a slogan of the statement "We might as well starve idle as starve working." Conditions had become so bad that they could not live on the wages they were earning. That strike had not been on but a short time before men who were either opposed to the strike or who were in the employ of the companies met—for instance, they went to St. Louis to confer with the mine owners, and in some cases they reported the strike should be called off. In other words, there was no free expression on the part of the men in the selection of their representatives, and there can not be unless the men are organized.

Chairman WALSH. What do you believe, Mr. Mitchell—what is your opinion as to the responsibility of directors in these large corporations for the labor conditions of the people engaged in them?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think in most cases it is very unfortunate that the directors know very little about the actual conditions prevailing at the plants or mines. Usually in great corporations the directors are usually busy men having other interests, and they have not got the time even if they had the inclination to visit the plants; and when they do visit them it must be a brief visit. Their observations must be in large measure superficial. They can not have time to investigate thoroughly.

Chairman WALSH. What seems to determine the importance of the work which they have to do, if you have observed? For instance, what is the character of the duties that they seem to consider more important than first-hand knowledge of labor conditions?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, my judgment is that they consider the financial situation, the financial conditions of their companies as being the most important consideration. I think that is to be expected of them, because I think they can not give the time to acquaint themselves minutely with the conditions of employment at their plants, particularly if the plants be far distant; but I think they should have.

Chairman WALSH. What do you think of the relative importance of those duties that they have assumed?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think there is a great obligation upon them to know all about the conditions of employment, the industrial conditions, at the plants of which they are directors.

Chairman WALSH. What have you observed as to those conditions as affecting the financial well-being of the institutions?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well I do not know as to what the effect of it has been.

Chairman WALSH. Does the fact that many large corporations—that is, the stockholders, among whom are now large numbers of employees, such as the steel company, which is selling stock to its employees—in any way affect the control of the policies of these corporations?

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean their selling stock to their employees?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Does the fact that the employees hold stock in these large corporations affect labor policies either one way or the other?

Mr. MITCHELL. Why, I think that selling stock to the employees may in some cases make the working people think they have a real interest in the property of the plant; but I do not think it means anything to the workman. I do not think it means anything for his material betterment at all, because the workman could just as well go and buy his stock on the market if he had the money to do it with. The only thing is it gives him the stock at a few dollars less than he might have to pay for it in the market and gives him time in which to pay for it; but I don't think that gives the workman any real voice in determining the policy of the industry. He is not represented on the board of directors, and even if he were their holdings are so small that they could have no real voice in determining the labor policies of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has a few questions that he would like to ask you, please, Mr. Mitchell.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have specialized in recent years on workmen's compensation, have you not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I have given some study to it and been a member of various committees that had to do with the subject.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, in this connection, I think it only fair, Mr. Mitchell, to say that as a member of the California Workmen's Compensation Commission, I have learned to regard you as one of the authorities and one of the experts on that problem. And as an authority and expert, Mr. Mitchell, has it or has it not been your observation that in States where workmen's compensation laws are now on the statute books that the percentage of fatalities due to industrial accidents are less by a more or less considerable number than in States where there is no workmen's compensation law?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the only information I have on it—because in compiling their statistics there are very few of the commissions that have attempted to demonstrate that compensation acts have reduced accidents—my judgment is that it has and will reduce the number of accidents. Of course, in our State the State of New York, our law has been in operation only seven months, and consequently we are not as yet able to analyze our statistics. But I have had reports from various companies, for instance, the Lackawanna Steel Co. Their report shows that their accidents have been materially reduced since the law went into effect. And we have isolated cases of that sort, indicating a substantial diminution on the number of accidents.

And the president of the Michigan State Federation of Labor in an address delivered here in New York City a little while ago said that in the whole State of Michigan since the compensation law went into effect that accidents have been reduced by one-third. That, I think, perhaps is not quite exact. I don't see how there could be a reduction of one-third in accidents due to compensation acts alone, but that would be probably due to some other causes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Practically, doesn't it have to work out along these lines, Mr. Mitchell, that when an employer is approached in a State that is not under workmen's compensation laws and is asked to introduce safety measures, you can use simply moral suasion?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Whereas, if the State were one where there were workmen's compensation acts on the statute books, it becomes to that employer a matter of profit in this, that it has been brought out in the testimony here that the amount allowed on the part of the coal operators of Colorado, for example, in death cases, was all the way from $300 to $700 to the dependents of the deceased workmen; whereas in States where workmen's compensation is the law the usual award to the dependents of the deceased workman is a sum equal to about three years' earnings; I don't know that it is in New York, but in California it is equal to three years' earnings—which make it on an average about $2,700 as against an average of somewhere between $300 and $700. Well, now, when the employer finds he is called on to pay a sum of $2,700 in case of a fatality as against a sum of $300 to $700 it becomes to his own selfish interest to see that safety appliances and methods are introduced.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I think there is no doubt about it. In other words, if it costs less to save a man than to kill him they will probably save him.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; exactly. Another point of information, Mr. Mitchell, may I ask whether in the State of New York you have the initiative, referendum, and recall?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; we have not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you regard the initiative, referendum, and recall as being of any advantage to labor?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I think in Oregon it has been of decided advantage, and I think perhaps in California it has been of some advantage.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In what way is the initiative, referendum, and recall of advantage to labor?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, it gives labor the opportunity to initiate legislation which they believe is necessary to their well-being. It gives them the opportunity of defeating legislation which they believe to be hostile to their interests. I am not suggesting at all that the workmen or any other class of citizens always exercise wisely this new power which they have acquired by the introduction of the initiative, referendum, and recall; but I do think that in course of time it will be of tremendous advantage as an educational factor. In other words, men never wisely discharge responsibilities until they have responsibilities. You put a great responsibility on a man and in the course of time he will wisely discharge that responsibility.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think, then, Mr. Mitchell, that it is an advantage to labor to have the initiative, referendum, and recall on the statute books of the Commonwealth?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it would. I may say I am not an advocate—it is a subject that I have not specialized in at all, but I believe in democracy—the general terms of democracy I believe in. In other words, I believe in government by the people, and I believe it is wise to place upon people the greatest measure of responsibility, just as I believe it is in the industrial world. I believe in industry by agreement, and if I were an employer, in making a contract with a labor union, I would place upon the union every bit of responsibility I could. Too many employers seek to reserve to themselves the responsibility they should place on the workingmen. In making a contract, I say, I would give them all the responsibility I could put upon them, and then I would hold them to strict accountability for the discharge of their responsibilities.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gather from that what you have said, Mr. Mitchell, if the initiative, referendum, and recall are part of the law, it enables the workers, through their votes, to recall incompetent or dishonest or derelict officials, does it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. I say it would give them that power, if they knew how to exercise it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Exactly; and it further gives them the right to have placed on the statute books, regardless of the attitude of the members of the legislature, such laws as in their judgment are for their good or interest?

Mr. MITCHELL. It would give them that opportunity; yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And furthermore it would enable them to prevent a legislative act from becoming a law if that act was inimical to the interests of labor?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; they would have that opportunity.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, then, with the initiative, referendum, and recall on the statute books, is there any excuse for workers taking the short cut and taking the law in their own hands?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, of course, there is justification for a man to take a short cut under some circumstances regardless of what resources he has under the law. If a man were to come up and assault me I would not be willing to wait until I could invoke the aid of the people of the State of New York to repeal the law and make a new law to protect myself. I would protect myself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That would be a matter of self-defense?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; and so it is. You can not—of course it is necessary to say in connection with such legislation, the initiative, referendum, and recall, that they must be workable laws. You can not—you can provide for the initiative, referendum, and recall and you can provide machinery that makes it absolutely unworkable. Now, it must be a workable law, one that you can invoke within a reasonable time. As a matter of fact, nearly all the laws of this kind require the lapse of months before you can recall an officer. I think it is usual—its advocates say, it ought to be three or six months after the petition is filed before the officer could be recalled, and perhaps that is wise, in order that men may not act in anger or under great provocation, that they shall have time to act with calmness or deliberation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes. I think there can be no room for issue on that, Mr. Mitchell, that you or I or any other citizen has the right to defend ourselves if we are attacked regardless of the law; that the law would justify self-defense. In fact, I do not believe it would be possible to get a jury anywhere in this country to bring in a verdict against a man who had simply defended himself when attacked.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; but, more than that, I think, Mr. Commissioner that a man has a right to take into his hands the law, even though it be not he himself who is attacked. For instance, if I saw a ruffian assaulting a woman I would not wait—I would not run down to the police court to get an officer. I would protect the woman, and if I were able to I would assault the man who assaulted her.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, that would be along the line of defending the innocent and helpless?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Surely.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. May I say this, that I do not want even that suggestion to indicate that I am in favor of overt acts. Quite the contrary. I believe in observing the law, and I believe that everyone should observe the law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Good or bad?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I believe that not only the workmen and the employer alike should observe the law, and I do not think as is so often done that citizens should select—that because some representative of a labor union or a group of men in a labor union commit some overt act, or that that act should be held up as typical of trade-unionism in general, because it would not be fair to do it. Then I think that capitalism and capitalists ought not to be condemned as a class because some of a number commit the most atrocious acts; nor do I think bankers, as a general rule, are to be condemned because some scoundrel amongst them wrecks his bank and wrecks the fortunes of thousands and thousands of men.

In other words, I think that if we are going to hold up an institution to public gaze that we should select its best men or its average men as being typical and not its worst men. That, I am sorry to say, has not been and too often has not been done in the case of labor unions, trade-unionism. It is the worst men that have been held up as the types and not their best men.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you hold the union responsible where its officials officially did certain things under their official titles?

Mr. MITCHELL. It would depend entirely upon the circumstances, it would depend upon circumstances.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, under what circumstances would you hold the union responsible, and under what circumstances would you not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, if a gang of hired guards or thugs were to shoot down a lot of defenseless women and children and the officers of a union were to say that "Come, let us protect them, let us protect our home," I would feel that there was justification. Now, I would say there was some justification for that act. So that would be an instance in which I would say it would depend upon circumstances.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are fairly familiar, Mr. Mitchell, are you not, with Colorado so far as that is concerned from start to finish?

Mr. MITCHELL. I only know from newspaper reports. I have not been in Colorado for many years. And there are no reports made to me by any of the representatives on the part of the union. Of course I have more than the ordinary interest in the struggle, because I think there was a righteous effort to secure better conditions, and I think the men deserve to succeed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it, Mr. Mitchell, that you are probably aware of the attitude of the coal operators in Denver, and the reasons that they have offered as to why they refused to recognize or to deal with the United Mine Workers of America. You doubtless know that among other reasons offered by them are primarily these three reasons: "That the United Mine Workers of America are lawbreakers; second, that the United Mine Workers of America are contract breakers; and, third, that the operators absolutely refuse to enter into any agreements that will compel them to use their machinery to collect the dues of the union." You doubtless are familiar with their attitude on those points, Mr. Mitchell?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you doubtless know that one of the proofs that the operators in Colorado have offered as evidence that the United Mine Workers of America are lawbreakers is that famous circular that was produced by the mine workers of Colorado, known as the "Call to Arms." And to refresh your recollection I will read it from the proceedings. It is dated Denver, Colo., April 22, 1914:

"Organize the men in your community in companies of volunteers to protect the workers of Colorado against the murder and cremation of men, women, and children, by armed assassins in the employ of coal corporations, serving under the guise of State militiamen.

"Gather together for defensive purposes all arms and ammunition legally available. Send name of leader of your company and actual number of men enlisted at once by wire, phone, or mail to W. T. Hickey, secretary of the State federation of labor.

"Hold all companies subject to order.

"People having arms to spare for these defensive measures are requested to furnish same to local companies, and, where no companies exist, send them to the State federation of labor.

"The State is furnishing us no protection, and we must protect ourselves, our wives and children from these murderous assassins. We seek no quarrel with the State and we expect to break no law; we intend to exercise our lawful right as citizens to defend our homes and our constitutional rights.

"John R. Lawson, international board member district 14, U. M. W. A., and also president State federation of labor; John McLennon, president district 15, U. M. W. A.; E. L. Doyle, secretary-treasurer district 15, U. M. W. A.; John Ramsay, national organizer, U. M. W. A.; W. T. J. Hickey, secretary State federation of labor; E. R. Hoage; T. W. Taylor; Clarence Moorehouse; Ernest Mills, secretary-treasurer W. F. of M."

It was pointed out that that was a call to arms in violation of the State law; that the miners were defying the State authorities, that they were acting as rebels and that they were doing unlawful things in an unlawful way. Now, what would be your comment on that, Mr. Mitchell?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I would like to comment on that statement just as you gave it. What was the first statement?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That they refused to recognize the United Mine Workers of America because of being law breakers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not a lawyer, but I have understood that in law he who comes into court must come in with clean hands. It seems to me rather strange that the Colorado mine owners would give as a reason their failure to recognize the United Mine Workers of America their statement that they were a lawless organization, when, as a matter of fact, the strike itself was called to enforce the laws of Colorado; that is, five of the demands of the miners were for the enforcement of the law. And I think it is not seriously contended by the owners themselves that the law had been violated by them constantly, constantly violated; that the men were not permitted to have checkweighmen; that they were required to deal in company stores; that they were required to board in certain boarding houses of the company's. That they were not paid in cash. Now, if those mine owners were themselves persistent violators of the law surely it would not be a sufficient defence for their action to say that the men, that they denied recognition to other men because they called them violators of the law.

Now, the next reason given by them was what?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, before we pass from that, Mr. Mitchell, I would like to develop a point or two there. Now, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the mine owners were themselves lawbreakers. I would take it you in common with the rest of us would not take the ground that two wrongs make a right?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. That because the mine owners were lawbreakers that therefore the mine workers were likewise justified in being lawbreakers?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I would not make that statement. But the statement I would make is this, Mr. Commissioner, that I should try to be reasonably consistent, and if I were a constant and persistent violator of the board, I would not say that I would refuse to recognize another man because I said that they are a violator of the law. The fact of the matter is that being a violator of the law themselves would be no reason why they should recognize other alleged violators of the law. If they were all lawbreakers, they ought all to flock together.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would be your comment on this circular that was issued by the mine workers?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Commissioner. It is a—if I had been in charge of Colorado, I should not have signed that circular.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Why not?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should not have signed it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Why not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Because I would think it wrong to do it, and it would serve no good end. But I do not want my statement to be recorded without this explanation. These men signed that circular, as I understand it, three days following the Ludlow massacre—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Two days.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, what was the state of mind of the men who signed that circular? We must take into consideration, in passing judgment, the condition of mind of the person who does an act. Two days prior to that day the circular was signed some considerable number, I forget the number, I think 11, women and babies were smothered or burned or shot to death in a camp at Ludlow. These women and children, whether they were shot to death by guards of the company, whether they were smothered by some guards of the company, whether their death was caused at all by that act of those guards, is not so material. But the men believed that their death was due to that; they believed murder had been committed, and that the women and babies had been murdered. Now, with that impression on their minds, that their wives and babies had been smothered by the hired guards of the coal companies, they issued this circular. I do not think the men who issued the circular would have done it under other circumstances. So that while I should not have advised this issuance of any such circular, and would not have signed the circular had I been in charge of the strike, yet I do want to say that I can understand the state of mind of the people who issued the circular.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will take a recess until 2 o'clock this afternoon. Will you kindly resume the stand at that time, Mr. Mitchell?

(At 12.30 of this Monday, February 1, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in order so that we may proceed.

Mr. Mitchell, please resume the stand. Commissioner Weinstock is continuing his examination.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You made the statement, Mr. Mitchell, that while there were extenuating circumstances in the Colorado situation in connection with the issuance of that call to arms that you nevertheless considered it wrong, and that, if you had been in charge of the strike, you would not have signed the call to arms. Will you please be good enough to tell this commission why you regard that call to arms as wrong?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, as I understand it, under the laws of the United States men do not have the right to make calls to arms. I may say that I am informed that the men who did make these statements did not understand that it was contrary to law. I am told they were advised by counsel that under the Constitution of the United States the right to bear arms included the right to issue a call to arms, and I think in that respect legally there was a distinction which was not recognized. The right to bear arms does not legally mean the right to issue a call to men to gather arms.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your opinion, then, they were badly advised?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should not say that. I say that the conditions—the state of mind in which the men were placed—the men found themselves—at that time accounts, perhaps, more than anything else, for their action. When I say if I had been in charge of the strike, I should not have advised that. I am speaking of my mind in its present state; I am not speaking as of a day or two days following the killing or death of a large number of men and babies and women. Therefore I can not say with certainty what I should have done two days after the Ludlow matter. But speaking now, I say, and with the state of mind I am now in, I should not have signed the call, but should have advised a different course.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The second reason offered by the coal operators, as I have explained it, Mr. Mitchell, why they would not enter into a contract with the United Mine Workers of America was that they are contract breakers. Do you care to make any comment on that?

Mr. MITCHELL. Why, it seems to me that the excuse is not sufficient to justify the refusal to make contracts. As a matter of fact the United Mine Workers of America is not a contract-breaking organization; on the contrary it is a contract-observing organization.

I might relate here an incident that demonstrates that the United Mine Workers of America is not a contract-breaking organization, but is a contract-observing organization, because it observed its contracts under the greatest stress to which a labor union in America has ever been subjected. During the long coal strike, after these 160,000 miners had been idle for three months, at a time when nearly a million men, women, and children were on the verge of starvation, I was required by the United Mine Workers of America to convene a national convention of miners that met at Indianapolis, Ind., on the 14th of July, 1902. The proposition submitted to that convention by the anthracite miners was that if the bituminous miners of the United States would suspend work, even temporarily, that their action would result in the immediate settlement of the anthracite strike; that is to say, that by shutting off the coal supply of the United States that would force the mine owners to immediately settle the strike. The bituminous miners believed that, but when they met in convention not only the delegates from our bituminous coal miners' union voted unanimously against a suspension of work in violation of contract, but the anthracite miners, these very men who at that time believed their very lives were dependent upon a settlement of the strike, also voted for contract observance, and not for contract breaking.

I do not know—I am quite sure there has never been a circumstance of such magnitude that has arisen in the industrial history of the United States in which men took so firm a position in favor of contract observance, as I have just narrated. They said, "Yes, we could win the strike if the anthracite men suspended work, but we have pledged our word to the contract in the bituminous fields, and will not break that word." And I repeat, the anthracite men, when the vote was presented to them, also voted in favor of the maintenance of the contract.

Of course there are often local violations of contract on both the part of the miners and on the part of the mine owners. I do not know which side has violated contracts oftenest; I have never attempted to keep any record of the number of contract violations, but I do say that in proportion of the number of men employed, and in proportion to the number of unions—the number of local unions that are members of the United Mine Workers of America, there have been comparatively few violations of contract. Of course if you gather together all the local and incidental things that occur covering a great many years it will look like a serious matter, but if you compare the violations of contract with the number of cases in which contracts have not been violated it will prove a tribute and not a source of condemnation of the union.

May I repeat a statement I made personally to Commissioner Weinstock? Some years ago an unbeliever, a man who was an atheist, held a mass meeting in one of our great halls in New York City, and undertook to demonstrate, first, of course, that religion itself was evil; but, second, that the preachers of religion were vicious men and unholy men; and when challenged to prove it he produced the records appearing in the papers of the country for the prior 20 years of every case where a minister or a clergyman had erred, which cases he had recorded. The consequence was that he presented a formidable array of instances in which clergymen had fallen from grace. But when you compared the number of clergymen who had fallen from grace with the number of clergymen who had not fallen from grace, his condemnation amounted to a tribute, because it was such a small part of the total number of splendid men who had not fallen, that instead of indicting them, he was commending them. And so it is in the union. If you take the number of local violations of contract and compare them with the number of cases in which the contracts have been observed, you will find that there is no justification for refusing to recognize the union on the ground that they are contract breaking.

And, after all, violation of contract is subject to a good many explanations. It does not necessarily follow that the men who go out on a strike while there is a contract in force are violators of the contract. It may have been those who provoked them to do it. A strike may be the culmination of repeated grievances. As it is said, it is the last straw that breaks the camel's back; and so it is in industry. Frequently there are aggressions here and there until the men finally rebel and they strike; and, of course, the union is held responsible for the violations of the contract and not those who may have goaded them to do it. Now, I say the United Mine Workers of America has been a contract observing organization.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As proof that the United Mine Workers are contract breakers, the Colorado operators submitted to the commission at its hearings in Denver the following communication. I submitted it on Saturday to Mr. Lawson and asked him if he could answer it, and he admitted he was not sufficiently familiar with the final facts in the case to be able to give any satisfactory answer; and I want to submit this to you now in the hope, Mr. Mitchell, that you may have been more familiar with the facts in the case and perhaps can answer it more satisfactorily than Mr. Lawson would be able to do. I quote now from the hearings at Denver [reading]:

"I have here a clipping from the Coal Age, a publication issued somewhere in the East, under date of December 20, 1913, which contains—I will not read the whole thing, but will just take the heart out of it, and you can answer it. It is issued by the Association of Bituminous Coal Operators of Central Pennsylvania, 301 Betz Building, and addressed to Mr. Patrick Gilday, president, district No. 2, United Mine Workers of America, Morrisdale mines, Pennsylvania, dated Philadelphia, December 12, 1913, and it says:

"DEAR SIR: The executive board of the Association of Bituminous Coal Operators of Central Pennsylvania held a meeting here to-day, approved and directed that the following communication be forwarded to you at once."

"And then it goes on to several whereases, and I will just deal with one touching on broken contracts.

"Whereas rules 12 and 13 of said agreement provide "should differences arise between the operators and mine workers as to the meaning of the provisions in this agreement, or about matters not specifically mentioned in the agreement, there shall be no suspension of work on account of such differences, but an earnest effort be made to settle such differences immediately."

"Whereas notwithstanding the fact that rule No. 15 provides "the right to hire and discharge, the management of the mine and the direction of the working forces are vested exclusively in the operator," and the United Mine Workers of America have absolutely disregarded this rule in that they have at numerous times served notices on substantially every operator belonging to our association that unless all of the employees working for such operators should become members of the union on or before certain dates mentioned in said notices that they, the mine workers, would close or shut down the operators' respective mines, and in many instances did close the mines for this reason and refused to return to work unless such nonunion employees were discharged. This conduct is in direct violation of your contract and specifically interferes with and abridges the right of the operators to hire and discharge; of the management of the mine and of the direction of the working forces; this conduct is in violation of contract on part of the mine workers, as well as that mentioned in the preceding paragraph, has resulted in more than 100 strikes during the life of our scale agreement; and

"Whereas notwithstanding the fact that the operators appealed to you as president of the United Mine Workers of America of district No. 2, to enforce and carry out your contract, and your repeated admission that the mine workers were not living up to their contract, but that you individually were doing all in your power to compel performance thereof, nevertheless it has been open and notorious that your subofficials, organizers, and like employees have been continuing this line of conduct down to the present date."

"Then it goes on to say:

"Be it resolved therefore, That the operators enter a vigorous protest and demand of Patrick Gilday, president, and of the executive board of the mine workers of this district, an immediate cessation of the conduct hereinbefore recited, and that they strictly enforce on the part of the mine workers their covenants contained in said contract, and in event of the failure to cease such conduct within the next 10 days that the president and secretary of the operators' association shall call a special meeting of the members thereof for the purpose of considering the final dissolution of its association on the specific ground that it is useless to enter into contract obligations with a body that steadfastly refuses to fulfill the same and which no official apparently has power to enforce.

"Yours, truly,

"W. R. ROBERTS, Secretary."

Now it is quite possible, Mr. Mitchell, that you may know what was the outcome of this and how the thing finally ended?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I don't know anything about it. Some recent letter, is it? Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It is dated December 12, 1913.

Mr. MITCHELL. I don't know anything about it; never heard of it at all, and so have no knowledge of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So you see, according to this, that there were over 100 strikes in that one district in violation of the agreement that there should be no cessation of work and that differences should be peaceably adjudicated.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, of course, in the mining industry it frequently happens that men stop work simply because there are such infractions of law that they can not continue at work; and in most districts where they have a contract that is not regarded as a violation of the contract. For instance, the mine owners now have come to understand that it is no violation of the contract for men to refuse to go to work when a mine is unsafe. For instance, very frequently it happens in a mine there is a dangerous accumulation of gases, and although there is no provision in the contract which says that they shall stop work, yet the men do stop work. Again, cases arise where the scales are not in order and the coal can not be correctly weighed, and the men then refuse to work until the scales are put in order, and then they go to work. Now, instances of that kind can be referred to as violations of the contract, yet no one familiar with the trade would charge a violation of contract if they were doing it for a purpose and a good purpose.

Commissioner LENNON. Just one question on that: Mr. Mitchell, that district where Mr. Gilday was president, is it not the district in which only part of the mines are union and part nonunion?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. Might that have any bearing on this matter?

Mr. MITCHELL. I don't know whether that would account for it or not, but there is a large territory in central Pennsylvania that is entirely nonunion.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are perhaps not aware, Mr. Mitchell, in this particular case it was not a question of wages or hours of labor or of working conditions, but of the closed shop, for it goes on to recite:

"Whereas notwithstanding the fact that rule No. 15 provides 'the right to hire and discharge, the management of the mine and the direction of the working forces are vested exclusively in the operator,' and the United Mine Workers of America have absolutely disregarded this rule in that they have at numerous times served notices on substantially every operator belonging to our association that unless all of the employees working for such operators should become members of the union on or before certain dates mentioned in such notices that they, the mine workers, would close or shut down the operators' respective mines."

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Commissioner, It is important to properly understand that section of the contract that other sections of the contract be also read. As a matter of fact, that section of the contract is to be taken into consideration with other sections. For instance, it provides that men can not be discharged at the whim of the operator; it provides that if a man be discharged, he may demand payment for the time that he is idle if it be shown that he was unjustly discharged. The contract is predicated upon the fact that the men in the mine are members of the union, because the union is held responsible for the contract, and that language is in every contract we write in all the coal fields of the United States. And yet there is no question arises about the question of unionism or nonunionism. Nonunion men may be employed under the section of the contract which provides that the union may then—that the operator will then deduct from his wages the amount of his dues and the amount of the initiation fee. So I take it that the central Pennsylvania contract also has that provision, and therefore the other and following sections would very much modify the section you have just read. I would say it would be necessary for the commission to read the whole contract before they could formulate a judgment as to whether or not a refusal to work with nonunion men was a violation of the contract.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In this particular case you are not qualified to answer, because you are not familiar with the facts.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know the facts at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the third, the objection raised by the operators for entering into a contract with the United Mine Workers of America, I would suggest, is the check-off system. Will you give the commission your point of view on that, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the check-off system?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. It would be necessary to go back a good many years, to the early history of the United Mine Workers of America, to explain it.

The United Mine Workers of America was organized in January, 1890, and it had a precarious existence up to 1897. At that time a national suspension of work occurred in the Central and some of the Western States, which resulted in the establishment of, in a general way, the United Mine Workers of America.

Now, after they were organized, and after they had entered into contractual relations with mine owners, the miners adopted a system of card inspection, as is customary in other trades; that is to say, once each month a committee of the miners would meet the men going to or coming from the mines and ask them to show their cards to see whether their dues had been regularly paid; and if the men did not pay their dues, the members of the miners' union said: "Gentlemen, you can go to work if you want to, but we are not going to work."

The operation of the mines was interfered with in this way, and the mine owners in some States stated to the representatives of our union: "Gentlemen, rather than have this constant quarrelling about the question of paying dues and showing cards, we will check off these dues through our officers. We will be your bookkeeper. Now, in some of our districts that was the basis upon which what is called the check off in the mining industry was introduced. It has grown. It is a general condition of employment in coal mining wherever mines are operated by union men, except the anthracite coal fields, the check-off system exists. It exists not alone by demand of the miners, but it exists in many cases by reason of the mine owners' determination that the United Mine Worker of America shall be responsible for the contract.

Most all mine owners say that of course they would rather operate their mines and properties without union men at all, but "If we are going to have union men, we want them all to be union men, and we want your union to be responsible for this contract, and we hold you responsible."

So that is the history of the check off.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, from the explanation you make, Mr. Mitchell, the initial step was really taken on the part of the operators?

Mr. MITCHELL. In some of our districts; not in others.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see.

Mr. MITCHELL. In some; not in others. In others that was demanded by the miners themselves.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you any way of telling how many coal mines are in the country?

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no; but a great many thousand—eight or ten thousand. I may be two or three thousand wrong about it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there any data showing what proportion of these mine owners recognize and deal with organized labor?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, it would be quite easy; it would not be difficult to get that information. I can get it for you, but I can not get it now. I can not give it now, but I say, generally, that all the miners and mine owners of the following States make a contract with each other and are union mines: All the mines in the State of Washington, Montana, Wyoming, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and most of Pennsylvania.

Commissioner LENNON. Iowa, does it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Iowa, Michigan, and I think that perhaps covers it. Now, the State of—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And West Virginia?

Mr. MITCHELL. No. In the following States the unions are in some districts: West Virginia, part of the State; the only State that I recall as entirely non-union, in which much coal is not mined, is the State of Utah, which does not produce very much coal; Colorado and West Virginia and the small part of Virginia which produces coal.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where could this commission, Mr. Mitchell, get a list of the operators who recognize and deal with organized labor in the mining industry?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, they have organizations of their own, the mine owners have State organizations, such as in Chicago could be found the operators of Illinois, the Illinois Operators' Association, and in Columbus, Ohio—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Could the mine workers' association furnish us with the list?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; their trade in general would furnish it, the editor of any of the coal operators' trade papers would have the list. I can not give it to you myself, because I do not recall just what it is.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But it is available?

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, it is available; yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, I gather further—

Mr. MITCHELL (interrupting). By the way there is what is called the American Federation of Coal Operators, of which Mr. H. N. Taylor, now of Kansas City, is its president, and can be found by addressing a letter to the Keith & Perry Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That would take in all the operators in all the States?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is an attempt to organize a national organization of coal operators, but it does not include all of them. But they do have the addresses of all the State associations.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, roughly speaking, what proportion do you think, Mr. Mitchell, speaking offhand, of the men work under union conditions?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should say approximately 75 per cent.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. About 75 per cent?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Now, that will not be clearly reflected in the membership of the United Mine Workers' of America. Their membership will be approximately 400,000, whereas there are about 700,000 men in the mines. But the difference between the 75 per cent and the two figures I have given is accounted for by the fact that the coal miners, like some other citizens, do not do what they should, and dodge their taxes and that don't show on their full membership.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it possible for operators to enter into agreements with the United Mine Workers' of America and have what is known as the open shop, or is the closed shop one of the conditions, one of the unavoidable conditions?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not referred to at all in the contract. There is not a word stated in the contract about whether it is open shop or closed shop. I presume you use the term "closed shop" as being a union shop?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, certainly; union.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course we do not—that is, we regard that as a misnomer—and we never call a shop that employs all union men a closed shop.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would call it a union shop?

Mr. MITCHELL. A union shop. We call the shop where no union men can be employed a closed shop.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. We have discovered in our investigations, Mr. Mitchell, that three or four different kinds of shops are designated; there is what is known as the closed shop, which is ordinarily understood to be a union shop.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And then there is what has been called the open shop where union and nonunion men are employed regardless of their affiliations, and then there is what is known as the nonunion shop where union men will not be employed knowingly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, the United Mine Workers' of America does work under which of these three conditions?

Mr. MITCHELL. In the anthracite coal fields, in which there are employed now about 170,000 mine workers, they have what might be termed an "open shop." I mean that in the sense that either man can work, whether members of the union or where a contract is made not with the union but with the representatives of the union. That is, the anthracite contract now in existence is not a contract between the United Mine Workers' of America and the anthracite coal operators; it is the contract between the representatives of the anthracite coal miners and representatives of the coal operators. But these representatives are the officers of the United Mine Workers' of America, and in that case both union and nonunion men are employed, although an overwhelming majority of them are union men.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, if an employer is given the right to employ anybody that he please conditionally; that is, he must check off every man regardless of his affiliations and turn into the union a certain fee, monthly dues to the union; doesn't that automatically make of the worker a union man?

Mr. MITCHELL. It does.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Whether he wants to be one or not; that is, he has no option in the case?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, of course he wants to be one. There are no workmen who do not want to belong to the union. I mean that the number of workmen in America or in the world who are outside of the union are not because they wanted to, but simply because they are where they can not join. The reason that they are not members of them is because either there is no union of their trade, as in some of the smaller trades, or that they are prevented from joining the union; but it is just as natural for the workmen to want to and desire to join a trade-union as it is for a citizen to want to vote.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, are there not many workers who, while they are very willing to enjoy all the advantages that unionism gives them, are not willing to bear their share of the burden?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not many.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, they want the other fellow to hold the umbrella while they stand under it?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I think there are not so many. I think that they desire to belong to trade-unions—that the desire to belong to the trade-union is general among workmen.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Harriman would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Mitchell, would you give us your definition of industrial democracy?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, of course, I know of the various definitions that have been given by some, stating that democracy in industry means the ownership of industry by the people, or that they may own stock in an industry, or that they may share in the profits of industry, but I can not accept any of those definitions as being the correct one. In my judgment, democracy in industry is the freedom of the workmen to belong to their unions, the right of the workmen to sell their labor collectively, and I think that you come nearer to industrial democracy in a well-organized industry than you do in any other place that you can find. The unions themselves are the most democratic of all institutions. Every member, whether he be a member 10 years or 1 year, has precisely the same rights and the same voice.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Mitchell, in answering questions as to collective bargaining—as to what collective bargaining is—quite a number of witnesses have testified that it means an attempt on the part of the union to control absolutely the industry, to have to do with the financial part of the industry, to have to do with the business policy of the industry. Now, will you tell us what collective bargaining really is in the mine workers and what it deals with?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, in the miners' union it deals with no other question except wages and hours of labor and their conditions of employment. There is absolutely no attempt to control the business end of the industry. The mine owners have absolute control of that feature of it. They sell their coal wherever they please and at whatever prices they please. They operate their mines whatever periods they please, and the miners have nothing to do with that.

Collective bargaining in the mining industry simply means that once every one or every two years, as the case is now, the mine owners of a number of of States, as, for illustration, we have what is called our central competitive coal fields and our southwestern coal fields and our eastern coal fields, but our central competitive field includes Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and western Pennsylvania. Every two years delegates are sent from the miners and from the mine owners and they meet there in conference and mutually agree as to wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment that shall prevail during the life of the contract. All that is discussed are the wages, hours of employment, and conditions of work.

Commissioner LENNON. Is that true of every trade—is that true of every other trades-union, so far as your information goes?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir; as far as my information goes.

Commissioner LENNON. In the matter of violence in labor disputes, is it from the initiative of the individual or the initiative action by the union wherever such things occur?

Mr. MITCHELL. So far as I have known, it has been simply quarrels that might arise between individuals if there were no strikes and no union of men. The violations of law are between individuals and not on the part of the union as a union. I do not think any union would tolerate any violence in the union.

Commissioner LENNON. We have had that kind of testimony, that is was authorized by the unions. You have had a large experience, and I will ask if you know anything of the kind?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not. I never knew of anything of the kind.

Commissioner LENNON. Take the district of the country where you lived so long, in Illinois, in Spring Valley, in that coal district; what change have you noticed in the miners and in their families in that neighborhood as to the way they live, as to their sobriety, the improvement of their morals, the education of their children, and the other things that are fundamentally essential to growth?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the change has been so remarkable that it is difficult for anyone to appreciate the change unless they had observed it. For instance, when I started to work in the mines it was lawful to work children at any age at all. I was more fortunate myself in that I was not compelled to go into the mine until I was 12 years of age, but sometimes they started to work when they were but 8 years old. However, I worked two years on a farm, and so I did not go into the mines until I was 12.

Now, in Illinois they are not permitted to work in the mines until they are 16. The wages of their fathers are sufficient to take the boys and give them opportunities they could not have had years ago.

Now, as to the moral elevation of the workers, I think that if sociologists, and if scientists, were asked they would agree that a reduction in the hours of labor means an advancement in the moral and intellectual standard of the people. I think that it is the uniform testimony of the scientific men who have investigated the subject. The miners of Illinois when I was a boy worked from 12 to 13 hours a day; they now work a maximum of 8 hours a day.

May I point out this result? In the early days of mining drinking was quite the custom of miners. It was one of those trades in which drinking was quite the custom. I recall when I went to Colorado, when I was 16 years of age, and went into the mining camp, and at that time I did not drink, I was regarded then with disfavor and referred to as a "sissy" coming out of the East because I could not and would not drink. That is all changed. After the United Mine Workers of America had become strong and wages had been advanced until they were tolerably reasonable, the mine workers of Illinois voted every saloon out of the country. In those particular counties the miners were in an overwhelming majority—in some instances as high as 95 per cent were miners—and in those districts the saloons were voted out of existence, and in the State of Ohio in nine counties the miners were in the majority and voted the saloons in those counties out of existence. In some places they have been voted back. I speak of this as an indication of the attempt on the part of the miners to drive out of the industry the sources of evil, and this is typified by the southern Illinois miners voting the saloons out of business.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. I understood you to say in the first part of your testimony that the union should have greater responsibility. Do you mean by that that the union should be incorporated, so that thereby they should be more responsible, or in other ways?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I mean that in contracting with employers a great degree of responsibility—the greatest degree of responsibility should be placed on the union. Instead of withholding responsibility, the employer should insist on responsibility; that is to say, the contract should be drawn in such a way that the union is made morally responsible for its observance, so that the union men could not say, if the contract were violated, that it was because they had no responsibility.

Commissioner BALLARD. You are not in favor, then, of the incorporation of the unions in order to make them financially responsible?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think incorporation gives financial responsibility or creates financial responsibility. As a matter of fact, I understand that firms incorporate not to give but to limit responsibility. That is the purpose of the incorporation; to limit financial responsibility and not to increase it.

Commissioner BALLARD. It is to limit individual responsibility, but to increase collective responsibility?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not to limit financial responsibility, because the financial responsibility is limited by the amount of the incorporation—of the capital stock.

Commissioner BALLARD. You are not in favor of that incorporation?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it would lead to no good purpose and would lead to bad purposes.

Commissioner BALLARD. Don't you feel that a vast and powerful organization like the United Mine Workers of America, with its 400,000 members, and their large financial contributions monthly—don't you think that gives it a power to coerce individual employers who are perhaps not in so powerful an organization and not able to withstand them?

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean employers who have contracts with the union?

Commissioner BALLARD. I mean, does it not give the union the power to enforce or coerce employers and dominate them under those circumstances?

Mr. MITCHELL. They can not do that because the small employer has the same contract with the union as has the large employer; it is not made with the small employer, but with the employers collectively. But, if you referred to employers whose men are not members of the union, of course, powerful organizations have funds to prosecute the work of the organization, but the operations of the union would not be involved in that question because, whether incorporated or not, they would legally and morally have the right to try to organize the men in that trade.

Commissioner BALLARD. It does not take very long for the average immigrant to become a coal miner, does it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, it takes a long time for him to become a skilled coal miner. He does become a coal miner without any experience at all; that is, is given work in the mines.

Commissioner BALLARD. I mean, with the unlimited and unrestricted immigration we have, and the fact that the miners' union has raised conditions and shortened hours, and raised wages, does that not present a very tempting thing for the average immigrant to try to get into, and does that not have a tendency to overrun the unions, and how does the union prevent so many men coming in that there would not be more workers than there is work?

Mr. MITCHELL. They do not do it; there are more workers than there is work. The number of average days that the union men work is 200 in a year. I think during 15 years it will not average to exceed 200 days a year. There have always been employed in the mines one-third more men than necessary to produce the amount of coal consumed in the United States and exported from it, and it is an industry that is at all times overrun with workers; but the union does not attempt to prevent it. The union admits to membership anyone who comes, and they do not attempt to prevent men from securing employment. Of course, I say the industry is made up very largely of non-English speaking immigrants.

Commissioner BALLARD. I asked the question of Mr. Lawson the other day and he answered it very comprehensively as to checkweighmen; that is, his idea was that they wanted checkweighmen because—in order that the individual men might be treated fairly?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; they wanted checkweighmen in order that he might see the coal weighed and that he might make a record of it. The company's weighman carries one sheet and the checkweighman carries another sheet, and they compare their sheets, and they must be alike or otherwise there has been a mistake somewhere, and that has been a demand on the part of the miners for so long back that I can not remember, and the laws of practically every State in the United States provide that miners shall be permitted to employ checkweighmen.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson has a few questions to ask.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Mitchell, in your opinion, when the law as personified in the State fails to perform or to furnish—fails to furnish the protection that the law guarantees to the individual, what usually happens?

Mr. MITCHELL. The men take the law in their own hands. That has been the story all through history, that men have attempted to make laws for themselves in their own way. As a rule, every great advance in human betterment has been accompanied by failure to observe law. Historically, I should say that nearly every step that has been made in human progress has been the result of failure to observe law: I suppose the American Government was founded on refusal to observe law. [Applause.]

Chairman WALSH. Will that gentleman retire who started that, please? If that occurs again, I will have to ask that you be escorted from the room by the sergeant at arms. We do not allow anything like that.

A VOICE FROM THE AUDIENCE. I did not know the rule.

Chairman WALSH. Preserve perfect order, please. Please proceed, Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. MITCHELL. Slavery was abolished through a violation of law. The conspiracy laws of the United States and of the State—I will not say of the United States, but the conspiracy laws of the States of this Union were repealed because men refused to obey them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. As lawbreakers—assuming that law has been broken, whether it was or not, was the assembling or enlisting of a large body of men, armed and paid by the mine owners, exactly equivalent and a fair parallel with what would have taken place had men in large numbers answered the call to arms that was issued by the miners in Colorado?

Mr. MITCHELL. Why, I should think that precisely the same question was involved—whether technically one was kept within the law and the other outside of it, but surely when a mine guard, paid by the coal companies—when mine guards paid by the coal companies were given suits—given the uniform of State troops and given arms to go out and represent the State of Colorado, that in that instance there was a most flagrant violation of law—that it violated the spirit of the law, whether it violated technically the letter of the law I do not know, but I have never in all my life heard of a proceeding that was so contrary to a true and proper conception of law as putting a soldier's uniform on a private guard and letting him go out and perform the functions of the State.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Great emphasis has been placed before this commission by many witnesses in regard to the incorporation of unions on the ground that it constitutes a means whereby legal liability could be placed upon the unions. Have you ever known of an instance where a union has brought legal proceedings for damages against an incorporation or individual employer for damage suffered during a lockout?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know of one instance.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, in regard to one or two social questions. There has been a great deal of testimony given here in regard to the so-called beneficial or philanthropic phases of benefit schemes originated by individual employers. Do you believe that any system of social insurance, whether—well, with one exception, and that is the payment of death benefits—can be properly and equitably applied, except under State supervision, and I am using "State" in its broadest sense; can it have value if it depends upon, at any rate, faithful or loyal service?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that the private benefaction, the undertaking of various systems of benefits by employers themselves, have this very great element of weakness: What it is within the power to give is within the power to withhold or withdraw. Therefore the workmen have no guaranty at all that these so-called benefactions will continue for any given length of time. They will probably continue during good behavior and be withdrawn at the wish or will of the employer, and therefore, I think, they can not be of the greatest permanent value; and I repeat again that I want to give full credit to the employers who do introduce systems helpful to the employees, but if they expect or hope that such private benefactions will prove a substitute for collective bargaining and for trade-unionism, then they are in error, because they will not prove a substitute. They may for a period, but ultimately the workers will assert their right to organize; that is, they will assert their right to a real voice, an effective voice, in determining the conditions of their labor.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does not any such system founded upon tenure reflect an attitude of the employer which is vicious and unwise?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I think it is. I think it is an attempt to hold the worker to his job, and, of course, that has been, from the very beginning of history, in some form or another—the desire has been to compel workers to stay at their jobs, whether it be in the days when all labor was performed by slaves or whether it be in the period when men were tied to the land in the feudal ages or whether it be now at this present time, attempts are constantly being made to compel the workmen to stay on their job.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Great stress has been laid upon various forms of industrial and social legislation that have been enacted in the past few years for the benefit of workers. I assume your experience as a labor unionist has impressed the history of such legislation in this country upon your mind?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I have some knowledge of it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, in your experience what has been the greatest agency in causing agitation for and the securing of improvement in labor conditions?

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, trades-unionism. There is no question about it. There is not one bit of legislation for protecting the workingmen on the statutes of any of the States that did not have its inception in the minds of organized wage earners. It is true that the workers have received and are now receiving splendid aid from other associations. Other associations of men and women have aided and are aiding in securing excellent remedial legislation. But it is the wage earners who have inspired such legislation; it was they who initiated it; it was they who secured its passage.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, on one other subject: In your experience in dealing with the problems that confront laboring men have you found any greater factor in creating the evils to which labor is subjected than the one of want of continuity of employment?

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, I think that the irregular employment and lack of security in their employment have contributed more to unrest than anything else I can now think of, of course, except this, and it is related to it: I think the great cause of unrest in America, and perhaps among the workers of the world, is the inequitable distribution of wealth; and that, of course, is caused partly by irregularity in employment and, of course, by low wages.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But accepting the industrial condition as we have it, you would assume the other to be one of the most potent factors in the creation of the causes as they do exist?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I would think it was a very great factor.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell says he has one or two questions to ask.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I had a whole list of questions here, Mr. Mitchell, but they have all talked them out. But I have one here that I wish to refer to in regard to organizations being incorporated and so becoming liable. There have been such things as organizations being held liable to the employer without being incorporated, for instance, in the case of the hatters.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, yes; the hatters is a case in point, where the union members were sued, by decision of the United States Supreme Court affirming the award made against them running into something like $300,000.

I have just been a witness in a suit in which a lawyer sues the United Mine Workers of America for $200,000; and his right to sue was not denied. I think we would have won the case on its merits. He was thrown out of court simply on the ground that he had not properly brought his suit; but the right to pursue the United Mine Workers of America for $200,000, even though they be an unincorporated organization, was not denied.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There have been a number of suits instituted against the organization, have there not, in the years gone by, and during the time in which you were president of the United Mine Workers of America, for larger sums than that?

Mr. MITCHELL. And in Colorado where there were suits instituted against the United Mine Workers of America for half a million dollars. It was settled out of court, but it was not settled out of court because there was any denial of the right of the companies to sue.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Chairman, one other question along that line: Have you any knowledge from your actual experience in the services of the State as to the fact that fraternal insurance companies unincorporated are regularly sued in the courts for the recovery of certificates or policies which they issue?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; that is my information, although I do not know so much about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Mitchell, if you were a member of this commission and, as we are instructed by Congress to recommend some remedial legislation for industrial unrest, what would be your recommendation along that line?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, gentlemen, I should regard that as the most difficult of all the questions you have asked me to-day. I think that Congress should do a good many things—not to prevent unrest, but to direct unrest into wise and into constructive channels. For instance, I think that Congress should pass the law now pending prohibiting the transportation of goods made by children in interstate commerce. I think that is one of the things that they should do.

After some reflection, and I say this yet with some qualifications, I think Congress should create a permanent commission that would have power to mediate in industrial disputes. I think a commission of high-class men—representative men—having authority from the Federal Government to investigate a pending industrial dispute or a dispute that has arisen, and endeavoring to do what it could to adjust the question in controversy, would be of value, and that it would be attended by few dangers.

I think that the functions of these great foundations should be so defined by law that they would be compelled to limit their activities in harmony with the charters under which they were founded.

I think perhaps it would be of great advantage if corporations doing an interstate business would be required to make periodical reports as to the number of their employees and hours of labor and wages paid to these employees in such divisions or classifications as to give the public a real understanding of what wages the men were paid. I have observed the testimony put in before this commission, saying, for instance, that the workmen receive an average of so much—that their employees received an average of so many hundred dollars a year. But unless the papers have failed to report fully the proceedings, it did not indicate what employees received these wages. Perhaps the president of the company may have been classed as an employee in the schedule of earnings filed with the commission.

I think that the State governments should establish a minimum rate of wage for women and minors. I think that the State should limit the hours of labor of men. I believe that they should limit to eight the number of hours which any man may be employed in industry; and I think the Government itself should see that its eight-hour law is made or extended so as to include materials purchased for the Government. As an illustration of that, I think that when the United States Government purchases its fuel supply it ought to be required to purchase that supply from companies whose men work eight hours a day instead of doing, as it now does, pass by the 75 per cent of mine owners whose men work 8 hours a day and go to the few miners whose men work 10 hours a day to buy their coal for the Government. I have not in mind just now other suggestions which I think would be of value.

Commissioner LENNON. What about vocational education?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I think our Government should take up systematically the question of vocational training. In other words, I think that our school system should be so remodeled as to provide—particularly in the high schools—for courses of technical training that would give to the boy or girl who is going into industry the same advantages that are now given by the high schools to the boy or girl going into the professions. The children of the workmen are at a very great disadvantage, inasmuch as there is no training for them in the high-school system unless perchance for those who are to enter the professions.

Commissioner LENNON. You mean, too, when you speak of legislation which should prohibit, you mean that you would prohibit the interstate transportation of armored guards?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would. I testified before the congressional committee investigating the Colorado strike. I testified there that in my judgment the Federal Government should prohibit the interstate transportation of armored guards.

Commissioner LENNON. And that would apply to private detective agencies?

Mr. MITCHELL. It would.

Commissioner LENNON. And apply to detective agencies of all kinds except those otherwise by law authorized to go from State to State?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. You would prohibit by legislation the transportation of persons from one State to another unless their purpose was legalized by law; in other words, was not illegal?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you. You will be excused permanently.

Mr. Morgan.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN PIERPONT MORGAN.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in order so that we may proceed with the hearing.

Will you please state your name?

Mr. MORGAN. John Pierpont Morgan.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. MORGAN. New York.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. MORGAN. Banker.

Chairman WALSH. In what corporations are you a director at the present time?

Mr. MORGAN. I am a director of the United States Steel Corporation, the Northern Pacific Railway, and the International Mercantile Marine, the Pullman Co.; I do not think of any others at the moment.

Chairman WALSH. The Western Union?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been a director in the Western Union?

Mr. MORGAN. I was for a short time; yes.

Chairman WALSH. In what other corporations do you own or represent any considerable amount of stock?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know, sir. Represent in what way do you mean?

Chairman WALSH. Well, in any way that you might as a banker habitually have as collateral. I would suggest as one way?

Mr. MORGAN. It would be a very long list. I could not give list without going to the books and make up a list of the people that borrow on stocks and have them on deposit with us. It would be too long for any use.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have in mind what you might call the principal ones; the largest ones?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. That you say you habitually represent?

Mr. MORGAN. No; we have large numbers of people, clients that hold New York Central stock and Southern stock and the Erie stock and a dozen or fifty corporations.

Chairman WALSH. Please outline briefly the character of your connection with all the corporations in which you are interested; begin with your own banking company first.

Mr. MORGAN. I am a partner; it is not a company, it is a firm.

Chairman WALSH. A partnership?

Mr. MORGAN. A partnership firm. I am a director of the companies I gave you the names of.

Chairman WALSH. Are you on any executive committees or finance committees of any of these companies?

Mr. MORGAN. I am on the executive committee of the steel company and of the Pullman Co.

Chairman WALSH. What is the business—

Mr. MORGAN (interrupting). And of the International Mercantile Marine.

Chairman WALSH. What is the business of the International Mercantile Marine?

Mr. MORGAN. The International Mercantile Marine, it is the owner of stock in certain steamship companies and the owner of some steamships directly.

Chairman WALSH. What steamship companies is it an owner of?

Mr. MORGAN. A line, the White Star Line, the Dominion Line, and a certain amount of stock in the Leland Line, and it is the American Line; it holds those steamers directly, and the Atlantic Transport Line. There may be one or two other smaller companies that I do not now recall.

Chairman WALSH. How many employees would you say there are in the International Mercantile Marine and in those companies in which it owns the stock?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not an idea, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I could not approximate it.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give it within thousands?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever made any inquiry, Mr. Morgan, to ascertain?

Mr. MORGAN. The total number? No.

Chairman WALSH. What is the Millbrook Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. The Millbrook Co.? The Millbrook Co. was a company that was formed by the New Haven road, I believe, about 1906 or 1907; but that I have no interest in.

Chairman WALSH. Were you ever a director in that company?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Are you on any committee of the Northern Pacific Railway Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. No. I have been on it, but I am not on it at the moment.

Chairman WALSH. What committee did you serve on?

Mr. MORGAN. On the executive committee there.

Chairman WALSH. How many employees would you say that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. had?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know, sir. That is all a matter of publication.

Chairman WALSH. Could you tell within thousands?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I have not an idea. I have not made an inquiry about it.

Chairman WALSH. How many employees has the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. And its subsidiary companies?

Chairman WALSH. And its subsidiary companies.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe somewhere about 170,000 at the moment.

Chairman WALSH. And how many employees has the Pullman Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. That I do not know either.

Chairman WALSH. First, as a director in the International Merchant Marine, do you receive reports which give you information regarding the conditions, financial and otherwise?

Mr. MORGAN. Financial condition; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And what other reports do you receive? Does the financial report contain a report of all of their activities?

Mr. MORGAN. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Do you receive any reports other than financial reports?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not see any.

Chairman WALSH. What report do you receive in your capacity as a director in the Northern Pacific Railway?

Mr. MORGAN. I read the minutes of the executive committee, and we receive reports of the officers and financial reports and the report of general conditions along the line.

Chairman WALSH. What is the report of general conditions; what does it consist of?

Mr. MORGAN. Condition of the prospect for business, crop outlook, and all that sort of thing which has to do with the railroad.

Chairman WALSH. How do those reports come to you, Mr. Morgan?

Mr. MORGAN. They come to us at the meeting; the financial report I get by mail.

Chairman WALSH. Now, would you please indicate again fully the character of the reports that come to you at the meetings that do not come through the mail—financial reports, for example?

Mr. MORGAN. The minutes of the executive committee, which are read and approved or disapproved and commented on; they are general reports from the officers of the company on the conditions of business along the line and the prospect for the line, and what it needs.

Chairman WALSH. Includes sales?

Mr. MORGAN. Sales of land.

Chairman WALSH. Anything else?

Mr. MORGAN. That is all the Northern Pacific has to sell, except transportation, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the United States Steel Corporation—what general reports do you get from that company aside from financial reports?

Mr. MORGAN. We get reports of orders in hand, get reports of how the business is going, reports on anything that comes up in the management of the subsidiary companies about which they wish information of the finance committee.

Chairman WALSH. In the annual reports of the United States Steel Corporation do you get the physical condition of the plants and what might be called an inventory of its property?

Mr. MORGAN. That is all in the annual report.

Chairman WALSH. That is all in the annual report?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you do not get that in any other reports that you recall?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I do not know anything more than we get in the annual reports.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand you to say that you held some position on a committee in the Pullman Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but that is—the amount of work done there is very small.

Chairman WALSH. What position do you hold in that company?

Mr. MORGAN. Simply I am one of the directors, and on the finance committee and executive committee.

Chairman WALSH. What is the function of the finance committee of the Pullman Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. To hear financial reports.

Chairman WALSH. Anything else?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not—the meetings that I have been to, I have only been on that for a year or a little more, and the meetings that I have been to there has been nothing but that.

Chairman WALSH. The financial report of the Pullman Co.; does that contain a statement as to the amount and the physical condition of its property?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the number of cars on the road and all that part of the business; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And indicates the cars that it has built and the number they have to propose to build, and such matters as that?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many meetings of the board of directors of the International Mercantile Marine have you attended during the year 1914?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know. They meet approximately once a month and the executive committee, the finance committee, meets once a week, and when I am here on the Tuesday that it meets I always go.

Chairman WALSH. And as a member of the board of directors how many would you say you have attended during the year 1914?

Mr. MORGAN. During the year I should think I probably attended, if there were 12, I probably attended 10 of them.

Chairman WALSH. Now, some questions as to the United States Steel Corporation:

How many would you say you have attended during the year 1914?

Mr. MORGAN. Probably the same amount. They come on the same day of the week.

Chairman WALSH. And the Pullman?

Mr. MORGAN. The Pullman meetings come less often—about three or four meetings.

Chairman WALSH. Take the case of the International Mercantile Marine; how long do those meetings last?

Mr. MORGAN. They may last half an hour or they may last five minutes or they may last an hour, depending upon what comes up for discussion.

Chairman WALSH. How many—it would range somewhere between five minutes and an hour, I take it?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; probably.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. MORGAN. The finance committee meeting takes about the same time. They never take so little as five minutes; take from 20 minutes to an hour.

Chairman WALSH. And the directors' meetings?

Mr. MORGAN. The directors' meetings vary, depending on how much business there is to come before them; perhaps half an hour.

Chairman WALSH. And you probably in the United States Steel Corporation devote altogether during the year probably 12 or 15 hours, if added together, to the meetings?

Mr. MORGAN. That is, at the meetings; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And outside of the meetings?

Mr. MORGAN. No, wait a minute. Fifty-two weeks in the year, the finance committee meets every week; the finance committee meetings take at last half an hour, I should think.

Chairman WALSH. That committee meets every week?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I will leave the finance committee out for the moment and take the directors' meeting.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You have probably attended 10 of them?

Mr. MORGAN. Probably.

Chairman WALSH. And ranging from five minutes to—

Mr. MORGAN. The directors' meeting probably lasted on an average of 25 minutes to a half an hour.

Chairman WALSH. A half an hour?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, you have attended during the time you were in the city practically all of the meetings of the finance committee?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And those are weekly meetings?

Mr. MORGAN. Those are weekly meetings.

Chairman WALSH. Now, between the meetings, what duties do you perform, if any, as a director of the United States Steel Corporation or a member of the finance committee?

Mr. MORGAN. I am on call if the officers wish to discuss anything at any time, and they often do.

Chairman WALSH. They frequently discuss business policies?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; frequently. That sort of thing, of course, is always done.

Chairman WALSH. And about how frequently, how general, is it? Is it a matter of daily consultation of some sort?

Mr. MORGAN. No. It depends on what is going on. If there is anything very important that may come up there is no reason for waiting for a meeting; we go around and see the people and talk it over.

Chairman WALSH. So that sort of work, I would take it, some duty in connection with this, is almost part of your daily business life?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. If I am called upon, it would be, and I have been on tap for that.

Chairman WALSH. You are called on quite frequently?

Mr. MORGAN. Quite often; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make it a practice to visit the plants of corporations in which you are interested and make personal inquiry and observation in regard to the conditions in the plant?

Mr. MORGAN. The conditions of what kind, sir?

Chairman WALSH. Of any sort; do you visit the plants?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I haven't visited all of them; I have visited some of them.

Chairman WALSH. What factories or railroads have you personally inspected during the past year?

Mr. MORGAN. During the year 1914? I do not think in 1914 I inspected any.

Chairman WALSH. Did you inspect any during the year 1913?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. Please name any factories or mines or railroads that you have personally inspected during the past five years.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been over the Gary mills, the Gary plant of the steel company, the Edgar-Thompson Works and other works of the Carnegie Steel Co. I have been over the tube works at Pittsburgh. I have not inspected the Northern Pacific Railroad, but I have been over several of the ships of the International Mercantile Marine and various companies. I have been on some of them and inspected some of them.

Chairman WALSH. Outside of the ships, have you visited within the past, during the past, five years any more than once?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, Mr. Morgan, to what extent, first, are the stockholders of corporations responsible for the labor conditions that exist in the industry?

Mr. MORGAN. The labor conditions—meaning what—wages paid?

Chairman WALSH. Meaning the wages paid, the conditions under which the work is performed, their work, hours that they work, and everything pertaining to their welfare so far as the industry itself is concerned?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not see the stockholders have anything—any responsibility in that matter.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, to what extent are the directors of corporations responsible for the labor conditions existing in the industries in which they are the directing power?

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all, I should say.

Chairman WALSH. In so far, then, as the stockholders and directors may not be responsible, whom do you consider to be responsible?

Mr. MORGAN. The officers.

Chairman WALSH. That is, do you mean by that the executive officers of the organization?

Mr. MORGAN. The executive officials or the people that they appoint to take charge of that work.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, can the executive officials appoint persons to take charge of that matter—I am referring now to labor conditions and the welfare of the workers—and thus discharge their direct responsibility?

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is their responsibility. They have got to see that those people carry out the idea.

Chairman WALSH. Then not only, in your opinion, would they appoint them but also have the general direction of them?

Mr. MORGAN. Obviously; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And overseeing?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What scope of authority do you, as director, give them to establish and maintain proper labor conditions?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not quite grasp that.

Chairman WALSH. What is the scope of authority given to the executive officials in the corporations in which you are a director so far as labor conditions are concerned? Do you plan out a certain maximum or minimum, or do you give any clue or limitation to the authority that they have in regard to labor conditions—that is, salaries, hours, condition of labor?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I should say that they had entire authority about that. Though, of course, if they wanted advice or opinion or help or counsel about it at all, they certainly would go to the directors for it, and if consulted the directors would advise to the best of their ability, no doubt; but the responsibility, the officers of the company are held responsible, in my opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Do you give any such officials equal scope without accounting in financial matters or in the other phases of the plan of the corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. Equal scope without accounting?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; without an accounting; or do you just simply, in other words, to make it clear, or do you simply say, "You look after the labor conditions, the conditions of labor, in your own way," or do you hold them to any accounting?

Mr. MORGAN. They are accountable for the results. They would, of course, be responsible for labor conditions, for the financial conditions; in both cases they would probably discuss; certainly in the financial question, because the directors are responsible for financial conditions, for the finances of the company, and there the committee would at least be responsible.

Chairman WALSH. Have you finished?

Mr. MORGAN. But the labor conditions, they are not responsible for that—the directors; the officers are.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state what reports you get from your executive officers in detail that would cover the labor conditions as they do the financial condition—the physical condition of the plant, as you describe it—in the Pullman Co. and the United States Steel Co.

Mr. MORGAN. I should not expect a report from them of that sort at all.

Chairman WALSH. Why not?

Mr. MORGAN. Because, in the first place, the circumstances do not change constantly, as they do with the financial situation.

Chairman WALSH. How do you know?

Mr. MORGAN. And when there is one change they make they ask about it, talk about it, and if it is desirable to talk about.

Chairman WALSH. You say there are not constant changes in labor conditions?

Mr. MORGAN. Not the same way that there is in financial conditions. We don't have to have weekly reports of labor conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact, Mr. Morgan, that that policy is adopted by directors merely because it has been a custom or habit in these larger corporations, in industry, so and so to do?

Mr. MORGAN. The policy is adopted by the directors because that is the natural way of running the company.

Chairman WALSH. Why is it the natural way—because a great many other people have done it?

Mr. MORGAN. Because—

Chairman WALSH. Determine it as a policy themselves?

Mr. MORGAN. Because the directors determine the policy. Their duty to the stockholders is to select, as far as they know it, the proper men to run the company, and then let the people run it.

Chairman WALSH. What instruction, if any, have been given the executive officials in the companies in which you are a director that proper labor conditions must be maintained—that is, that living wages must be paid, that the hours of labor shall not be too exacting to the persons in it, and that sanitary conditions shall be observed, proper sanitary conditions? Do you give any general orders of that kind to your executive officials?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you give them, in a general way, orders with reference to the conservation of the financial resources of the concern?

Mr. MORGAN. Those resources have to come before the directors to be sent, of course.

Chairman WALSH. You do give them directions with reference to the—

Mr. MORGAN. I should think so.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of fact, Mr. Morgan, are not labor conditions the only matters under the control of the executive officials which are not subject to constant audit and check of some sort?

Mr. MORGAN. That question is very limiting, and I should have to think it over.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I will come back to the specific questions that I have to ask, and they will probably elucidate it.

Do you not require as a director a balance sheet of profit-and-loss account showing in detail the disposition of all financial matters?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not require cost-of-production sheets showing comparative costs of different plants in different years?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you require periodical inspection of machinery and reports to you?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you require periodical inspection of material?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you require periodical inspection and inventories of all assets?

Mr. MORGAN. Those come into the balance sheet.

Chairman WALSH. So they do require those?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, can you think of any condition in the plants, in your industrial plants, in which you are a director, that are not held under your control through the executive officials by constant audit and checks except labor conditions?

Mr. MORGAN. If I have given the impression that we do not know anything about the labor conditions, that the board of directors do not know anything about them, I have given you an erroneous one. We feel we are informed about them, but they don't come in in the balance sheet, the financial statement, and we are constantly in touch with the way the men are working, how the things are going along, what arrangements are had with the men.

Chairman WALSH. Are those reports made in writing in any instance in the Pullman Co. or the United States Steel Corporation or the International Mercantile Marine?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I should think not.

Chairman WALSH. Would the minutes of the executive committee, the finance committee, or the board of directors show either any report as to the labor conditions or any action taken by those various bodies as to labor conditions?

Mr. MORGAN. They would show wherever there was a question of a raise in wages to come up in the steel company; for instance, the finance committee would pass on it. But that would show in those minutes.

Chairman WALSH. Would the minutes show anything else except that?

Mr. MORGAN. That I can not tell you what the minutes will show.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly, Mr. Morgan, have submitted to this commission an extract from any of the minutes of the Pullman Co. that would show anything regarding labor conditions in the plant, in the Pullman Co., and likewise the extracts from any of the minutes of the International Mercantile Co. that would show reports on labor conditions, or action by the board of directors upon the same? We would not ask you to bring all the minutes in.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a good, long undertaking, but they are there and I can get them, I think.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would. I do not expect you to produce them while you are on the stand.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. But we will have our investigator call upon you so that he may make arrangements to have them submitted so that they may get into our records.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know. It is a question whether the Pullman Co. will give me access to the past records, way back.

Chairman WALSH. If they do not, please indicate to the investigator who refuses to give you such access.

Mr. MORGAN. I think that probably can be arranged.

Chairman WALSH. We must not have any audible expression if this hearing is to be continued, ladies and gentlemen.

According to such standards as you can determine, what would you consider to be the proper labor conditions as regards the following points: Length of working day?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know. I have not an opinion on that matter.

Chairman WALSH. The income for an unskilled workman?

Mr. MORGAN. There again I have no opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that $10 a week is sufficient compensation for a longshoreman?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know Capt. John Watson?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't think I do.

Chairman WALSH. Ever hear of him?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. It seems to me that he is at the head of one of your departments, if I remember, of the International Mercantile Marine, and our record seems to show that he said that the wages of longshoremen were from $10 to $12 a week. Do you think $10 a week is enough for a longshoreman to earn?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know, sir. If that is all he can get and he takes it, I should think it was enough.

Chairman WALSH. Ladies and gentlemen, we must have perfect order or we will have to adjourn this examination now and continue this at some other time. There must be no audible expression of feeling.

According to such standards as you may determine, what would you consider to be a proper age or conditions under which children should be employed in your industries?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not any definite opinion about that. It is a question of facts and the kind of industry and the hours of the employment and the whole thing.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will take the—

Mr. MORGAN (interrupting). Any more than I should say the later the better.

Chairman WALSH. The later the better?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you thought of any age limit that should be fixed upon the permission of the child in any industry?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Have you thought of the length of workday that children should be permitted to labor?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. According to such standards as you can determine, do you believe that it is proper to have a rule in any industry prohibiting the employment of unskilled workmen over 35 years of age and skilled workmen over the age of 45?

Mr. MORGAN. That would be a question I would refer to the people who were running the industry.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true in the American Steel & Wire Co. and other subsidiary companies of the United States Steel Corporation that there is a printed rule not to employ any unskilled workman over 35 years of age?

Mr. MORGAN. I could not say.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that would be a good rule socially?

Mr. MORGAN. That is purely a matter of opinion.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion?

Mr. MORGAN. I haven't any. The question of fact—

Chairman WALSH. If you were convinced that labor conditions in any of the corporations in which you are interested were such that workmen were unable to support their families without putting their wives and younger children to work, and if the nature of the employment resulted in industrial disease, or if the accident rate was excessive as compared with other corporations, what action would you take?

Mr. MORGAN. I should do my best to get the conditions remedied.

Chairman WALSH. How would you find out whether they existed in the industry in which you were a director?

Mr. MORGAN. You will find that out from the officers.

Chairman WALSH. And after you found it out what would you do?

Mr. MORGAN. I would consult with the officers and consult with the members and do all in my power to see that those conditions should be changed.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever make any inquiry into the shipping interests, for instance, into the wages of longshoremen?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I never have.

Chairman WALSH. Well, have you ever seen or has it ever been placed before you as a director in this company as to the wages that the longshoremen receive?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed whether or not their labor was laborious?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not the longshoreman's work is extra fatiguing?

Mr. MORGAN. Judging from what I have seen of him when I have seen him at work I should say it might be fatiguing; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know the number of hours that men work in the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. It varies in the different places.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know how many of them work 12 hours a day?

Mr. MORGAN. No; there are a certain number that do.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not think that is too long or too short a number of hours for a man to work in a day, please?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know; I can not answer that question.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been present at a meeting of the directors or at a meeting of any of these corporations in which you were a director in which the labor policies to be pursued by the corporation either during a strike or during normal times was being discussed?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't remember. You say either during a strike or during normal times?

Chairman WALSH. Either during a strike or during normal times when labor policies were being discussed?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, take it first during a strike. When were you present during a strike when labor policies were being discussed?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not been present during a strike. You asked as to both.

Chairman WALSH. Well, take it during normal times.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been present many times.

Chairman WALSH. When was the last one?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not able to recall exactly.

Chairman WALSH. Was it during 1914?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And with what corporation were you dealing?

Mr. MORGAN. Undoubtedly the United States Steel Corporation.

Chairman WALSH. Any other during that year?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't recall any other.

Chairman WALSH. In which of the corporations in which you are interested are the employees organized?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether there are organizations of unions in any of the corporations in which you are interested?

Mr. MORGAN. I presume on the Northern Pacific there are; but I don't know which ones there are and which are not.

Chairman WALSH. How about the shipping interests?

Mr. MORGAN. There is a certain amount—there is an organization or there are organizations among them, I know in England, and, I think, here, too; but I don't know the details of it.

Chairman WALSH. You know that the Union Pacific has several organizations, do you not?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know anything about the Union Pacific.

Chairman WALSH. The Northern Pacific, I should say.

Mr. MORGAN. Very possibly; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not they deal with the order of railway conductors?

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose they do; but I don't know about it.

Chairman WALSH. At the meeting of the board of directors have labor conditions upon that road ever been discussed?

Mr. MORGAN. Not that I remember—when I was there.

Chairman WALSH. What have been the effects of such organizations, in so far as you are informed, in those companies in which they exist?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know that; I don't know which companies they exist in.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward the organization of employees for what they may deem to be their own protection and the advancement of their own interests?

Mr. MORGAN. What do you mean, my attitude toward it?

Chairman WALSH. Are you in favor of the men organizing in industry, or are you opposed to it?

Mr. MORGAN. Why I am not opposed to anything they want to do that is lawful and proper.

Chairman WALSH. Is that as definite as you care to be about it, Mr. Morgan?

Mr. MORGAN. I can not answer that question without knowing the surrounding circumstances. A general statement like that I can not make any specific answer to.

Chairman WALSH. First, as a director, do you have any objection to the men being organized in the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. Organized inside of the corporation itself?

Chairman WALSH. The employees of the Steel Corporation, the laborers and skilled workmen, have you any objection to their being organized so that they may deal with your company collectively, en masse, as it were, instead of individually?

Mr. MORGAN. As long as they are employed by the corporation, no; I don't care one way or the other.

Chairman WALSH. If they are not employed by the corporation do you have objection to their interfering with the plan?

Mr. MORGAN. I certainly do.

Chairman WALSH. Is it the fact that the United States Steel Corporation has been largely responsible for the breaking down of the following unions: The Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, the Seaman's Union of the Great Lakes, and the Structural Iron Workers?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not even know they had broken down, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether they were employed by the Steel Corporation or not—members of those organizations?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward permitting the union organizers not employed by your corporation to address employees and otherwise carry on their work?

Mr. MORGAN. Why, if they want to do it—I couldn't object to their doing anything they have a right to do; but I should object to their coming in on the corporation's property and doing that.

Chairman WALSH. Or the corporation's time?

Mr. MORGAN. Or the corporation's time.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that under existing conditions the rights and interests of the employees of corporations receive proper recognition and due protection?

Mr. MORGAN. I should think so; yes.

Chairman WALSH. As a result of your observation and experience, do you believe that industrial discontent in America is increasing or decreasing?

Mr. MORGAN. Industrial discontent—how do you mean—the dissatisfaction?

Chairman WALSH. The dissatisfaction and protest against conditions, whether based upon fact or not.

Mr. MORGAN. Well now, excuse me; I want to get at the question.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion on the whole matter? We put it to you as a gentleman engaged in large operations and large duties and responsibilities. So we ask you that, from your experience, of course, and your observation.

Mr. MORGAN. It seems to me that the conditions are improving; that a great deal is being done, and, therefore, I suppose, that the discontent will decrease; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Please tell me what has been done. What has been done, say, within the past five years that had not been done theretofore that you believe is operating to bring about conditions which should decrease discontent among the working classes?

Mr. MORGAN. I was thinking of the Steel Corporation.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. There they have spent very large amounts of money on additional safety appliances and proper houses for workmen, in the mines particularly, and in all sorts of ways. Whenever there is any opportunity of getting more safety or respectability of work in there, there has never been any question about it at all. It has always been voted at once; and I think that has all helped. I think the men employed by the Steel Corporation feel friendly toward the corporation because they feel the corporation meets them on the best ground it can. And more than once since I have been director in the corporation and before that several times, wages have been raised without any question of a strike or attack at all.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that the wealth produced in the United States is generally distributed in proportion to the value to society of the services performed?

Mr. MORGAN. That is too big a question for me. I could not answer that.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever study that or kindred questions—

Mr. MORGAN (interrupting). No.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). From the standpoint of citizenship or mere educational information?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. If it should be true that a very large proportion of the population fail to secure an adequate living from industry while others enjoy a superfluity, what would you say was the cause, if you have observed any cause for such condition?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not observed any cause for such condition; I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Has the extent of poverty and suffering in the United States ever been brought to your attention?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion regarding the causes of poverty, if it does exist?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not any opinion about it, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Your attention has not been called to it?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, but I haven't any opinion about it. It is a very large question.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that industrial conditions are responsible in any large measure for poverty?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I should say not.

Chairman WALSH. What have you personally done, please, Mr. Morgan, to mitigate any of the evils of society?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know, sir. I don't know whether I have done anything.

Chairman WALSH. I will suggest, please, first, contributions to philanthropic organizations and institutes?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, I don't think I can give any list of those. I have helped where I can, as most people do, I think.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. MORGAN. I say I have helped where I can, as most people do.

Chairman WALSH. Any action that you have taken as a director in any of these corporations or as a citizen to improve industrial conditions?

Mr. MORGAN. I think the actions I have taken have been in regard to the steel company. They might come in under that.

Chairman WALSH. Anything else?

Mr. MORGAN. I should not say anything else; I don't know anything else.

Chairman WALSH. And what have been the results of your efforts to improve industrial conditions? Do you think they have been improved some?

Mr. MORGAN. I think they have been improved some; yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion regarding the social desirability of heavily endowed foundations with self-perpetuating boards of trustees as a method of dealing with social conditions?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know what they can do to social conditions. If they can help, I should say they are very desirable.

Chairman WALSH. Well, can they or do they?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know. Certainly, the Rockefeller Foundation has been marvelously helpful in a great many medical directions and in a great many ways. And Mr. Carnegie's libraries have certainly helped many hundreds of people, many thousands, many millions.

Chairman WALSH. Then, I take it from that you have noticed it sufficiently to say that so far as your observation goes, they have been beneficial socially?

Mr. MORGAN. I should think so, certainly; yes.

Commissioner WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. When Mr. Untermeyer, the attorney, was on the stand, Mr. Morgan, these questions were put to him, and these were his answers, and I would like to ask in how far you agree with Mr. Untermeyer in his opinions.

"Question. You made the statement, Mr. Untermeyer, that the railways of this country, as a great body of railways of this country, are practically under the control of two financial groups.

"Answer. A large part of them are. A large part of that mileage is under the domination or under the potential domination of these groups."

Now, in how far is Mr. Untermyer correct, so far as you know, in making that statement that the railways of the country are under the domination of two financial groups?

Mr. MORGAN. I should say he was entirely incorrect.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Entirely incorrect? Well, what are the facts as you know them, Mr. Morgan?

Mr. MORGAN. What does he mean by the two financial groups, exactly?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, he did not mention the groups?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I think he finally spoke of Mr. Morgan's group and of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I don't know about Kuhn, Loeb & Co.'s business. I can not say about that. I say for ours, if we dominate the railways of the country I have never noticed it. I should like to think we did.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, what is the relationship, then, Mr. Morgan, say, between your banking house and the railroads of the country?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, we very often have been able to serve them by selling securities for them, and very often in many companies we have been directors, and in many cases we have reorganized them and started them out, and they have gone along pretty well, most of them; and when the directors or officers want advice on questions which they think we are competent to advise them on, they come and ask us. That is the only relation I know.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think in another part of Mr. Untermyer's testimony that I can not now locate, as near as I can remember, he pointed out that when a railroad gets into trouble, and there is occasion for reorganization, that one of these banking groups steps into the breach and aids in the reorganization and from that time on dominates that railroad company. Now, how far do the facts accord with that statement?

Mr. MORGAN. When you reorganize a railroad company it is necessary that the policy of that company for the first few years, at the beginning of it, should be controlled; consequently in most all occasions in my experience in a reorganization there has been a voting trust, which carries control of the company as a consistent policy throughout the first five years, and sometimes it has been extended to 10 years, at which time the voting trust terminates, and when the voting trust terminates the company runs the road from that time on.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But up to that time the financial interests would retain the control of the company?

Mr. MORGAN. After the reorganization the financial interests would feel that it was necessary for them to retain control, for the reason that they have got a lot of other people to invest in the property on their say-so, and they feel responsible to those people, and that is the only way they can carry it out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, they are under moral obligation to the investors to see that the road is properly managed?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it, Mr. Morgan, that as a man holding a position of power, trust, and responsibility, that in common with the rest of us who find ourselves in positions of responsibility, you doubtless have been a student of social and economic problems which, of course, includes the problem of problems, the labor problem?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not been a great student of those problems; I have had other problems to study, and I have not had much time to attend to those.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From what study you have been able to give to it and what observation you have been able to make along those lines, what conclusions, if any, have you come to in the matter of the organization of labor? Have you found that, as a result of your observation, the organization of labor is a good thing or a bad thing for society generally? Is it a good or bad thing for the laborer himself and society generally?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know about that; I have not made up my mind on that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have no opinion about that?

Mr. MORGAN. No definite opinion. It depends upon the organization and the laborer and who runs the organization. It depends upon so many different elements that each case must be taken by itself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Take labor organizations as found in this country at this time, and I suppose the standard organization would be the American Federation of Labor. So far as you have been able to judge, do you think the American Federation of Labor has been of advantage or of disadvantage to the workers?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know. I am not able to pass on that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you ever taken any attitude on the question of the recognition of organized labor? For example, if you were interested in an enterprise where labor was an important factor, would you or would you not recognize and deal with organized labor?

Mr. MORGAN. That would depend upon the circumstances at the time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, under what circumstances, for example, would you deal with it, and under what circumstances would you decline to deal with it?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know; I would say that I should be disinclined against labor if it came to me and said that I must employ that kind of labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would be opposed, in other words, to the closed shop?

Mr. MORGAN. Absolutely. I would be opposed to any unionist or any one else that came to me and told me who I must employ.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. We know that there are those kinds of unions that make one of the conditions the recognition of the closed shop, but there are other organizations where they do not insist on that.

Mr. MORGAN. I think there are many cases where the unions have been admirable. I can not, however, point to each one and say "That is so" and "That is so."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But, if the question of the closed shop was not in issue, would you consider what is known as collective bargaining?

Mr. MORGAN. I am anxious to know exactly what is meant by collective bargaining.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Perhaps I can make it clear. There are two kinds of bargaining with the workers. One is the individual bargain, where the employer makes his bargain with the individual separately; and there is what is known as collective bargaining, where the employer deals with a representative or a group for all.

Mr. MORGAN. A group in its own employ; that is, a group in the employ of the company?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Sometimes, and sometimes with representatives not in the employ of the company, but who represent its workers. For example, it may be the American Federation of Labor, which consists of a federation of a great many different unions in the different crafts which have what is known as union organization. Usually the local union will select as its representatives the members of the international union to deal for them and be their representatives or advocates, on the theory that these men can deal more independently than the man who is in the employ of the employer. Now, the international representatives will represent the workers in dealing with the employer for all. That is called collective bargaining, as I understand it, Mr. Morgan.

Mr. MORGAN. For all of the employers' workmen of that kind or of all kinds?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For all the employers' workmen in that particular craft. For instance, if the employees are boiler makers, then the national representatives of the boiler makers will deal with the employers, and if the employers are machinists, the national representative of the machinists will deal with the company, and so forth.

Mr. MORGAN. That would be a serious question, and I should take each case individually as it came up.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are interested in railroads, Mr. Morgan?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You know their four great federations?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I understand they have them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The conductors, the engineers, the firemen, and the brakemen?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, each craft has its own representatives who deal with the railway managers and make conditions that will apply to them.

Mr. MORGAN. That has been found to work very well with the railroads.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, as an employer, would you look with favor or with disfavor upon collective bargaining?

Mr. MORGAN. It would depend entirely upon whether that case of collective bargaining I thought infringed my right or not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There is an infringement, of course, in collective bargaining both ways; it robs the individual worker of his right to make a bargain for himself, and on the other hand it robs the employer of the right to make a bargain with any individual worker. There are concessions made on both sides. The employer agrees to make a bargain with a representative of the group.

Mr. MORGAN. As I see it, it is not a question of morals, but a question of convenience.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There is no law that compels you to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. No; and no moral law that compels you to.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; but the workers seem to believe it is in their interest and they contend also that it is in the interest of the employer to bargain with them collectively, and what I want to get at from you is whether you, as a representative financier and an employer, think favorably or unfavorably of that kind of bargaining? I want to know whether you think it would be a good thing for society, generally?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether it would be a good thing or a bad thing. If the matter was presented to me in a certain case, I would see whether I would take it up or not. It is not a moral question, and you can not make an answer to every individual case. It does not go back to principles.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; it does not go back to principles except as the workers make it a principle in that they say their only hope lies in collective bargaining. We have had coal miners tell us on the stand that they are absolutely helpless; that if a coal miner goes individually to the manager with a grievance, such as wanting to get better wages, or have his conditions improved, that he is helpless, because he can be thrown out of his employment and another man hired to replace him, but that if he can go collectively his request will receive consideration; and therefore it is in his interest that collective bargaining shall prevail.

Now, if there are serious objections to that, if that is an unwise policy and a harmful policy to society, generally, we ought to know it, and it occurred to me that, perhaps, from your experience and observation you might be able to express an opinion that would be valuable.

Mr. MORGAN. I am afraid that I can not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The contention made by a great many workers is that the men of power and the men of influence do not give sufficient thought and sufficient consideration to the condition of their workers to be able to understand them, or to be able to sympathize with them, and that, to that degree, they are derelict in their duties; that labor is one of the most important factors in industry, and certainly one of the most important factors in society, and that if labor is affected unfavorably it is harmful to the Republic; that the perpetuity of the Republic rests very largely upon the well-being of the workers, and of course you and I can see the force of that, because if a great body of the workers of this Nation were in a very bad way the possibility of maintaining law and order and peace would be remote. Now, if it is true, what they contend, that the men holding high places, and the men of real power—the men behind the management—do not understand them and do not understand their conditions, do not understand their problems, and do not understand the seriousness of the problem, what would be the answer?

Mr. MORGAN. Now, I should say that the workmen—labor if you want to call it that—had got themselves up in a corner and thought themselves different from anybody else, and they are not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They say that if the worker is not comfortable, or if the workman is not properly attended to, the Republic will fail, so it applies to all citizens just the same; of course, we know the workers are in the very great majority.

Mr. MORGAN. The most of us work in this country, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That where there is one employer there are hundreds of workers.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that they have the great burden to carry because of their numbers.

Mr. MORGAN. Each one has to do his part, the employer as well as the workman.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, what would you take to be the part of the employer, Mr. Morgan; what part should the employer play in the situation?

Mr. MORGAN. The part of any decent man, I suppose, I don't know. He has got to do what he can to help conditions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And what would constitute doing what he can?

Mr. MORGAN. That is a question for each man to decide for himself, is it not?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes. Well, is it a part of my duty as an employer and citizen of the Republic to study those problems?

Mr. MORGAN. It is part of your duty, if you are an employer—it is certainly a part of your duty to study your own problem. When it comes to a question of the general problem of this whole question of workmen, I do not know; I do not know how much duty is on one to study that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Should a study of the condition of my workers be a part of my duty as an employer?

Mr. MORGAN. I should think so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And it should be a part of my duty to study their conditions, so that I could discuss the matter intelligently?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes—wait a minute; now, you say discuss it intelligently. I am not talking about the discussion of it, but carrying out one's views.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What I mean by that is to know how to deal with it intelligently.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Congress has placed upon this commission, Mr. Morgan, the burden not only to inquire into the underlying causes of industrial unrest, but to make recommendations along the line of remedial legislation, and I am sure this commission will be very grateful to you, Mr. Morgan, if you could aid it. We can not dig these things out from our inner consciousness; our only way to arrive at an intelligent, wise, and proper legislation is to invite the cooperation and the opinion of the best men in the ranks of labor and the ablest men in the ranks of employers, and this commission would greatly appreciate if you have any helpful suggestions to throw out along the lines suggested—that is, along the line of suggestions to Congress as to such legislation as would be liable to establish a higher degree of industrial peace and a more cordial relationship between the employer on the one hand and the worker on the other.

Mr. MORGAN. The purpose is commendable, but it is beyond me. I have not enough knowledge, I have not enough power or capacity to grasp it and to suggest legislation which would not do more harm than good. That is away beyond me; I hope it is not beyond the commission.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, we find it a very, very great problem, Mr. Morgan.

Mr. MORGAN. I should think you would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And we should get aid outside of the commission as well as within the commission.

Mr. MORGAN. I would be very glad to give it to you if I had any.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell wishes to ask you a question or two.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you believe that there should be equality before the law of the rich and the poor man?

Mr. MORGAN. How do you mean, equality before the law?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the treatment of all before the law and by the law?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I take it, because of your very large interests that you look with favor upon the combinations of those things that make for savings, of things that go to bring together combinations?

Mr. MORGAN. That is, increased efficiency in productiveness; yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that would mean the bringing together of the members of the steel industry in this country into the United States Steel Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And, as a director of that company, you assign to certain persons the duty and authority of handling the affairs of that company, as far as they are a manufacturing concern?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the handling of labor?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and the adjusting of the hours of labor and the wages paid the men, and the conditions under which they shall be employed.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That power is delegated to some person or persons by the board of directors?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And he represents the company in dealing with the employees, as to questions of wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As representing the United States Steel Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have not the employees the same right to organize and select one of their representatives who shall be their delegate or adviser to meet with the officer of your company for the purpose of mediation or conciliation and adjusting wages, hours of labor, and conditions of employment?

Mr. MORGAN. I should think he had the same right; yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you recall that the United States Steel Corporation adopted a resolution setting forth that it would not treat or permit the corporation to treat with or permit an organization of labor in the United States Steel Co.'s plant?

Mr. MORGAN. I think there is such a resolution; there may be.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And is that in accordance with the opinion which you have just expressed that you think they should have the same right?

Mr. MORGAN. You said the same right under the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; and in the sense of meeting you as a corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. They have no right to tell the corporation who they shall employ. They have the right to cease to be employed by the corporation if they do not like it. Absolutely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; I suppose that is a privilege enjoyed by any citizen.

Mr. MORGAN. Absolutely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In other words, your company would hold that if a workman came along seeking employment, and the wages or the hours or the conditions of employment did not suit him, that he could take the position or not, as suited him?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. You say "my company." I am not speaking for my company, but for myself.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I mean the United States Steel Corporation, and you are a director of it?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and I feel that way.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You are familiar with the policy of it?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then the individual is not given the right to join with his fellow workmen, and through them select a representative who might be in the employ of the corporation or outside, to meet with your representative of the United States Steel Co.?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know; you will have to ask the officers of the company about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Because of the resolution adopted by your board of directors a few years ago embodying instructions that they should not treat with recognized organized labor?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now I want to ask again a question which Mr. Weinstock asked, which I have in mind because of the line to which I am leading up. Has a man of large influence—a man of big affairs, and who deals with big things—I will ask you what opportunity the individual workman employed by the United Steel Corporation has to change his hours of labor, increase his wages, or change the conditions of his employment or work under which he is employed, as an individual?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there any possibility that he could come into the headquarters of the United States Steel Co. and meet the president of that company and in a talk or discussion with him bring about a change in his hours of labor as an individual? If he should say to the president of that company that if they did not increase his wages, or something or other, he would quit the employ of the company; what effect would that have on the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know; it might have a very great deal.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson wishes to ask some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Morgan, how many railroad companies are you fiscal agent for, or your house?

Mr. MORGAN. Only one, I think, now.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Only one?

Mr. MORGAN. I think so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What influence is exercised by the fiscal agent of a railway over its methods and management?

Mr. MORGAN. None at all, I should say.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Taking good times and bad times?

Mr. MORGAN. None at all, I should say, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the character of fiscal agents for a railway company, has an accredited representative of your banking house ever met and dealt or discussed with the representatives of labor unions in considerable numbers the desirability or undesirability, or the necessity or nonnecessity, of a reduction of wages?

Mr. MORGAN. Not that I know of, sir. That would not have anything to do with the fiscal agency.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, if he appeared in the character of a fiscal agent and stated that was his only interest in the matter would it cut any figure?

Mr. MORGAN. I should not think so at all; no. That is not his job. That is not the job of the fiscal agent to go and discuss wages on the road.

Commissioner GARRETSON. This was a question broader than wages alone. It was the cutting of wages on a territory covering a fourth of the continent.

Mr. MORGAN. I should not know of it; I should not think it was any part of his business at all—fiscal-agency business.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would you know when he came, then?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You don't know whether or not that happened?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't remember of it happening.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In 1907?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know if it did.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You, as a member of the board of directors of the Northern Pacific, receive reports covering finances, as to receipts and disbursements by the road?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Monthly or weekly or how?

Mr. MORGAN. I get them quite often; whether monthly or biweekly I forget.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Those cover, of course, revenue and operating expenses.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The percentage of operating cost to the gross revenue?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; to taxes and all—the usual railway statements.

Commissioner GARRETSON. On questions of operation that report also covers tonnage moved?

Mr. MORGAN. Not as a rule, except at longer intervals.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is at longer intervals?

Mr. MORGAN. That comes with the annual report, probably.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, are not reports made to you monthly on the gross tonnage moved?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't think so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And a comparison of some months with the preceding—the same month the preceding year?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't recall the tonnage question. The dollar question I do, but tonnage I do not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the progress of improvements under way?

Mr. MORGAN. Those are not mentioned except at the meetings.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Stock reports and as to acreage?

Mr. MORGAN. Those are, at the meetings.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They never come to you at any other time?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you read the statements that appeared in yesterday's papers by Mr. Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railway?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not see it; no.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In regard to the prominence of the labor question on American railways?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not see it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is was the greatest question that concerned them in any way?

Mr. MORGAN. Well—I have not seen it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You would consider Mr. Willard an authority?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, admirable.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If Mr. Willard is absolutely committed to the idea that the greatest problem that confronts the American railways is the labor problem, would it not follow in sequence that at least as definite reports as to the labor conditions on a line of railway should be furnished to its board of directors as those covering its financial status which the labor problem threatened?

Mr. MORGAN. That is a doubtful question. It depends who is in charge of it, sir. The directors are in charge of the finances and the executive officers are in charge of the labor situation. Consequently the directors have their reports frequently on the finances, and I presume the officers have theirs on the labor question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, would it naturally follow because in all the years gone by in which the system of administration of a railway has been built up that if the executive had to report to the directors on the financial condition, on what was considered the main and most important problem, the financial problem, if that problem had been superseded by another or greater problem, would that fact carry with it the necessity of reports of that then primal problem?

Mr. MORGAN. Possibly may; I don't know how that would be.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In your opinion are the average board of directors, by personal knowledge and personal experience, qualified to deal with that problem?

Mr. MORGAN. I should say not; no.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You made the statement that the executive was at liberty, if he so desired, to consult with the members of the board of directors, and that they would give him the best advice there was at their disposal?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, if the average board of directors were in the same fix that you have stated you are in regard to certain questions, as that you have no opinion as to what is the proper length of a working day; and second, that you have no idea of what is the proper daily wage for a laborer; and third, that you have no knowledge or have never formed an opinion on the conditions of employment for children or others; that you have no idea of what would be proper for the establishment of an age limit for the hiring of men in various capacities; that you do not know whether or not organization exists in a number of branches of the various industries with which you are connected as a director; that you are not familiar with the underlying causes of poverty—now, if a practical operating officer went to a board of directors qualified like that, could he get valuable advice from them?

Mr. MORGAN. Probably not—on that subject.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, in regard to the equal rights of men in the two classes—and I am using "class" not in the doctrinaire sense, but only as to those who control and those who do not, those who serve, you have asserted your idea of organization of business to be that when a railway company as constituted at present is made up, that the power to do certain things is vested solely in the executive branch to deal with the industrial problems.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can you consistently take that position? Have you noticed that very many men have testified here that labor unions ought to be incorporated to render them equally legally liable with corporations?

Mr. MORGAN. I had not noticed or heard of that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, that has been testified to here. We will assume for the moment that a labor union is incorporated and stands in its relation to a railway company as corporation against corporation. Now, if your method of safe organization is good that places all this responsibility in the hands of the executive, I suppose you will be perfectly willing that when an organization such as that on the Northern Pacific—I am going to take a concrete case which exists—

Mr. MORGAN (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). If the Northern Pacific was confronted with wage troubles—and some of its men made a settlement there only last week—if during that trouble the officer of that labor union had exercised just the powers as you have here advocated as belonging to the executive of the railway company and, without consulting the men on the road, had ordered them to refrain from work and tie the company up—

Mr. MORGAN (interrupting). Possibly.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). Would you have considered that the public interest could allow a performance of that kind? Shouldn't he have been put in jail?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know what law you could put him in jail under.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, wouldn't you go so far as to wish you had a law?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I don't know. That would be a question of circumstances of the road.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Wouldn't that be a power that no man should be allowed to exercise?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know. I would like to think that over and take a little time—you have got so much hypothetical question there that I don't—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Well, if the president of your railway company could exercise that power under your system, wouldn't it be equally legitimate for the executive of the labor union to do it?

Mr. MORGAN. But could the president of the railway company exercise that power?

Commissioner GARRETSON. As you have stated, he could refuse to do anything in the way of settlement of grievances, and therefore would precipitate exactly that condition.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Or he could lock all his employees out?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Under your explanation of your safe system, he would be clothed with that practical responsibility, but this walking delegate, under labor-union laws, must go back and get the consent of two-thirds of the men he represents before acting. You would hold that proper?

Mr. MORGAN. That is one of the rules of the union?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Oh, well, as a citizen, would you hold that as proper?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know. I don't know anything about that. I am not passing on whether other people do the proper thing or not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does every citizen owe anything to the State or not?

Mr. MORGAN. I think a citizen owes a great deal to the State; yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, as a citizen, don't that man owe more than that to the State?

Mr. MORGAN. More than what, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. More than the exercise of arbitrary, unquestioned, and untrammelled power?

Mr. MORGAN. As against the State or—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). As against the good of the people, and the people are the State, or supposed to be, in this country.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope so. I don't quite grasp the bearing of the thing. Do you mean as a man can I do that, or what do you mean?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Oh, has he a moral right?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, that is a moral question. I should say not; no.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has the executive of your company, you think, the moral right to do it?

Mr. MORGAN. No; and I do not suppose he would do it for a moment.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For what reason do you think he would not exercise it?

Mr. MORGAN. I think he would go back to the board of directors that made him president and say, "This is the situation. Now, what am I to do about it?" Wouldn't he?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, now, considering your statement of a moment ago that the board was so constituted that it could not give him intelligent advice, what then?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, then, I can't help it. That is the end of the story.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am citing exactly two parallels, Mr. Morgan, to determine from your opinion whether or not you can safely, as a citizen—because you and I are equally citizens of the Republic—whether you could tolerate or defend an action on the part of the employing corporation that would be considered improper on the part of an employees' association, that is all.

Mr. MORGAN. It would depend on whose rights were attacked.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has the public rights that both are bound to respect?

Mr. MORGAN. Absolutely, but what those rights are is a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, then, does the obligation rest equally on the stockholders of a railway to curb the powers of its executive as it rests upon the stockholders of a labor union, who are its members, to curb the power of their executive?

Mr. MORGAN. On the stockholders of the railway?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes; as represented by the directors?

Mr. MORGAN. I should say that they would have to work together with him; yes—certainly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, as for responsibility being or not being exercised by boards of directors, didn't it use to be a proverb all through this region—I am speaking of some years back—that the New Haven Railroad could not buy a keg of spikes until after they had held a directors' meeting?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know. Did it?

Commissioner GARRETSON. I do not dare to testify. But isn't it a fact that in dealing with labor matters for a period of 15 years that a representative of the executive officers of the New Haven Railroad always went back and got the consent of the board of directors before he could sign any form of agreement?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know anything about the New Haven then.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That was prior to Mr. Mellen's day?

Mr. MORGAN. Very possibly, I should think; but I don't know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe, Mr. Morgan, that power and responsibility can be dissociated?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can a man who wields power properly evade performing the duties that are incumbent upon him because of the possession of that power?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, that would depend on the circumstances again, I think.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What circumstances could justify the evasion of responsibility by the man who held the power?

Mr. MORGAN. Ill health.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Ill health?

Mr. MORGAN. For one.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Take directors in general, the rate of mortality is not extra high.

Mr. MORGAN. No; probably not. But I don't know what we—you were leading up to something else, and I don't know what it is.

Commissioner GARRETSON. No; I have nothing behind me this once. I am playing in the open.

Mr. MORGAN. My feeling is that the responsibility and the power must go together, and the man who has the power has got to take the responsibility.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, and neither you as representing a financial power that is great, nor the officer of a labor union exercising—well, I will say social for want of a better word, or industrial power that is considerable, are free from responsibility, but you are equally bound by your responsibilities that come with that power no matter what its form.

Mr. MORGAN. Absolutely.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And do you believe that the obligation rests as heavily on him who exercises the power you represent to make himself absolutely conversant with those questions that must of necessity come to him?

Mr. MORGAN. I think in his responsibility he can delegate that power and he can delegate that responsibility.

Commissioner GARRETSON. A certain amount; but he can not delegate—well, there is a form of power or responsibility that can not be delegated, is there not?

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Moral responsibility you can not delegate?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, you do your best to carry it out by delegating the power—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). But if there is a failure to act, does the moral responsibility rest on the one doing the delegating as well as the one to whom it is delegated?

Mr. MORGAN. Rests on him for his erroneous choice.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For nonperformance, too?

Mr. MORGAN. No; for erroneous choice. I do not see anything else.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, that might be.

Mr. MORGAN. If he has used his best endeavor to get the right men.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, you know what hades is said to be paved with?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. With good intentions?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Will an intention in any case ever deliver a man from legal responsibility?

Mr. MORGAN. I think no man is responsible for not doing more than his best.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I grant you. Then you would hold that he must do his best?

Mr. MORGAN. I would—as he sees it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you, Mr. Morgan. You are excused permanently.

The commission will now adjourn until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 4.35 o'clock p. m. of this Monday, February 1, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock Tuesday morning, February 2, 1915, at the same place.)

New York, February 2, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will please come to order.

Is Mr. Goff in the room?

TESTIMONY OF MR. FREDERICK H. GOFF.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. GOFF. Frederick H. Goff.

Chairman WALSH. And your residence?

Mr. GOFF. Cleveland, Ohio.

Chairman WALSH. And your business or profession?

Mr. GOFF. My profession, a lawyer; my occupation at present is a banker.

Chairman WALSH. Are you connected with some financial institution in the city of Cleveland?

Mr. GOFF. I am president of the Cleveland Trust Co.

Chairman WALSH. You are the president, I believe, of the Cleveland Foundation, of Cleveland, Ohio?

Mr. GOFF. There is no president of the Cleveland Foundation. I had something to do with suggesting the idea of the Cleveland Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. What official connection have you with it?

Mr. GOFF. Perhaps I can best describe it as the originator.

Chairman WALSH. Might I ask you, Mr. Goff, to describe the whole plan as well as its development up to date, the genesis of it, its creation, and its operation up to date?

Mr. GOFF. The thought of the Cleveland Foundation grew out of experience had in helping others to make charitable disposition of their estates. It occurred to me, after some years' experience in connection with such matters, that donors often limited the scope of their benefactions to too narrow purposes. In one instance I had to do with the drafting of a trust agreement which provided for the ultimate use of a large estate exclusively for hospital purposes. In another large estate it was to be used exclusively in beautifying a cemetery in the city of Cleveland. The thought occurred to me that I was not serving to the best those who were consulting me in not being able to suggest some broader and better use. The foundation is not a foundation in fact. My understanding of a foundation is a present gift, in perpetuity, for charitable purposes. The Cleveland Foundation is rather a plan to gather into a foundation the surplus wealth of the community for community purposes. It was established on January 2, last year, by a resolution of the board of directors of the Cleveland Trust Co., providing in effect that the company would accept of gifts made by deed of trust or become trustees under testamentary bequests, under certain powers and for certain purposes indicated in the resolution. The foundation, therefore, is rather a declaration of a willingness upon the part of the Cleveland Trust Co. to accept of gifts made in lifetime, or by testamentary disposition, to serve the interests of Cleveland, in the broadest and biggest sense, under uniform powers of administration and for common purposes, the purpose being in substance the good of mankind.

Chairman WALSH. Have you prepared articles of incorporation?

Mr. GORF. No, sir; there are no articles of incorporation. It exists solely by virtue of the resolution to which I have referred.

Chairman WALSH. Is it the intention to have it incorporated under the laws of Ohio?

Mr. GORF. No, sir. Under the plan as announced the Cleveland Trust Co. will be the custodian of and administer the property which may be received for foundation purposes; the income derived from such property will be expended for welfare work in the community by a committee to be composed of five members, each serving for five years, unless reappointed, that being the limit of their service, the term of one trustee or member of the committee expiring each year. The committee to be appointed as follows: One by the mayor of the city of Cleveland, one by the probate judge or officer administering testamentary matters in the county in which Cleveland is located, one by the judge of the United States district court, and two by the trustee, the Cleveland Trust Co., the disposition of income being lodged entirely in that committee.

Chairman WALSH. In the announcement of the foundation, which you were kind enough to send to this commission, you state the purposes are as follows: To promote civic, moral, and mental welfare of the people of Cleveland in the widest, wisest, most economical, and most efficient manner.

Mr. GORF. That is hardly correct. May I quote the exact language?

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would, please. I have undertaken to have it quoted.

Mr. GORF. It is not quite correctly quoted. "After income becomes available from gifts made or bequeathed, such income, less proper charges and expenses, shall be annually devoted perpetually to charitable purposes. It shall be available for assisting charitable and educational institutions, whether supported by private donations or public taxation; for promoting education, scientific research; for the care of the sick, aged, or helpless; to improve living conditions or provide recreation for all classes; and for such other charitable purposes as will best make for the mental, moral, and physical improvement of the inhabitants of the city of Cleveland, regardless of race, color, or creed," according to the discretion of a majority in number of the committee to be constituted as I have previously described.

Chairman WALSH. As I understand it, the basis of the plan at the present time is a resolution of the board of directors of the Cleveland Trust Co.

Mr. GORF. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And, so far as your present intention is concerned, that resolution is simply to be followed out without any law or any pro forma decree of courts or anything of that sort?

Mr. GORF. Absolutely.

Chairman WALSH. I want to ask some questions following the declared purposes to ascertain what, in your opinion, can be done. Under your resolution and plan could you conduct model stores?

Mr. GORF. I would think not. It is to be confined exclusively to charitable purposes. Under the laws of our State a trust in perpetuity, as I understand it, must be limited in scope to charitable purposes.

Chairman WALSH. Could you operate a newspaper, disseminating news covering charitable purposes and welfare work?

Mr. GORF. I should think not.

Chairman WALSH. Could you conduct a campaign of what you might call education upon a topic as specific as industrial relations; for instance, the relation between capital and labor?

Mr. GORF. I would think not; no sir.

Chairman WALSH. There seems to be one provision in the Cleveland Foundation different from the other foundations which we have this far examined into, and that is in relation to the election of the committee to distribute the income. In Cleveland it seems that three members of the committee are to be named by the mayor of the city of Cleveland, the presiding judge of the probate court, and the presiding judge of the United States district court. Why was this provision put in your plan?

Mr. GOFF. Well, it was my belief that wealth—property—belonged to and should be administered by the living rather than by the dead.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any idea, democratic idea, involved in it—that is, to let the people have something to do with it?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir; that is what I intended to say by my answer—that property belongs to the living, and should be administered by the living and not by the dead.

Chairman WALSH. I take it, of course, having gotten up this plan, you have given some thought to the general plan of foundations, the work of foundations.

Mr. GOFF. Well, some; but I could hardly qualify as an expert, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. No; but I guess the art, if you could call it such, is quite young, and we have to take those who have given what little thought that has been given to it, and would be glad of your expression, for the time being, at least.

Mr. GOFF. I am willing to serve as an expert for the time being, but do not want my opinion to be given much weight.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that Government officials should have the power to name the members of the boards of foundations that have wide scope?

Mr. GOFF. Personally I would fear the result in remote years in the operation of a large foundation by a self-perpetuating board of trustees, fearing that it would not be responsive either to the needs of the community and that the zeal and purposes of the founders might not be continued. I would prefer myself to see upon boards of administration, or rather boards of distribution, for I would distinguish between the management—the custody and management of the assets and the distribution of the income—I would personally prefer more democracy rather than less upon boards having charge of distribution of income, however secured, whether by appointment of governmental officers or otherwise.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with what was known as the Peters bill, the proposed bill chartering the Rockefeller Foundation by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. GOFF. I am not; no, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the original bill and the amendments to the original bill granting the charter to the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GOFF. I did not; no, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The Peters bill provided that vacancies in the trustees following the incorporation should be filled by the existing board of trustees, but that four Federal officers and five university presidents should have power to veto such elections. Do you believe, Mr. Goff, that it is necessary or desirable that the Government should have a control over the trustees of such foundations?

Mr. GOFF. Well, that would seem to me a little complicated, Mr. Walsh. Preferably—perhaps because of pride of opinion growing out of my study of the Cleveland Foundation—I should rather have members of the public designated by governmental officers, if you please, by the President of the United States, by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and by the governor of New York, or something of that kind, such officers to have the power to designate members of the public for a limited time to serve as members of the committee. This would give the public, in effect, the right or opportunity of recall.

Chairman WALSH. A reading of the resolution creating your foundation, the Cleveland Foundation, indicates that the management of the fund rests with the Cleveland Trust Co.

Mr. GOFF. The management of the estate?

Chairman WALSH. The management of the estate.

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The trust fund?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And I believe it provides that the trust company shall be paid proper charges and expenses?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you defined yet what constitutes proper charges and expenses?

Mr. Goff. My recollection is that the resolution fixed that definitely at 5 per cent of the gross income, which is the customary charge for administering estates in our community.

Chairman WALSH. The resolution includes among its provisions—but I will not undertake to quote it—but a provision intended to limit the foundation's activity to what would be called eleemosynary and philanthropic purposes wholly?

Mr. Goff. Well, no; for instance, educational purposes, which would hardly be eleemosynary, and scientific research and recreation, which I suppose would cover playgrounds, bathhouses, museums of art, and music halls.

Chairman WALSH. You have endeavored in your resolution to specifically set out the activities that might be or could be undertaken by your foundation, have you not?

Mr. Goff. I tried to state it in the broadest possible terms, but boiled it down; it seems to me that the use authorized is any use that will promote the well-being of mankind. Such language, however, would not have been construed as limited to a charitable use under our laws, which prohibit a trust in perpetuity for political or industrial purposes.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that under the present plan of the Cleveland Foundation, the Cleveland Trust Co. will actually have control, in that, of the five trustees, two are to be appointed by the directors and three are to be appointed by the directors after selection by—

Mr. Goff (interrupting). You have that wrong. It does not so provide. It provides that in the event of the failure of any of the appointing powers to exercise the appointing power lodged in them, that then, in order to fill such vacancy, the board of directors of the Cleveland Trust Co. may designate to fill the vacancy. I can not conceive that the board of directors of the Cleveland Trust Co. can exercise in any sense control over the distribution of the income.

Chairman WALSH. What was the idea of having this administered through a trust company.

Mr. Goff. Personally, I believe that there is gathered about a financial institution men of greater experience and ability in dealing with financial affairs. I think their judgment with regard to investments is likely to be better than that of any committee not having had such training.

Chairman WALSH. My attention has been called to the provision in your prospectus or the statement here, as follows:

"That the power to distribute principal or income shall be vested in the committee constituted as hereinafter provided, with the exception only that the member provided to be selected by the judge of the United States district court shall be appointed by the board of directors of the Cleveland Trust Co."

Mr. Goff. I don't think that is in there, sir. Will you call my attention to that?

Chairman WALSH. The pages are not numbered. It is the fourth page, paragraph 3—

Mr. Goff. If you will turn over—that is page 4 of the printed matter?

Chairman WALSH. Of the printed matter.

Mr. Goff. Well, that is a statement of the scope and purposes of the foundation. The plan itself starts on the next page.

Chairman WALSH. Well, this seems to be in the resolution creating the foundation adopted by the board of directors of the Cleveland Trust Co., January 2, 1914. Now, the second page of that resolution, No. 3, it says:

"That the power to distribute principal or income shall be vested in the committee constituted as hereinafter provided, with the exception only that the member provided to be selected by the judge of the United States district court shall be appointed by the board of directors of the Cleveland Trust Co."

Now, I wish you would be good enough to analyze that, because you can readily see how we might drop into the error that we did.

Mr. Goff. There are certain optional rights under the plan given to donors. Unless those optional rights are exercised the committee will be constituted as provided at the bottom of the page to which you have referred:

"Two by the directors of the Cleveland Trust Co., preferably to be designated from their own number.

"One by the mayor or chief executive officer of the city of Cleveland.

"One by the senior or presiding judge of the court for the time being having jurisdiction of the settlement of estates in Cuyahoga County.

"One by the senior or presiding judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, or of the court that may hereafter exercise the jurisdiction of said court in Cuyahoga County."

But should any donor disapprove—

Chairman WALSH. Where is that?

Mr. GOFF. I am coming back now to the recital providing for the committee for distribution. Providing that the donors shall specifically so elect, the following optional rights are given. I am going back now to the paragraph No. 1 to which you called attention. No. 3 is the one providing that if the contributors to the foundation in the instrument creating their trust indicate their desire first as to how, when, and for what purposes the principal contributed by them should be used, or next as to the purposes for which their income shall be used, or next that the committee, instead of being constituted as provided in the portion of the plan to which I have called attention, indicate a desire that three members of the committee shall be designated by the Cleveland Trust Co. instead of two, they shall have such right.

I don't know whether I make myself clear. Unless donors in the instrument creating the trust specifically express a desire to have what I call a more conservative board of trustees for distribution of income, the other obtains. I am pleased to say, however, that so far as we have gone, no one has elected to exercise their rights under that option, but it may be interesting for me to give you my experience in connection with that matter.

Of course, there is no compelling power to influence donors to accept this plan. With some the democratic plan of selection of the committee is more satisfactory, with others not.

Mr. Thomas H. White, president of the White Automobile Co. and the White Sewing Machine Co., who created a trust just prior to the establishment of this plan, a large trust, for quite as broad purposes as indicated in the plan, was asked by me, after the establishment of the plan, to consent to have his trust come under the Cleveland Foundation. He has since died, and the trust is public, so I am at liberty, I feel, to give the reasons for his having decided not to come in. It will give you the viewpoint of some donors. I am reading from a letter written by Mr. White to me from Florida on January 29 of last year:

"Now, regarding the Cleveland Trust Co., I went into it expecting that the 20 directors of the company would manage the funds finally. If five directors, and three of them from the outside, are to manage it I do not want to go in it at all. A Tom Johnson mayor would soon manage the whole thing."

I simply give that as indicating how you have to guard in arranging a plan so as to meet the wishes of the donors. Mr. White died before returning to Cleveland, or before, rather, I had an opportunity to discuss the matter with him verbally. I have no doubt he would have accepted at least the optional right under the plan to which you refer had I had the opportunity of discussing it with him.

Chairman WALSH. What provision is made in the present resolutions for making public the reports of work done and moneys spent?

Mr. GOFF. The plan requires, first, an audit by a certified accountant, annually; the publication of the report of the auditor, giving details in regard to each trust and securities held under each trust, income received, and disbursements made.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that such a foundation ought to be accountable to some public officer or body?

Mr. GOFF. Well, either some public body, or preferably, I think to the public itself; for trusts of this kind are created for the benefit of the public. They are the beneficiaries under the trust, and I think are entitled to the fullest information.

Chairman WALSH. In what way would the representation of the public be had, you say, either to make it a public officer, which would mean, I suppose, elective or appointive officer of the Government, the State, or municipality, or how would you apply it? What do you mean by that?

Mr. GOFF. Well, the publication in the newspapers, as provided in the plan of the Cleveland Foundation, two newspapers having the largest circulation in the city of Cleveland, of the results of each year's operation. I regard as an accounting to the beneficiaries of the city of Cleveland. Further, the plan provides for visitatorial power to the law officer of the city of Cleveland and to the attorney general of the State, and gives them the fullest opportunity to inspect the records.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would please detail the provision—read it from the book there, Mr. Goff—the provision for the public examination of the records of the foundation.

Mr. Goff. The resolution provides that either the attorney general of the State of Ohio or the law officer of the city of Cleveland shall have the right to institute appropriate proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction to restrain, correct, or recover for any maladministration of the trust estate, either by the trustee or the committee, and shall at all reasonable times have the right to inspect the books, vouchers, and records of the trustee and the committee in any way pertaining to the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that all foundations should be required to publish such facts?

Mr. Goff. Oh, I think publicity is one of the very greatest safeguards in an endowed charity; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was it a part of that plan to publish a complete list showing the number and character of the applications received for dispensation of funds?

Mr. Goff. I think there has been no such provision made; no, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was it intended to have them made? Is it intended to be made?

Mr. Goff. I would think that would be an administrative matter, entirely in the hands of the committee for distribution.

Chairman WALSH. What would you think of publishing such matters as showing the public what opportunities there were for you to help and in a general way where you were reaching, what you were aiding, what you were failing to aid or refusing to aid?

Mr. Goff. I do not believe I have any very firm convictions on that. It would seem to me that a detailed statement of how funds were expended, especially in a community like Cleveland, would make it quite apparent to the citizens of Cleveland what might have been done as well as what had been undertaken.

Chairman WALSH. Among other things we are trying to do is to see what application could be made of the principal and practice of your plan to foundations generally of national wide character, we might say. You have certain provisions restricting freedom to disburse capital, namely, to exceed 20 per cent during a period of five consecutive years. Please state your reason for this.

Mr. Goff. People might act under impulse without sometimes giving mature consideration to some larger problem affecting a community, and it seemed to me desirable, before distribution of the entire principal constituting the foundation be made, the judgment of the community should in some respects be considered to be had through public discussion and the public prints. A distribution of 20 per cent in a period of five years, with the approval not only of the members of the committee, but of the trustee, was quite as rapid and as large an amount as ought to be made, it seemed to me.

Chairman WALSH. Complete control in regard to capital and income as vested in the Cleveland Trust Co. You have stated here that you give no power over capital to the disposition?

Mr. Goff. That is with regard to the disbursement of principal?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. Goff. The committee have joint power of disbursement of principal with the directors of the Cleveland Trust Co.

Chairman WALSH. Can the foundation, if it so desires, spend its income or capital in directing such work as a survey of the city, for example?

Mr. Goff. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Describe what sort of survey is going on at the present time.

Mr. Goff. The plan of the Cleveland Foundation was announced, as I have said, on January 2, 1914. It appeared from—not contributions, because that is not the right term—but from assurances or pledges received before the 1st of March in that year, that at no remote time the responsibility would come upon the committee having charge of the disbursements of income for disbursing a large amount of income. In other words, a railroad accident or a Titanic disaster would impose immediately the responsibility for handling the income from a large amount of property.

It seems to me the community ought to be thinking along the lines of how such income could be best used. And I invited the cooperation of some of the citizens of Cleveland in the matter of making for that purpose, a survey of social conditions existing in Cleveland. I suggested as the scope of such an effort, the ascertaining of the causes and remedies for poverty, crime, disease, and accident. I have forgotten just the scope of it, but it was pretty broad.

I suggested that to try out the plan involved in the foundation itself for handling income, that a committee be appointed as provided in the foundation, namely, two by the Cleveland Trust Co., one by the Federal Judge, one by the probate judge, and one by the mayor, to have the charge of making such survey. Such committee was appointed, and perhaps on or about September 1, after some months' effort and with the cooperation of the Russell Sage Foundation of this city, Mr. Allen T. Burns was selected as a director of that survey and actively began work about September 1.

Chairman WALSH. Well, will the scope of your survey include an investigation into the wages paid laborers, conditions of labor?

Mr. GOFF. I think so. The scope suggested is broad enough for that; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is it the intention to have it cover that in arriving at the causes of poverty and disease and crime and the like?

Mr. GOFF. I am not on that board, I am not a member of that committee, but judging from the character of the committee I do not think they would hesitate, Mr. Chairman, to go into such matters and believe they would find them both desirable and important considerations.

Chairman WALSH. You have the right, I suppose, to spend a portion of the income for publicity?

Mr. GOFF. That is, the income of what? Of the foundation or funds received for the survey—there is no foundation as yet. The funds that would be available for the making of this survey would be available for giving publicity to the reports.

Chairman WALSH. From whence do the funds come that this survey is to be made from?

Mr. GOFF. Private contribution.

Chairman WALSH. Of persons in Cleveland?

Mr. GOFF. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any objection to stating who they are?

Mr. GOFF. I think I would rather not. I am willing to state I am one of the contributors.

Chairman WALSH. Might it be anybody who would have a very pecuniary interest in the result in the question of wages and the publicity that might be given to the reports?

Mr. GOFF. No; none whatever.

Chairman WALSH. Any stockholders in large concerns in which there have been labor disputes or in which there have been charges?

Mr. GOFF. No.

Chairman WALSH. Of improper conditions?

Mr. GOFF. Not that I am aware of; no, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that would have to be provided against?

Mr. GOFF. I do not think so, sir. The committee will have charge of the expending the funds, of the publishing of the reports. The member of the committee appointed by the mayor of Cleveland is the president of the consumers' league.

Chairman WALSH. What would you think of the proposition if the committee did consist of men that were stockholders and directors in large industries in which there was a great deal of labor strife and in which the conditions of the labor were severely challenged and criticized; do you think that such a committee could be intrusted to make an investigation into the causes of poverty that would include wages, conditions of labor, hours of labor, and the alleged grievances of the workers with unlimited power and publicity as to active work and conclusions?

Mr. GOFF. It seems to me that the credit and fairness of any report made by such committee would entirely depend upon the character of the committee.

Chairman WALSH. Regardless, of course, of the personal character of the individuals, I suppose you do not mean that; but if they were men that as directors and stockholders or owners were involved in very great industries in which these conditions were alleged to exist, do you think that men with those interests, leaving out the personal character, could make a survey that would be disinterested and would be received by the workers in the industry as disinterested?

Mr. GOFF. No; I would doubt both.

Chairman WALSH. In general, do you feel that there is any menace to industry or to government or to education in very great foundations?

Mr. GORF. It depends upon the purpose—the scope—of the foundation, as I would view it. I suppose you are directing my thoughts toward the Rockefeller Foundation. Personally I can not help but feel that it is one of the greatest benefactions the world has ever had.

Chairman WALSH. And you have studied it—

Mr. GORF (interrupting). May I just finish my answer?

Chairman WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. GORF. If I have understood its purpose—and I get misinformation principally from what I have learned of it in the public prints through the proceedings here—if the purpose of the foundation is to promote the welfare of mankind, none of us could differ as to the worthiness of the purpose. We may entertain different opinions as to whether the purpose will be carried out by the administrative officers; personally I can not help but feel that the handling of so important a trust by a self-perpetuating board of trustees is not likely to carry out the wishes of the founder. In other words, you have, I assume, to-day in charge of that foundation men of rare ability—Mr. Murphy, Mr. Greene, Mr. Gates, Mr. Rockefeller. They have the zeal of the mind conceiving it. But how that is to be perpetuated in the remote years to come I do not know. The tendency is for those possessing such power to become indolent, indifferent, and slothful. I am getting away, however, from the question you put, which was, Do I regard it as a menace?

Chairman WALSH. Improperly administered—yes—it might be a menace. I have myself the feeling that we are living in a different age than obtained years ago. There is an increasing spirit of service and a lessening spirit of self-seeking. What might have been possible 50 or 100 years ago is quite impossible now because of the great publicity. Such publicity as grows out of the hearings in such investigations as this, which the public are free to make at any time. I do not fear myself evil result from even such administration as has been provided under the Rockefeller Foundation. The menace of foundations in the past, from the little I know of them, is that they soon become obsolete. They are stupid. There are upward of 50,000 endowed charities in England to-day, as I understand it, the majority of which have proved harmful; but not harmful because they have undertaken to thwart governmental purposes or to disturb the relations between employers and labor, but because they become obsolete. Instead, if you please, of conceiving what the evil was which they sought to remedy, founders have adopted methods that often increase the evil. Following the confiscation of the property of the monasteries in the early part of the fifteenth or sixteenth century, the poor came upon the community of England. Charity took the form of giving doles, handing out sums of money, and that, of course, only tended to increase pauperization. Foundling asylums were created with the thought that they serve a charitable purpose and worthy purpose, but they only tended to increase illegitimacy. The great menace of a foundation, as it seems to me, is its narrowness of conception.

Chairman WALSH. Have you known of any foundation or organization having for its purpose the betterment of mankind by philanthropic and eleemosynary means that has undertaken to make a survey as to the relations between capital and labor or between employer and employee in industry?

Mr. GORF. None except the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. There is no other institution of the kind and no other instance of it in history that has been called to your attention?

Mr. GORF. I know of none.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Gorf, must the committee on distribution absolutely expend money received from donors for the purposes the donors set out in their bequests?

Mr. GORF. No, sir; the donors may indicate a desire for a certain period of time to have the income from their trusts expended in a certain way, but there is lodged with the committee on distribution the power to do otherwise should it see fit.

Commissioner LENNON. Then this foundation in charge of the Cleveland Trust Co. would not be in a position to receive bequests that had a specific end and only one end in view, and could not be used for any other purpose?

Mr. GORF. Not unless the donor agreed that the committee might have a revisionary power and control.

Commissioner LENNON. What was the substantial reason back of the provision putting the distribution of money from the funds in the hands of a trust company under a different committee and board from the directors of the trust company? What did you expect to serve by having those two boards handle the funds?

Mr. GOFF. Well, I believe personally that the directors of the Cleveland Trust Co. would more safely and prudently care for the investment and reinvestment of the fund; but I believed that the community, through the control given it in the committee on distribution, would make a more wise and beneficial use of the income for community purposes than the directors of the bank.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, in setting out the purposes of some of these great foundations, the statement is made that they are established to promote the welfare of mankind. Is it not possible that in Cleveland, for instance, there are a great many excellent people, equally honest, equally intelligent, who fundamentally differ as to what might be or might not be for the welfare of mankind in the handling of such fund?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, is there a possibility of danger in the future that the directors, even though with an honest intention and conscientiously, should undertake to devote a large fund for what they believed to be the welfare of mankind, that another large element of the community would believe that it was for the detriment of mankind; would then such a trust be of benefit to the community?

Mr. GOFF. Mistakes of that kind, it is quite possible, may be made. It seemed to me, through the shifting of the membership of the committee—the membership being limited to five years' service unless reappointment be made by the appointing power—that errors and mistakes of that kind would, through public discussion, become corrected.

Commissioner LENNON. And the people come to see the thing the same way?

Mr. GOFF. Not always in the same way; no, sir, that is quite impossible.

Commissioner LENNON. That is the great question I have in my mind as to these foundations, the difference in our viewpoint as to what is for the welfare of mankind, and how that is to be safely handled in the future—either by a self-continuing board of trustees or even by the plan that you have.

Mr. GOFF. Welfare of mankind under the laws of Ohio must have reference solely to charitable ends, which would include education, scientific research, the maintenance or establishment of art galleries or music halls; they are such things as have been approved by courts, by Parliaments in England, and by legislative bodies in this country as are included as charitable purposes. As to what would be the wisest and most beneficial use of the funds available for charitable purposes is something about which the people might differ, but I do not know of any scheme which is limited, as the Cleveland Foundation necessarily must be, to charitable ends that could be held to be a menace or harmful to the community.

Commissioner LENNON. The greatest difference would arise on the very first word you used, that of education. Might not the city of Cleveland, although I am not well acquainted in Cleveland—I imagine that the city of Cleveland would divide into half a dozen different sections as to what was for the welfare of mankind in the way of education, the method and lines of education.

Mr. GOFF. That is true. There are said to be 350 endowed educational institutions in England serving a harmful rather than a beneficial purpose, one a secondary school where they have two masters and but one pupil, or did have a few years ago.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I would like to know something about the amount of funds in this foundation.

Mr. GOFF. I tried to make that quite clear, that the Cleveland Foundation being only a little over a year old, and dependent on gifts made by will largely and deeds of trust, has come into possession of no funds directly. In October of last year I estimated, and I felt somewhat conservatively, that upward of $30,000,000 at that time had been committed, if that is the word to use, to the foundation. The funds are lodged with the foundation or with the Cleveland Trust Co. largely after the death of the donors.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has there been any funds used up to the present time?

Mr. GOFF. The foundation has received no funds.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Consequently there have been none to expend?

Mr. Goff. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But you have got the possibility in sight of about $30,000,000.

Mr. Goff. Somewhat more than that. In October of last year my estimate was something over $30,000,000, and it is increasing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand from that that it will be necessary for some one to die before any of that money will be available?

Mr. Goff. Yes, sir; and after the death of many donors the income is reserved for the use of children and beneficiaries designated. The Cleveland Foundation is rather for the day after to-morrow than for to-day. It is undertaking to gather up for community purposes what I will describe as surplus wealth that very often in a community goes to waste, and making it of service to the community and under the management of the community when available.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When, in your judgment, will some portion of this fund be available?

Mr. Goff. The things happen pretty fast; there are three trusts within the last two years of very considerable amount where the purposes are quite as broad as the—I won't say that, but there is one, and that is the Thomas White, where the purposes indicated are similar to those set forth in the foundation—two other trusts of large amounts where unexpectedly large funds have been given for charitable purposes. Some contributors, if I may use that term, of the Cleveland Foundation are well advanced in years, some are childless, some have families to be cared for and their estates will only be available after their deaths and the death of their families. It would simply be guessing as to the length of life of people who have contributed, and that I do not like to do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand that for the foundation to become the sole possessor of the fund the entire family would have to disappear, as it were—all of the heirs?

Mr. Goff. No, sir; you can not create a trust for such a time under the laws of Ohio, and I guess it is the same under any one of the States of the Union; there is a limit to the time for which a trust can be created for private purposes. A very considerable amount, as I have stated, of property that has been donated—pledged to the fund—is contributed by those who have no families.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has your committee so far arranged for any work of any kind in Cleveland? Are they figuring ahead for taking up any particular work?

Mr. Goff. Nothing except through this survey committee which has been doing active and, I think, very excellent work since about the 1st of October.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Now, that is all, thank you, Mr. Goff.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Edward P. Costigan.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live, Mr. Costigan?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Denver, Colo.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, please.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Attorney at law.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived in Denver, Colo.?

Mr. COSTIGAN. For about 30 years.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had anything to do with the trouble existing in the coal industry in Colorado during the past several months?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In February, 1914, Mr. Chairman, I was engaged by the United Mine Workers of America to represent them in a hearing held by the congressional committee to investigate the Colorado coal strike conditions. I acted in that capacity during the entire hearings through the filing of the briefs before the congressional committee.

Chairman WALSH. You have asked to be heard here, Mr. Costigan, I believe, in connection with both of the questions now under investigation by this commission at this particular hearing; that is, the effect of absentee ownership in industry and the activities of the large foundations so far as the industrial field is concerned. Are you prepared to make a statement covering these questions?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am, Mr. Chairman, and I should like to explain the circumstances under which the request was presented to the commission, if I may.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In the latter part of December of last year, among others, I testified before this commission in Denver on the causes and remedies for industrial disturbances existing in the State of Colorado. About that time, and at that time I was not representing the United Mine Workers of America but was testifying simply as a citizen; about that time the word reached us that an investigation was to be held in the city of New York on the subject of the Rockefeller and other foundations, and the United Mine Workers requested me to come with some of their people to the city of New York for the express purpose of requesting that the investigation of the Rockefeller Foundation be considered from the standpoint of the Colorado situation.

As a result, Mr. Lawson, international board member of the United Mine Workers; Mr. Doyle, secretary-treasurer for the State of Colorado, of district 15; Mr. Morgan, secretary-treasurer of the State of Wyoming; and some other witnesses came to New York. One week ago last Saturday they formally presented a request to this commission for an opportunity to be heard. Pursuant to that request Mr. Lawson has been heard. That, I think, explains the circumstances under which this request was made.

Chairman WALSH. Are you prepared to make the statement, and could we ask you to be kind enough to make it in your own way, without direct questioning, so far as you can, confining it to the two topics indicated; that is, the results of absentee ownership in industry as you have observed them—the operations of it and the activities of these foundations, so far as the industrial field is concerned.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Chairman, it certainly is proper, as the miners of Colorado have requested that any investigation of the Rockefeller Foundation as a benevolent enterprise, a social asset, or a community liability should be tested by the human drama recently enacted in that State. This is particularly true in the light of the recent report that the sum of $10,414,918 out of the $103,930,000 owned by the Rockefeller Foundation is in the shape of stocks and bonds of corporations doing more or less business in the State of Colorado.

My authority to speak from the Colorado standpoint is twofold: First and primarily, as a citizen of that State deeply interested in human welfare and in the close relation that does or should exist between economic justice and the dispensing of charity; secondly, because of the intimate knowledge derived through the professional relations of which I have spoken, and, in a measure, as a representative of the United Mine Workers of America.

The moderation of their demands, the well-grounded nature of the complaints, the conservatism for the most part and with few exceptions of their leadership through long, weary, and heart-breaking months, and the unforeseen and shocking character of their sufferings in the State of Colorado—on all these subjects I speak from definite personal knowledge.

We had on the witness stand yesterday, Mr. Chairman, Mr. John Mitchell, under whose leadership the United Mine Workers attained an international fame. I was reading this morning in the record of this commission the testimony of Mr. Peabody, one of the leading bituminous mine operators of the Middle West, delivered before this commission on April 6, 1914, which, by the way, was the very day on which Mr. Rockefeller, before the congressional committee was delivering the statement in Washington which precipitated Ludlow in the State of Colorado.

In this testimony of Mr. Peabody, which the commission may remember, Mr. Peabody, questioned by Commissioners O'Connell and Weinstock, developed what is, of course, known to be true—the fact that the United Mine Workers of America have promoted in this country higher and better standards of living and have greatly advanced the habits of the mine workers of to-day. Notwithstanding the fact, as Mr. Peabody testified, that the English-speaking and Anglo-Saxon element among the miners is diminishing rapidly and that the places of these people are being rapidly taken by miners from southern Italy and northern Italy, and Hungarians, Slavs, and so forth; and among other things Mr. Peabody said:

"I think the whole standard of the miner has improved greatly. I have been very much interested with my friend Mitchell"—referring to Mr. John Mitchell, who testified here yesterday—"in going to the miners' houses, to see his picture hanging there rather enshrined. He is rather typical of the Higher Being. I am not joking in this. I am very serious. I am very fond of Mitchell, and I think his work and the work that has been done under him has elevated the higher standard of their lives. Mitchell is there more as an idea than as a person. He has done wonders for the men socially and in every other kind of way."

This is the testimony, as I say, of a great coal operator, nor is it unusual from the lips of such men.

Prof. Edward R. A. Sellgman, of Columbia University, says in a paper published in the New York Times Annalist for the first week of May, 1914:

"The United Mine Workers of America is not an irresponsible organization; on the contrary, it is numerically the strongest union in the world; it has a membership of more than 400,000 paying dues to it; it is established in practically every coal-producing State in the country and in practically every mining Province in Canada; 75 per cent of all coal miners on this continent are employed under the terms of contracts which the organization negotiates with mine owners; the relations existing between the miners and operators are cordial and friendly; the officers of the miners' union are men of high character and marked ability. Mr. John P. White, the president, is recognized by employers in the coal industry as a man of high ideals, great intelligence, and unquestioned honesty. Mr. Frank J. Hayes, the vice president, is equally well regarded. Mr. Greene, the secretary-treasurer, is the majority leader in the Ohio State Senate and speaker pro tempore of that body. Are these the kind of labor leaders to be encouraged or to be frowned down?"

I cite those matters, Mr. Chairman, in passing in order that the propriety of the request made of this commission for a hearing may be estimated by the commission.

At the outset of what I desire to say I wish it particularly understood that nothing testified to may fairly be construed as a reflection on the resources or quality of the people of the State of Colorado.

Colorado is, by natural endowment, matchless among the States of America, particularly the Inland States. Her people, taken all in all, are as high spirited, as gifted, as industrious, as humane, as cosmopolitan as any in the world. Her economic history, as I view it, Mr. Chairman, is important to this commission and to the country, not because it has been exceptional, but rather because it is at least potentially typical. What happened to us at Ludlow last April is in some striking respects similar to what happened at Lawrence, Mass., some years ago, and across the line in New Jersey within the last few weeks; and the condition bordering on civil war which prevailed in Colorado in April of last year is one which, with like provocation, may become the situation any day in New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio, or Illinois, or any other industrial Commonwealth.

For these very reasons that discredit should have been brought on that State in the past year, as we see it, by the very forces that are now striving for public approbation under the guise of philanthropy, is all the more regrettable.

The Rockefeller Foundation, if I am correctly advised, and if I understood Mr. Rockefeller correctly the other day, was incorporated in the State of New York in 1913 for the dissemination of knowledge, the prevention of suffering, and the promotion of the well-being and civilization of the people of the United States and of the world.

Practically within a year after its incorporation its promoters had the responsibility properly laid at their very doors for a record of total failure along each of the designated lines of activity. They, or at least those most influential in the foundation, had sanctioned or permitted the spread of misinformation on matters of public importance of the first grade, the concrete enlargement of human misery, and an unmistakable lapse from just living human standards entirely at variance with our boasted civilization.

In a great human crisis, precipitated within the very household, industrially speaking, of Mr. Rockefeller, his foundation has been heedless or impotent. And the conclusion forced on an unprejudiced public has been and is that Mr. Rockefeller, the business man, has cold-heartedly and without hesitation brushed aside and imposed silence upon Mr. Rockefeller, the philanthropist.

In the State of Colorado, he and his associates have looked on without emotion while communities have been endangered, homes have been desolated, and men, women, and children who might have been saved to efficient service for society have gone down to most pathetic graves. Without protest these captains of industry have seen their corporation subordinates in Colorado oppose the organization of workers in a State which by law sanctions the right of organization.

Nor was it a matter of any consequence to them that the situation represented a fourth like crisis in thirty years, springing from like causes, and that the unyielding attitude of the employers threatened for a time to involve that great third party, the unoffending public, not only in one but in other States, in the throes of civil war. In 1884, 1894, 1904, and again, most menacingly of all, in 1914, the industrial clock in Colorado struck with solemn and insistent warning.

Yet not even the proposed benevolences of Mr. Rockefeller and his associates have modified their rigid and implacable attitude.

The foundation has purported to represent disinterested and untrammelled investigation, and the activities of Mr. Kneeland in Chicago, Mr. Fosdick in New York, and Mr. Flexner here and abroad, had led the nation to cherish higher hopes of an inspired and fearless probe of wrong economic conditions, high and low.

The testimony of young Mr. Rockefeller before the congressional committee on April 6, 1914, however, dramatically and unforgettably did three things:

1. It dashed these hopes to earth for the time being at least.
2. It demonstrated the dangers and unreliability of charity and the inferiority of charity to economic justice.

3. It proved that absentee landlordism in Colorado has been the foundation of a feudalism on the part of employers toward employees which has been indifferent to State and even Federal law, which at times in parts of Colorado has dominated government in all its branches, executive, legislative, and judicial, which through the use of hired detectives and gunmen has promoted and made private war and ignored the necessary view that the levying of war is a public function. It would appear unnecessary to review the laws which were shown in the congressional hearing to have been violated by the coal companies of Colorado, including the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., of which Mr. Rockefeller is the dominant figure.

Mr. Lavvson testified on this subject the other day, and there is of course a great deal of testimony in the record. I myself have already testified on this subject of law violation.

I may say briefly that in my judgment the laws of the State of Colorado touching semimonthly pay days, discrimination against union men, blacklists, the eight-hour day, scrip, checkweighman; those looking to the prevention of mine accidents and deaths; those touching deception of workmen brought in to break strikes; those requiring peace officers to be bona fide citizens, and residents of the State; the Federal law also dealing with post offices and peonage, not to mention the constitutional guaranties of free speech, the right to petition for the redress of grievances, the right of assembly, and open courts, with or without militia in the field, have been long disregarded by the coal companies of Colorado, including the company of Mr. Rockefeller.

In the testimony given before the congressional committee, Mr. Welborn and others presented some matters which show the undisputed situation as to feudalism. Perhaps some references to that should be read into the record. Mr. Welborn enumerated the closed camps in Colorado, such as Moreley, Primero, Segundo, Tercio, Frederick, Rouse, Lester, Ideal, Cameron, Walsen, Robinson, McNally, and he might have mentioned Berwind and Tabasco in that connection.

Mr. Welborn, before the congressional committee, also testified that in those camps the charge for rent was arbitrary and the company is unwilling to sell homes to the miners even where they have been employed by the company in such camps for as long a period as 24 or 25 years.

The publication known as Facts, given to society by Mr. Ivy Ledbetter Lee during the fall or winter of last year, enumerated many of these arbitrary charges and defined part of the company management in the various camps.

So we have in the record of this commission, Mr. Chairman, many letters and admissions which show the character of the feudalism growing out of the absentee landlordism to which I have referred.

For instance, at page 1608 of the Commission on Industrial Relations record, we have the letter from Mr. Weitzel to all the superintendents of the C. F. & I. in southern Colorado, and in their capacity as school directors, instructing them to select teachers after consultation with Mr. Merritt, with the clear implication that the teacher must be acceptable to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

There has already been comment and testimony introduced in this record on the same sort of interference with the church of these closed camps. The letter from Mr. Welborn to Mr. Murphy, of October 31, 1914, suggesting the change of the minister in Sunrise, was commented on, and Mr. Rockefeller was questioned upon that subject the other day.

That letter is also in the records of this commission. The same line of testimony shows the entire control of the saloons in these closed camps. Mr. Lawson, I think, testified fully about that matter. And the record upon the subject of the violation of law, the undisputed record, is interesting and pertinent in this connection.

Mr. Welborn admitted in the congressional testimony, copies of which I have here, that the semi-monthly pay-day law which was enacted in 1901 had been put into effect by his company for the first time February 1, 1913; that scrip, which was abolished presumably by law in 1899, was abolished by his company January 1, 1913; and he admitted that the eight-hour law was put into effect by his company March 1, 1913, the original law on that subject being passed in Colorado in 1899. There was much controversy in the courts over it, and it was declared unconstitutional. The constitution was amended, and a long period of legislation ensued in which certain acts went into effect prior to the date Mr. Welborn indicates. But enough is shown from these admissions and from the undisputed record to make clear that the absentee landlordism did in fact eventuate in the feudalistic type of control about which so much has been said to this commission.

The blacklist was shown in the congressional hearing to have continued for years, notwithstanding the laws of 1897 and 1905.

Discrimination against the union men has been shown down to the present time, notwithstanding the laws of 1897 and 1911. Interestingly in this connection may be mentioned the fact that Mr. Welborn admitted at the Denver hearing before this commission—his admission being found on page 1091 of this commission's record—that the men employed by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and other companies "are more or less at the mercy of the employers"—I am quoting his exact words—"more particularly where there is no collective bargaining."

Following this admission we have the letters introduced by Mr. Welborn, in one of which—namely, the letter of October 9, 1914, in your records at page 1401—Mr. Welborn pointed out how easy it would be to designate three safe men in certain camps of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. for the purpose of putting into effect what might to the public appear to be collective bargaining. The purport of that letter, if it is to be interpreted in the ordinary sense in which language may be interpreted, is, of course, that Mr. Welborn and his associates are willing to allow collective bargaining if they control its outcome. They are willing to allow arbitration if they may name the arbitrators. And, of course, this proposition ties up closely with the proposition of Mr. Mackenzie King, which will be mentioned later.

In the face of the complaints of men based on such grievances and such a situation, the leading officials of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and other allied coal companies in Colorado, both before and during the strike of 1913-14 in that State, consistently refused to meet for the discussion of grievances, real or otherwise, at the same time, in the same room, under the same roof with the representatives of organized labor, who have been so highly spoken of by Prof. Seligman, Mr. Peabody, and others, and it can be fairly established that this arrogance of a feudalistic type was sustained by the intolerance toward public rights and needs, made possible by the absentee landlordism of Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. Rockefeller's testimony before the congressional committee on April 6 should be recalled in this connection.

Mr. Lawson, the other day, summarized the testimony of Mr. Rockefeller before this commission, but did not, I believe, contrast it with the testimony of Mr. Rockefeller on that occasion.

In its most striking aspects Mr. Rockefeller's testimony was as follows: The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. produces approximately 40 per cent of the coal mined in Colorado, and Mr. Rockefeller's father owns 40 per cent of the stock and bonds of that company. Beyond being the dominant industrial individuality in the country at large and in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., made clear that he represented his father in that company; that he had not attended a directors' meeting and had not visited Colorado for 10 years; that he did not know what wages are paid the Colorado miners by his father's company, what rent is charged for the company's houses, what profit the company makes from its stores, whether the miners can acquire title to their homes, whether the company had bought ammunition or guns during the strike; and he added that he hoped there were no saloons on the company's property, revealing by his reply definite ignorance on that subject.

He stated that he relied upon Mr. Welborn and Mr. Bowers, who, he understood, were in constant touch with the employees of the company. With apparent conviction he defended his attitude, pointing out that he was accustomed to rely on the most efficient subordinates he could find, taking the position of Mr. Morgan yesterday on that subject; that having placed his confidence in such men he said that he was determined to back them up; that they had stated to him that the strike was without merit, and that 90 per cent of the men did not want unionism. He planted himself in this connection firmly on the proposition that it was preferable to lose the Rockefeller millions than to recognize the unions in Colorado. He called the fight against unionism in Colorado and for the privilege of employing men when and under what conditions they chose one for principle; and he made evident his determination not to investigate reports outside of subordinate officers, although fully aware that conditions in Colorado were reported to be shocking, and he added that his conscience entirely acquitted him.

Mr. Rockefeller's testimony should be read in connection with that of Mr. Welborn and Mr. Bowers, also given before the congressional committee.

Mr. Bowers said he took all matters of importance up with Mr. Rockefeller, notwithstanding he was ignorant of Mr. Rockefeller's holdings in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Mr. Welborn testified that he was not personally acquainted with all the company's mine superintendents; that he was not accustomed even to talking with the coal miners, and had not even met them personally when they were discussing the strike at the time when it was called.

General Manager Weitzel under Mr. Welborn further revealed the remote and absentee character of landlordism by testifying that not even he visited the mines frequently, and there was testimony such as that of James Fyler, given before the congressional committee, to the effect that Mr. Weitzel did not come around among the miners enough to be personally known to them, even by sight.

If ever absentee landlordism, a landlordism of an absentee character in many successive stages, was proven to exist, it was shown in the State of Colorado by the admissions of Mr. Weitzel, Mr. Welborn, Mr. Bowers, and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., himself, who now comes before the country in the humanitarian aspect of president of the Rockefeller Foundation.

On another side, however, the testimony as to Mr. Rockefeller's remote reliance upon his subordinates in Colorado does not appear to have been entirely ingenuous. Letters and telegrams were produced before the Commission on Industrial Relations at its Denver hearing tending to show that Mr. Rockefeller manifested at times a very lively interest in the conduct of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. The voice was the voice of Welborn, but the hand was the hand of Rockefeller. Mr. Rockefeller's telegram to Mr. Welborn of April 30, 1914, was direct evidence of Mr. Rockefeller's active participation in the Colorado management. Mr. Rockefeller's letter of August 11 to Mr. Welborn, inclosing a memorandum prepared by Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King, of Canada, discloses the same intimate, observant, and controlling attitude, and the inclosure from Mr. King interestingly indicates a plan in contemplation by Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. King of providing for collective bargaining and arbitration in labor disputes, though without the compulsion and quite independently of law.

Mr. King's recommendations, which were evidently invited—and I believe Mr. Rockefeller admitted here that he invited and approved them—are commented upon by Mr. Rockefeller in this correspondence and show a decided hostility to dealing in any manner or form with the United Mine Workers of America. He points out that because of the European war—and I am quoting his exact language—"there are many foreigners who may feel compelled to return to Europe, and that may prove a factor of importance" in terminating the Colorado strike.

He further coldly asserts, to quote him exactly, that "in certain industries it is going to be easy for employers to find all the labor they desire, and unions will be confronted with a new problem. Recognition," he says, "simply for the sake of recognition is going to be seen less pressing as an immediate end than that of maintaining standards already existing, and the union men may rightly come to regard as their friends and allies companies and corporations large enough and fair enough to maintain these standards of their own accord. For the unions to take a different view will certainly mean to lose the substance of fair conditions while wasting resources in fighting for the shadow of recognition."

It will be observed, in passing, that the proper point of view, the democratic self-governing point of view, as to the right of association, as Mr. Mitchell called it yesterday, is entirely lost sight of in this statement of Mr. Mackenzie King. The right to organize and deal collectively are fundamental, and every argument in opposition has been used in times past by those who have denied such other elemental rights as free speech, and even political self-government. Any open-minded reader of what has just been quoted from Mr. Mackenzie King and the other correspondence submitted to this commission at the Denver hearing must have concluded, even without the admission of Mr. Rockefeller last week, that the appointment of Mr. Ivy Leibetter Lee as the secret publicity man for the coal operators of Colorado, at a salary of $1,000 per month, in the political campaign of last summer and fall, was a further act directly sanctioned by Mr. Rockefeller. This selection of one standing high in the councils of Mr. Rockefeller and his foundations resulted in the circulation of gross falsehoods, among which those untruths relating to alleged excessive salaries paid officers of the United Mine Workers have been publicly admitted, although somewhat belatedly, and these widely circulated libels had the undoubted effect of prejudicing public opinion and arousing public passion in a vital hour of industrial struggle against the officers and misrepresented practices of the United Mine Workers of America.

We have, then, clear proof in the testimony in the Colorado hearing of an undemocratic, feudalistic state of industry existing there—a remote landlordism dipping into the management of its foreign property whenever so disposed and shielding itself against responsibility for shocking practices whenever assailed by public opinion on the pleas of humane generosity or reliance on subordinates. We have, too, the direct promotion of misinformation given widespread public currency and the moving picture revealed of coldly calculated schemes set on foot to compel the workers to accept the mere largesse of big business, while big business demands the surrender of the rights and advantages of collective labor in a world of collective capital and offers what is termed the substance rather than the shadow of union recognition. The plan on analysis reveals nothing but a determination on Mr. Rockefeller's part to deal out feudalistic benefits and to resist compulsion in that direction. Most sinister of all, we discover an attitude of hard indifference to public consequences precipitated by autocratic determination to run business as its masters prescribe, without legal restriction or public control of any genuine sort. This is the very heart of the criticism, both by Mr. Lawson and Mr. Mitchell, of the impracticability of the proposed conference between the operators and the representatives of the mine workers who are to be selected by the miners in groups of 250. The suggestion of Mr. Lawson and Mr. Mitchell in that connection do not require, I assume, any addition from me at this time.

All this testimony, interestingly enough, ties up with the very forces which now seek public favor under the title of the Rockefeller Foundation, organized to do the very things which in their domination of the recent coal strike in Colorado from the employers' standpoint they have signally neglected and failed to do, namely, diffuse information, prevent suffering, and promote well-being and civilization of the people in the United States and in the world.

The fundamental fault alike of Mr. Rockefeller's business methods and his philanthropies would appear to lie in its personal direction and its promotion of personal advantage to the exclusion of the public welfare. In the investigations of the hookworm in the South, the vice districts in Chicago and New York, and in his generous donations to the Belgium fund, Mr. Rockefeller has shown the splendid side and possibilities of intelligent charity. For these beneficent acts he is entitled to and will doubtless receive proper public appreciation. The one danger in them in the light of Colorado's experience is that these philanthropies may obscure the sordid practices of big business in Colorado and elsewhere, out of which Mr. Rockefeller and others derive vast funds, a portion only of which they expend in directions tending at one and the same time to their laudation and their further earning power.

The fundamental fault in Mr. Rockefeller's attitude toward the public and the workers appears to lie in its undermining autocracy. We have in the Rockefeller Foundation a supreme example of the philanthropy which deadens, by its large benefactions, a public criticism which otherwise would be as formidable as inevitable.

In Colorado, where Mr. Rockefeller is financially interested on the earning side, he has ignored the standards to which the foundation is dedicated. He has relied on Mr. Bowers, Mr. Welborn, and Mr. Weitzel, taking their report of conditions as conclusive, regardless of disinterested advice. He did not so proceed when the vice districts of New York and Chicago were under scrutiny. There he sent expert and incorruptible investigators, but he sat indifferent, his eyes closed, and his ears deaf to the sorrows and cries of men, women, and children in Colorado, allowing Mr. Welborn and his associates to act as judges in their own case with reference to complaints against tyrannous and lawless practices uttered by thousands of men in their employ.

Is it too much to say that a philanthropy so inconsistent, unless corrected and liberated, must become a menace to the civilization it purports to serve? The presumption which should be indulged against the withdrawal of great fortunes from productive industry for eleemosynary purposes will therefore certainly be called into play against the Rockefeller Foundation until such practices as have prevailed in Colorado are corrected, and unless science and humanitarianism, as a matter of fact, walks hand in hand under the banner of charity. Society has a right to demand that charity shall no longer cover a multitude of economic sins. Mr. Rockefeller, who appears to the world in the relief afforded Belgium, a liberal benefactor, stands convicted before the workers of Colorado as a narrowly biased and visionless money-maker. Philanthropy so conducted from the beginning of the world to the present day has been a barrier to the correction of economic wrongs. It has promoted aristocracy; it has retarded democratic equality of opportunity, and so considered the Rockefeller Foundation and other like philanthropic undertakings may themselves be counted by this commission vital causes of present-day industrial unrest.

One question remaining to be investigated, to which insufficient attention has been given, is this: Who have been the victims of the antisocial feudalism and the absentee landlordism complained of, leaving the unoffending public out of the question for the time being? No charge has been more frequently made than the one that ignorant foreigners have precipitated all the industrial difficulties in Colorado.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet of the character given circulation in Colorado last summer and fall, this being part of a report of a subcommittee appointed to investigate the strike situation by the Kensington Council, No. 16, Junior O. U. A. M., circulated by the coal operators of Colorado last fall. In it occurs this statement, which has been commonly made in that State:

"Practically all of the miners involved in this strike are ignorant, depraved, and brutal foreigners, from the lowest and poorest class of people of southern Europe, who know little and care less for the principles of free government."

If these charges were true they would not relieve the employers from a grave responsibility, since, as Mr. Welborn himself indicated in his letter to Mr. McClement of December 4, 1913, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. had established, as it established in prior strikes in Colorado, an employment organization for the active movement of men from the East. These men, imported as strike breakers, as the congressional investigations showed, were the commonest order of foreign labor. Many of them were illiterate. They were of scattered nationalities and, as the testimony on the subject of peonage showed, some of them were far below the human average, physically and mentally. The responsibility for their importation manifestly rests directly on the employers, and the correspondence and testimony of the employers will be searched in vain for any apology for their sweeping of the dregs of human labor to displace old-time employees in the State of Colorado.

On the contrary, the correspondence of Mr. Welborn and Mr. Rockefeller alike and the frankly outspoken attitude of Mr. Osgood leave no doubt of the determination of the employers to use every means available for economic profit. This attitude is bolstered up by any and every argument. For instance, in Mr. Welborn's letter to Mr. McClement of December 4, 1913, Mr. Welborn gives as an excuse for not discussing with employees even just grievances the following explanation:

"There has never been any substantial objection to meeting our own employees or our former employees for the purpose of discussing proper matters, yet we have felt that such a meeting might be construed as an indirect recognition of the officers of the union."

Under what conceivable circumstances, assuming the correctness of this position, might similar refusal not be made? Mr. King's interesting suggestions of August 6, 1914, already mentioned, show the same determination to run the business of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. as that corporation sees fit. Mr. King points out that the situation in Europe and the large amount of unemployment resulting from the war are going to eventuate in thousands of men from the Old World seeking employment here. Without reference to the right or wrong of a proper adjustment of the industrial situation, Mr. King is evidently urging on Mr. Rockefeller a waiting policy, which he anticipates will undermine unionism and tend to restore what he calls "normal conditions in Colorado."

It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that Mr. Rockefeller's position is not in essence one of assault on the so-called "ignorant foreigner" except when Mr. Rockefeller figures that the foreigner is not working in harmony with the Rockefeller plans. Indeed, Mr. Welborn, in his letter of May 27, 1914, to Mr. McClement, pays tribute to the great loyalty to employers manifested by foreign employees in Colorado in the difficulties after Ludlow.

An impartial investigation of the chief sufferers in the Ludlow catastrophe will conclusively demonstrate that they were not for the most part ignorant or undesirable citizens, as so often represented. The industrial war in Colorado involved and ruined many exceptional and valuable types of men and women representing the best foreign elements of our population. Moreover, it indiscriminately cut down American citizens of the first, second, and even third generation.

Mrs. Petrucci, whose three children were smothered at Ludlow, was born at Hastings, Colo., within 3 miles of their death place. Her husband is a naturalized citizen. She is a citizen by birth, and her children were, of course, citizens.

Mr. Fyler, who died unarmed at Ludlow, shot while a militia prisoner on the night of April 20, was an American citizen, frank, intelligent, religious, and home-loving. He testified twice before the congressional committee in Colorado last February. His wife and three girls, his married daughter and her baby, his grandchild, were all in the zone of fire and in imminent peril throughout the Battle of Ludlow.

Louis Tikas, who died at the same time and under the same circumstances with Fyler, after first being subjected to assault, having a rifle stock broken over his head by Militia Lieut. Linderfelt, was commonly understood to be a graduate of the College of Athens and a descendant of famous Greek leaders. He wielded an unusual influence among all foreigners in southern Colorado, especially among the Greeks, and Capt. van Cise, formerly of the Colorado State Militia, has repeatedly declared that Tikas was the greatest single agent for peace during the strike in southern Colorado.

Mrs. Dominiske, who witnessed and was in danger through almost all the thrilling incidents of the Battle of Ludlow, the mother of three children of tender years, who accompanied her throughout the day, is of English birth, and an American citizen by marriage, her husband having been born in Pennsylvania.

I mention these things because Commissioner Weinstock questioned Mr. Mitchell closely yesterday upon the conditions surrounding the violence following Ludlow and because the same questions were directed the other day in much detail to Mr. Lawson; and I desire to say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that the United Mine Workers of America have to-day in this room, in the presence of this commission, Mrs. Dominiske, to whom I have referred, and Mrs. Petrucci, to whom I have referred, typical representatives of the people who were in the Ludlow colony on the day when it was destroyed. And I think there can be no proper answer given to the inquiries made of Mr. Mitchell yesterday by Commissioner Weinstock, and very properly made, but there can be no adequate reply given to those inquiries as to the violence which occurred after Ludlow except through this commission calling these witnesses to the stand and letting them tell in their simple, self-respecting ways what occurred on that occasion. This commission should know the story.

These women are of humble circumstances, but they are, as I have indicated, respectable in every sense. They are entitled to be heard here, and neither one, so far as I am informed, has ever given her testimony publicly and broadly upon this subject. And on behalf of the United Mine Workers of America, I desire to present formally to the commission a request that Mrs. Dominiske first and Mrs. Petrucci next be permitted to tell their stories of Ludlow for the consideration of this commission in connection with the so-termed "Call to Arms," about which Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Lawson were particularly interrogated.

It is needless to enumerate further; neither Mr. Rockefeller nor any portion of the public can escape the conclusion that our industrial methods, when dominated by feudalism of Mr. Rockefeller's type, are bringing ruin and death on men, women, and children who are naturally equipped to exalt rather than lower the standards of our citizenship.

In the long controversy in Colorado's latest strike the United Mine Workers demanded law enforcement and fully recognized the principle that the rights of society were of more importance than the rights either of labor or of capital.

It appears certain that the Colorado strike might have been settled from that standpoint months after its origin by the simple device of a conference for the discussion of grievances, where the public's primary rights could have been made the basis of reasonable terms. With or without excuse, the request for a conference was denied from first to last by the operators. As a result the principles of feudalism have again triumphed in Colorado and we now have the beneficent suggestion made that the Rockefeller Foundation, following the Rockefeller triumph over union labor in Colorado, will investigate the labor conditions in that State.

In other words, Mr. Rockefeller plans to do his own investigating, as he conducted his own settlement of our industrial difficulties. He does not recognize the supremacy of social rights or the soundness or impartiality of governmental investigation. He plans to drive all the time with the reins forever in his own hands. Nothing could more clearly demonstrate that the Rockefeller Foundation is primarily an asset of the Rockefeller industrial system, and only secondly a public charity. It is pertinent to remember that even feudalism and slavery boasted of their occasional generosity.

Certain conclusions from the analysis of the Rockefeller Foundation in its relation to the Colorado situation would appear to be warranted. One is that feudalism in industry must yield to democracy among the workers if permanent peace is to prevail and society's welfare is to be paramount. Another is that justice is more important than charity, and society may even need to limit fortunes, if their generous employment is to be in the direction of their further reckless accumulation. Another is that private charity, whether from a dead or from a living hand, closes the mouth of criticism, blinds society to the faults of the benefactor, whether of omission or commission, and permits the philanthropist to plume himself on virtues, forgetful of offenses, with consequent false standards all along the line, delaying the day of democracy of labor and equality of opportunity.

Finally, may it not be said to be established that justice and charity are alike functions of the State, which may and should employ them in the interest of all rather than some? When private philanthropy results merely in further exploitation, is it not time to turn to public agencies for the conservation alike of property and of the rights of men, women, and children? The most generous estimate that the somewhat disillusioned public will place on Mr. Rockefeller's activities is that the foundation is dealing with effects, while through the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and other industrial agencies he is actually and visibly feeding the flames and causes of industrial unrest.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Before putting the question to you, Mr. Costigan, that I am about to submit, it may be well, in order that it may not be misunderstood, to call attention to the fact that as an employer I am on record as being in favor of organized labor and being in favor of recognizing and dealing with organized labor, and in my own affairs wherever there has been organized labor I have invariably recognized and dealt with it. Yet I want to ask you this question: Would you regard it as a moral or legal crime for an employer, for any reason or for no reason, to decline to recognize or deal with organized labor?

Mr. COSTIGAN. At the present time, Mr. Weinstock, I know of no law which makes it a crime, legally speaking, to refuse to deal with organized labor. Ethically, I believe that society has about arrived at the point of view that men who desire to organize should be permitted to organize and deal through their representatives with collective capital.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Again speaking for myself, Mr. Costigan, while I think it wise and proper and in the interest of the common good as an employer to recognize and deal with organized labor, I feel that my neighboring employer, my competing employer, has just as much moral right and legal right to refuse, for any reason or for no reason, to recognize or deal with organized labor. Now the crux of this whole issue, Mr. Costigan, as I gather it, in the Colorado situation is the one point, the recognition and dealing with organized labor. When we get at the heart of what you have presented in so able and so exhaustive a manner before this commission we find that seemingly from your point of view the sin of the Colorado operators was in their refusal to recognize or deal with organized labor; and yet I think we will have to admit that when they did that they stood upon their rights; and while you and I and many of us might criticize their judgment, might feel that it was a mistake on their part not to have done so, they have a right to the exercise of their judgment, to the exercise of their opinions, precisely as you and I have the right to the exercise of our judgment and of our opinions. Does it not then resolve itself down to this one thing simply, to a criticism of their judgment in the exercise of their moral and legal rights?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think not, Mr. Weinstock. They ignored the rights of society, and I do not want in my former reply to suggest that I believe that they may ignore the ethical appeal of modern society and refuse to deal with the employees. The coal operators in Colorado ignored society's rights and went further. They indulged in practices which made it exceedingly difficult for their employees to meet the economic burden thrown upon them. They not only refused to confer with our organized labor, they refused to confer with any group of employees, whether within or without a union, who might have desired to meet together and select a representative. They refused to go even so far as they now purport to be going, and I am not speaking at this time of the violations of law which I have somewhat hastily sketched, which provoked a great portion of the disturbances in the State of Colorado. I don't know that I answer your question, but if not I shall be glad enough to elaborate my views.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, be good enough, Mr. Reporter, to read my question. I don't think it does quite answer my question, Mr. Costigan.

(Question read as follows: "Again speaking for myself, Mr. Costigan, while I think it wise and proper and in the interest of the common good as an employer to recognize and deal with organized labor, I feel that my neighboring employer or my competing employer, has just as much moral right and legal right to refuse, for any reason or for no reason, to recognize or deal with organized labor. Now the crux of this whole issue, Mr. Costigan, as I gather it, in the Colorado situation is the one point, the recognition and dealing with organized labor. When we get at the heart of what you have presented in so able and so exhaustive a manner before this commission we find that seemingly, from your point of view, the sin of the Colorado operators was in their refusal to recognize or deal with organized labor; and yet I think we will have to admit that when they did that they stood upon their rights, and while you and I and many of us might criticize their judgment, might feel that it was a mistake on their part not to have done so, they have a right to the exercise of their judgment, to the exercise of their opinions, precisely as you and I have the right to the exercise of our judgment and of our opinions. Does it not then resolve itself down to this one thing simply, to a criticism of their judgment in the exercise of their moral and legal rights?")

Mr. COSTIGAN. One answer that I should give to that question, if I understand it, is that, in my judgment, the crux may or may not have been the failure to recognize or deal with organized labor. My judgment is that the failure to recognize was not important; that the failure to confer was important. But beyond that the coal companies of Colorado, had they obeyed the laws of the State of Colorado, would have averted the distressing strike which occurred in that State, with or without the recognition of organized labor and with or without conference with its people. That is my judgment.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 p. m. of this Tuesday, February 2, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Costigan, will you please resume the stand?

We will have perfect order, ladies and gentleman, and we will proceed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Reporter, will you kindly read Mr. Costigan's last answer just before the noon recess?

(Answer read as follows: "One answer that I should give to that question, if I understand it, is that, in my judgment, the crux may or may not have been the failure to recognize or deal with organized labor. My judgment is that the failure to recognize was not important; that the failure to confer was important. That is my judgment.")

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I continue my answer, Mr. Weinstock?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I should like to read into the record, in connection with that answer and bearing especially on the subject of the morality phase of Commissioner Weinstock's inquiry, the following statement made by Seth Low in an address as president of the National Civic Federation at Washington in March, 1912:

"It appears to me utterly impossible for stockholders united in a corporation to sustain themselves in a position of claiming for themselves every privilege of combination and at the same time to insist upon dealing with their employees only as individuals and to deny them the right of collective bargaining. When a corporation declines to recognize a labor union, is it not doing precisely this? I understand perfectly that the employer would rather be entirely free to do as he pleases. The precise point I am trying to make clear is that he can not expect to be free to do as he pleases under the combinations of modern industry. Men are combining in all departments of life as never before, and industry can not expect to be exempt from this world-wide tendency. The old personal relation between the employer and employee has gone by the board, with the result that the men are, in a sense, forced to look after their own interests because the impersonal employer perhaps without meaning to be so, is perhaps less interested in them than the employer was in the old days when master and workmen worked side by side.

"And above everything else, the spirit of democracy is in the air so that men who are constantly influencing the government under which they live, are naturally determined to have something to say about the conditions under which they are called upon to work. The employer can decline, as he often does, to recognize a union, and in that way he can provoke strikes, which, in their turn, result in violence. When he does this simply because he is unwilling to recognize a labor union, he perpetuates, if he does not create, a state of war in industry. And he must share the responsibility for this result when he acts so illogically.

"The so-called open shop, in most instances, is not a shop in which union men and nonunion men work side by side. Ordinarily it is a shop from which union men are excluded if they are known to belong to a union, or, if they are admitted, they are admitted only upon condition that they forego many of the advantages for which they joined the union, conspicuous among the advantages to be derived being the right of collective bargaining through representatives of their own choice."

I need not add, of course, that Mr. Low has been mayor of New York, mayor of Brooklyn, president of Columbia University, a business man in the partnership of A. A. Low & Sons, and an arbitrator in many important disputes. I should like to add also as part of my answer the following brief quotation from the work of Adams and Sumner, known as Labor Problems, reading from page 227:

"The present function par excellence of labor organization is the collective bargaining, and collective bargaining, it is believed, is the inevitable precursor, historically speaking, of the era of industrial peace."

I think it will be sufficient to supplement those two quotations by the expression of the opinion that it is ethically wrong in our time, and in the light and in the modern view of the relations which should exist between capital and labor, for collective capital to decline to confer with collective labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Coming back, then, to your answer, Mr. Costigan, you state that in your judgment the failure to recognize organized labor was not important; that the failure to confer was important. If I, as your employee, Mr. Costigan, should, for any reason or for no reason, suddenly leave your employ and do it in a way to cause you the greatest inconvenience and the greatest loss to your business, should do it with a deliberate intention to cripple your business if I could, would you be blamed if you refused thereafter to confer with me?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Will you permit me to answer something that your question first suggests before I take up the latter end of the question.

When I made the statement that the failure to recognize organized labor was not important, and the failure to confer was, in my judgment, important, I referred to methods for obtaining industrial peace in the particular dispute which occurred in the State of Colorado. I was not laying that down as a broad social proposition.

I believe, Mr. Weinstock, that in the instance you speak of, there would be some ethical obligations on the part of the employee, ordinarily speaking, to consider the welfare of the employer. I think, however, that that suggestion should be supplemented by the statement that the human right to work or to quit work ordinarily should be regarded as something superior to the convenience of an employer. And I think that the instance you cite is one of the instances which justifies laying some emphasis upon what we term human rights as distinguished from property rights.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. Well, then, your position, I take it, Mr. Costigan, is practically this: That when a body of workers come together and organize themselves into a union, and they come to the employer and want recognition, that it is the ethical duty of the employer to grant them recognition? Is that your position, Mr. Costigan?

Mr. COSTIGAN. My position, Mr. Weinstock, briefly, is this: That when any number of employees, let us say five out of any number, say as many as a thousand, desire to act concertedly with their employers, those five should be permitted to organize, elect a chairman, a secretary, or other representatives, and whether in a closed or an open shop should have the right to present their grievances and their point of view to the employer. It is not necessarily a position calling for a closed shop.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, substantially, Mr. Costigan, I think I stated your position correctly: That if a group of workers come together and organize and appoint representatives, that it is the ethical duty of the employer to recognize and to deal with that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If by that you mean recognize, I certainly so believe.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well. Now, if you were an employer, Mr. Costigan, would you care to recognize or to deal with a group of men, no matter who they were or what they were, that you knew in advance were contract breakers, for example, and that any agreement that you might make with them would last only so long as it suited their purpose—would you care to recognize or to deal with a group of men such as that, for example?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Granting your hypothesis, I presume I should not care to. I am not saying that there may not be some social obligation, though, to deal with such men.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You and I know, for example, that the I. W. W.'s, to illustrate, boldly announce the statement that they will not respect any contract made with employers; that they regard themselves at perfect liberty to break any contract or any agreement made with an employer when it suits their will. Would you, therefore, for example, recognize or deal with a group of I. W. W.'s?

Mr. COSTIGAN. To the extent to which I have committed myself, I certainly would. That is, if any group of employees in my establishment desired to meet, elect representatives, and send them with their grievances or their complaint to me, I should feel that that right was well grounded in social necessity.

Back of the question you ask, Mr. Weinstock, lies the economic fact that the employer must first employ the men of whom you speak. He is not obliged, in other words, to begin the relation at all. But if he does create the relation with these men, he ought to hear their grievances, if they have any, whether real or imaginary.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, as an employer, I take it, Mr. Costigan, even if it developed that your employees, for example, were I. W. W.'s, and they shouted from the housetops that they were perfectly frank and straightforward in their statements that any agreement they entered into with you would not be respected by them whenever they thought it was to their interests not to respect it—despite that fact you would recognize and deal with them, would you?

Mr. COSTIGAN. To the extent I answered you, I certainly should.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you accord to other employers, under the circumstances, the right to refuse or decline to deal with them?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I should not, referring to the standard I have attempted to state. As I see it, the employer would have ordinarily the right to discharge or the right to employ, and those safeguards ought to protect the employer under normal circumstances.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In passing, Mr. Costigan, you are quite familiar, of course, with the laws and regulations of the United Mine Workers of America. I take it you have thoroughly informed yourself on them. May I ask for information? Are the United Mine Workers of America, as a body, socialistic? Are they committed to socialism collectively; that is, officially?

Mr. COSTIGAN. My understanding is that they are not. However, I do not speak on that with final voice, but I think the general public are advised that they have not openly advocated socialism.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know whether it is a part of the by-laws of the United Mine Workers of America that they are committed to socialism?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I assume that it is not; but I should prefer to have Mr. Lawson, who is here, answer questions of that kind.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If Mr. Lawson is here, I will put that question to him, if he will answer.

Chairman WALSH. He is sitting over there [indicating]. Please stand up, Mr. Lawson; Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you one other question.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN R. LAWSON—Recalled.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is the United Mine Workers of America officially committed to socialism?

Mr. LAWSON. It is not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, it is left to the individual member to be a Socialist or not, as he chooses?

Mr. LAWSON. Absolutely.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But collectively they are not committed to it officially?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Thank you for the information.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN—Continued.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, of course everybody must concede, Mr. Costigan, the right to you, if you were an employer, to recognize or deal with any group or body of men, no matter what their policies or attitude might be. On the other hand, I think you and I will have to admit that the employers have an equal right to determine for themselves their policy. And if I was an employer, for example, and differed with Mr. Costigan and did not think that it was wise or proper or expedient for me, as an employer, to deal with a group such as the I. W. W., who are avowedly contract breakers, and that to deal with them is to be a waste of time, for whatever agreement is entered into with them to-day would be broken to-morrow, and time is too precious to waste in dealing with contract breakers—I certainly would have the right ethically to take that position, would I not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That would be my judgment, assuming that your hypothesis is correct.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. We find, whether right or wrong, that that was the attitude of the Colorado operators. They did charge—whether it is so or not, and I am frank to confess that up to this time I do not know; we have not had sufficient evidence—but they did charge that the United Mine Workers of America were contract breakers, and that therefore they did not care to recognize or deal with contract breakers; and so long as they honestly and sincerely believed that to be true, where did they violate any ethics?

Mr. COSTIGAN. They did not honestly or sincerely believe it to be true, Mr. Weinstock. The charge was investigated before the congressional committee and was not substantiated.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You believe, then, that they were not sincere when they offered that as a reason for declining to recognize or deal with the United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. COSTIGAN. My answer would justly lead to that impression, I think.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. Further, in your answer you pointed out, had the coal companies of Colorado obeyed the laws of the State of Colorado they would have averted the distressing strike which occurred in that State, with or without recognition of organized labor, and with or without conference with the people. May I ask whose duty it was to enforce the laws of the State of Colorado?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was the duty of every citizen who had it in his power to obey and to see that those laws were not violated. It was the duty, of course, of the public officials to enforce the laws, but had the employers complied with the laws there would have been no burden of enforcing the laws placed upon the State officials.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, let us grant for the time being that the charges that the employers deliberately, intentionally, and knowingly violated the laws were true, what State officials should have enforced them?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course, it is customary in such cases in our jurisdiction for the district attorneys to prosecute violators of the law, by the filing of information directly in our criminal courts or with the assistance of grand juries in the bringing in of indictments. The governor of the State has certain powers in Colorado which might be invoked in the direction of law enforcement also, and other State officials might in various ways be used to the end you have indicated.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If these public officials were derelict in their duties, is it or is it not a fact, Mr. Costigan, that you have the recall on the statute books of Colorado, and could not the wage earners, who are greatly in the majority in Colorado, have had recourse to the recall so that these derelict officials might have been put out of office and others chosen in their places who would enforce the law?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The State of Colorado adopted the recall of State officials two years ago. The policy of the governor of Colorado took an acute form in our industrial difficulties many months later. Under the provisions of the recall amendment as adopted in Colorado it would have required a good many months to have submitted the question of the recall of the governor, for example, to a popular vote. In fact, at the time the suggested recall of the governor of Colorado was being discussed it was estimated by competent attorneys that it would be impossible to reach a popular vote upon that question with the ordinary legal obstacles interposed—the ordinary difficulties encountered, to be overcome, short of about three months before the expiration of the term of office of the governor of Colorado. Our term of office is for two years, and there were practical difficulties to be overcome in the State of Colorado which prevented the trial of that experiment. The matter was widely discussed in Colorado during these troubles.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Therefore the recall was not resorted to?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Not as to that particular office.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know of any better way, Mr. Costigan, that the people of the State of Colorado could make it possible for the workers of the State to punish a derelict official than through the medium of the recall?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Personally, I am a strong believer in the system of the recall and have long publicly advocated it in my State, Mr. Weinstock. I believe, however, that the recall, the initiative, and referendum are alike far more effective in their indirect influence than in their direct.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, granting that all that you point out is just as you point it out, granting that in the judgment of the workers in Colorado the governor had not been efficient in enforcing the laws, and granting that it would have involved time and labor and expense to make use of the recall, and granting that if the recall had been successful, it would have taken away from the governor only three months of his administration, but despite all that, would that not have been the most effective way of establishing an example to other public officials and burning it into their hearts that unless they performed their duties and enforced the laws that they would be subject to the same sort of legal treatment at the hands of the voters?

Mr. COSTIGAN. From the standpoint of other officials, I think that is true, but one of the difficulties about using these great tools of democracy, as they are termed, is that the taxpayers are prone to criticize frequent elections, and the expenses connected with them, and to blame the promoters of such elections for what they are frequently inclined to term "unnecessary expense," so that you frequently will not obtain the same popular judgment undimmed by passion and side currents in such elections that you will in the ordinary popular elections.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, then, on the other hand, Mr. Costigan, if the violations of laws were so flagrant as claimed, when could the voters of Colorado ever hope to get another combination of circumstances affecting so many people as were affected by this industrial strife in Colorado, when could they ever hope to have a better opportunity to exercise the right of the recall and show its effectiveness than they had just at that particular time?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have been a fairly close observer for a great many years of the course of elections in Colorado, Mr. Weinstock, and I never knew a State election in Colorado in which all other elections did not seem relatively unimportant. We have had burning public issues year after year in that State, and what appears to you an extraordinary situation as indicated by your question, from the standpoint of many voters of Colorado did not appear so phenomenal. Thus it was difficult in Colorado and it is always difficult in Colorado to arouse public opinion to the actual pressing immediacy of the problems presented, whether in a local election or in an ordinary election.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, that being the case, then, of what value is the recall. Why have it on the statute books?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I believe it is valuable, Mr. Weinstock, for most of the reasons that have been assigned in the testimony before the commission. It is valuable for its possible use in the humiliation of recreant public officials; valuable when a public opinion can be aroused to exercise it intelligently; and valuable as many rights are valuable which may not themselves be exercised. I have in mind, in that connection, that the recall is simply the assertion in governmental affairs of a principle which is as old as the law of agency—that when the agent proves false to his trust the principal may set him aside and substitute a new agent in his stead. That principle, in my opinion, ought to be established in active governmental affairs as a principle, even if it does not operate in a particular election in practice, just as the right of manhood suffrage or womanhood suffrage, in my opinion, should be allowed to men and women whether they wisely or unwisely exercise the voting privilege in a particular election.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. A point of information, Mr. Costigan: In this circular letter that was issued by the strikers under date of Denver, Colo., April 22, 1914—in the records it is headed "A Call to Arms"—did those words appear in the circular itself?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I don't know, Mr. Weinstock. I had nothing to do with its preparation, and I never saw it. In Mr. Ivy Leibetter Lee's publication it is termed "A Call to Rebellion."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Again, I should like to refer to Mr. Lawson, if you desire to know that information.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; I should be glad to know that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If Mr. Lawson knows.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN B. LAWSON—Recalled.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I will ask you to answer that question, Mr. Lawson; how was that circular letter headed?

Mr. LAWSON. I don't recall exactly now, Mr. Weinstock, offhand, but I think we can get a copy of the original circular, which might speak for itself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think we have a copy of it in our records, though it is not convenient to look it up at the moment. It reads here, I see, "A Call to Arms."

Chairman WALSH. We have had it introduced in evidence several times. It says, "A Call to Arms."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is the original heading.

Chairman WALSH. That is the original.

Commissioner LENNON. That is the original document. I have seen it, and it is headed, "A Call to Arms."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, then. Thank you, Mr. Lawson.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). I meant that was all with Mr. Lawson.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD F. COSTIGAN—Continued.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For your information, Mr. Costigan, let me read from the testimony of Mr. Mitchell given before the commission on yesterday:

"Question. You made the statement, Mr. Mitchell, that while there were extenuating circumstances in connection with the Colorado situation, in connection with the issue of that Call to Arms, that you nevertheless considered it wrong, and that if you had been in the strike you would not have signed the 'Call to Arms.' Will you state to this commission why you regard that 'Call to Arms' as wrong?

"Answer. Well, as I understand it, under the laws of the United States men do not have the right to make calls to arms. I may say that I am informed that the men who did make these statements did not understand that it was contrary to law. I am told that they were advised by counsel that under the Constitution of the United States the right to bear arms included the right to issue a call to arms, and I think in that respect, legally, there was a distinction which was not recognized. The right to bear arms does not legally mean a right to issue a call to men to gather arms.

"Question. In your opinion, then, they were badly advised?

"Answer. I should not say that. I should say the conditions, the state of mind in which the men were placed or the men found themselves at that time accounts, perhaps, more than anything else for their action."

Now, in how far, Mr. Costigan, are you in accord with the attitude taken by Mr. Mitchell where he says it was wrong to have issued that call, and that it was in violation of law.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The constitution of the State of Colorado, Article II, section 13, contains this language:

"The right of no person to keep and bear arms in defense of his home, person, and property, or in aid of the civil powers when they are legally summoned, shall be called in question."

I assume that it was under that provision of the constitution that the legal advice given, if it was given, as Mr. Mitchell testifies, was offered. Permit me to say I had nothing to do with counseling at that time with reference to this call or any phase of it. Permit me also to say, Mr. Weinstein, that I do not believe it to be humanly possible to say accurately what a man would do under the provocation which was given to the signers of this declaration, without being in the actual situation. And that is one of the reasons why I asked—why I took the liberty this morning of requesting this commission on behalf of the United Mine Workers of America to hear the story of these women who passed through April 20 in the tent colony, at Ludlow.

Some of the signers of this document were close friends and associates of the men, women, and children who died at Ludlow. These people had acted in co-operation through a good many months to gain ends that labor considered indispensable for the protection of the most elemental rights. And the condition which arose at Ludlow was one, as suggested by Mr. Mitchell, in which the people who lived at Ludlow affiliated with the United Mine Workers of America believed if it was not a fact, that they were being set upon and had been set upon by armed thugs rather than by representatives of the State of Colorado. I wish in this connection to read into the record two or three phrases from the military commission report prepared by Messrs. Boughton, Van Cise, and Danks, three members of the militia who first investigated from the standpoint of the State Militia of Colorado what had occurred at Ludlow. Among other things, the report contained this language:

"There is no question but that there were instances where the mine guards unnecessarily provoked the residents of the tent colonies"—

Referring now to the time preceding the 20th of April, and perhaps including the day as well—

"these latter in turn seemed honestly to believe that they and their families were in danger from the mine guards. They therefore armed themselves for protection."

On the ninth page of the same report we have this language, with reference to these mine guards in the State Militia and the strikers:

"The intensest hatred of each other in their hearts; ready to fly at each other's throats."

With reference to the particular events preceding Ludlow, we have this description:

"Practically all National Guards were enlisted about the middle of April among the superintendents and foremen, the clerical force, physicians, storekeepers, mine guards, and other residents of the coal camps. This unit of the National Guard was designated Troop A, but so recently was it recruited that at the time of the battle at Ludlow it had not yet selected its officers nor was it supplied with uniforms, arms, and ammunition. When this company was called to reinforce the uniformed guardsmen at Ludlow its members appeared in civilian clothes and gave rise, perhaps excusably, to the belief of the strikers that they were armed mine guards, a class much hated by the colonists."

We have also on page 8 of this report—and earlier than page 8—the following language with reference particularly to the event that occurred on the day of the destruction of the tent colony at Ludlow:

"During the evening Louis Tikas and James Fyler and an unknown striker were taken prisoners. Lieut. K. E. Linderfelt swung his Springfield rifle and breaking the stock over the head of the prisoner Tikas."

These statements are incorporated in the findings, I say, made by three members of the State militia immediately after or shortly after the tragedy had occurred at Ludlow. In addition 2 women and 11 children were found smothered at Ludlow. They were, as I say, close friends of a number of the men who signed this so-termed "Call to Arms." And speaking for myself, Mr. Weinstock, under those circumstances I am not prepared to say what I should have done the day after Ludlow, had I been called on to pass on the propriety of issuing a similar call.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Mitchell is quite in accord with your feelings, Mr. Costigan, that there were extenuating circumstances, but he expressed it as his opinion that despite that fact he regarded the Call to Arms as wrong, and had he been in charge he would not have permitted it, in so far as it was possible to prevent it, and he would not have signed the call. Now, do you agree with him on that point?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think Mr. Mitchell did not consider, Mr. Weinstock, the whole range of possibilities that might have affected his conduct under the circumstances, and without the slightest desire on my part to evade your question, I wish to say that I think it is entirely impossible for men acting under the provocation under which these men acted, to pass, except in a purely speculative way, upon your inquiry.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, the issuance of that call, Mr. Costigan, was either right or wrong. If it is right we ought to know it, and if it is wrong we ought to know it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am trying, Mr. Weinstock, to impress upon this commission the desirability of having this story told and then I should like to ask you yourself how you would have felt under the conditions which surrounded the events of that day. I do not hesitate to say that, speaking from my own standpoint, I should not have advised the issuance of this particular call had I been consulted. But what I want to impress upon the commission is that from the standpoint of labor, as conceded even by the most disinterested members of the militia, for Capt. van Cise and Capt. Danks are both in that class—from the standpoint of labor, when the Call to Arms was issued I have no doubt that there was the feeling that it was issued under the constitutional clause which I have quoted. It was issued with the idea of self-preservation, and it was issued, as its very language indicates, not with the design or purpose of taking up arms against the authority of the State of Colorado, but solely from the standpoint of protecting men, women, and children against the depredations of men who were in the State Militia of Colorado, and who should never have been allowed to be employed in that service.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your statement this morning, Mr. Costigan, you pointed out—I can not recall the precise language, but I think I have the sense of it—you pointed out what you regarded as a potential menace in foundations such as the Rockefeller Foundation. Did I catch your attitude correctly?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not think I used the word "potential" in that connection. I spoke of our situation in Colorado as being potentially typical rather than exceptional, but I do think that I made it perfectly apparent, Mr. Weinstock, that the Rockefeller Foundation, in my judgment, is being used to obtain public favor for men who are more or less careless of their economic practices, and who are playing by the very virtue of the approbation they secure to hide the commission of economic wrongs.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You mean then, that it is used, as it were, to throw dust in the eyes of the public?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That would be one way of expressing the situation, I think. I suggested that the mouth of criticism had been closed by very virtue of the size of the benefactions handed out in these philanthropies. Men hesitate to criticize when large gifts are coming to them from the sources they would criticize in the absence of gifts. That is what I had in mind. For instance, I have no doubt, Mr. Weinstock, that ministers in Colorado have spoken in instances less openly on the practical aspects of human brotherhood raised by the Colorado strike because of benefits either received or hoped for from the sources that were connected with the economic wrongs of which I have spoken.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So far as I can recall the testimony that was submitted to this commission in our hearings in Denver, it was testified to by members of the coal operators that the average wage of a Colorado coal miner was $4 a day. Do you know, or have you any facts at hand that would prove the contrary?

Mr. COSTIGAN. We had a great deal of testimony upon the wage question, Mr. Weinstock, taken before the congressional committee, and any testimony along that line, of course, must first of all be subjected to scrutiny, because the occupation is admittedly more or less seasonal. Men do not work all the working days of the year. And it was felt wiser, as we considered the question at that time, and I think all parties agreed that it was juster, to estimate wages rather from the annual standard.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is taking earnings rather than wages?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes. There should be in addition account given with reference to deduction. There are a great many deductions that come off the amounts you mentioned, but generally speaking I think the testimony overwhelmingly showed that no such average as you have indicated prevailed throughout Colorado. We had testimony in that committee hearing to the effect that the average earnings of a coal miner in northern Colorado, prior to the calling of the northern strike, had been $350 to $600 a year; and that after the strike the average wages had gone up from $868 to $918 a year. These wages, of course, being earned among the nonunion miners who were getting the advantage of the strike conditions in the northern field at that time. We found pretty generally that witnesses testified as a practical matter that their wages were less, by far, than the wages you have spoken of indicated.

Mr. Osgood, president of the Victor-American Fuel Co., directly admitted that the wages in Colorado were lower than those in Wyoming and Montana, and the same is true of the State of Washington.

Speaking on the subject, Mr. Osgood, who ought to be an authority, testified as follows [reading from p. 431 of the congressional record]:

"The day wage for timbermen in Wyoming is $3.45 a day; in Colorado, $3.12 a day; for track layers it is the same; for shot firers in Wyoming, $3.90; and in Colorado, $3.25; machine runners in Wyoming are paid $3.90, and in Colorado, $3.84." You can see there is no continuity. I am just giving you a few of these: Machine helpers, $3.45 a day in Wyoming and $3.36 in Colorado. So I can not figure the average. I can only say that their wages, as a rule, are higher for day labor than ours. This, of course, refers to day labor, and I think the testimony referred to contract labor. But the same parallel prevails.

Generally speaking, and I ought to mention in that connection, I think, Mr. Weinstock, as of course the commission knows, that in Wyoming the United Mine Workers are under contract with the operators. You have union conditions in Wyoming and nonunion conditions in Colorado.

We had a great deal of testimony in the Colorado hearing which showed wages much below the wages of which I have spoken, through deductions. A number of witnesses who testified about peonage had worked, as I remember their testimony, approximately two months under contract, and a large part of them were still in debt to the company for their original supplies.

I ought to say, however, on this general subject of wages, Mr. Weinstock, that it was not the wage feature of the complaint which was regarded by the miners as most important. The absence of checkweighmen, the failure to have the social and economic and industrial opportunities that men desire were also in my relations with the United Mine Workers of America regarded as far more important than the mere daily wages about which you have been inquiring.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Costigan, there has been much testimony as to the responsibility of directors of corporations. Will you please give us your idea as to the responsibility of directors to study and know something about labor conditions in the corporations of which they are directors. I do not mean legal responsibility, but responsibility as men who are directing industry?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In my opinion, Mr. Lennon, directors should direct. That is their legal function and their moral function. If they are unable to keep in touch with the industries that come under their direction from both stand-points they should retire.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you believe that the law should make any provision of a specific character governing that phase of the duty of directors to take cognizance of labor conditions?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I believe, Mr. Lennon, that the law should hold directors as to personal accountability for improper working conditions and for lack of knowledge of conditions reasonably open to discovery which result directly in disaster.

Commissioner LENNON. In the organizing of great corporations the individual contact which existed a long time ago had disappeared. Now, who are the responsible parties in the corporations who come as nearly as possible to that individual contact between the employer and employees?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The directors, unquestionably.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to ask you just a question regarding the matter of foundations. What limitation do you believe should be placed on foundations as to directorship, as to investment, as to services that should be limited, and as to whether or not directors of foundations should also be directors of industries in which the foundation has investments?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Directors in industries should clearly not be directors in foundations, if the analysis given this morning of the activities of the Rockefeller Foundation in Colorado is correct. There is, of course, a divided duty, and it is impossible, in my judgment, with equity for a director to sit in the morning in one capacity and in the afternoon in another and opposite capacity.

The directors ought, of course, everywhere, to permit private foundations to be independent of economic conditions with which they may be called upon to deal. The investments, I think, students of the subject are pretty well agreed, should be of a character which would eventually consume both principal and interest, without allowing too long a time for the disappearance of both. I do not know whether that covers the entire range of your question.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to cover this: We find in these foundations the declaration to this effect, that they are to promote the welfare of mankind. Do you believe that such foundations—do you believe if such foundations are permitted to exist that there should be a more precise statement of what they can do than this broad declaration? Is there not a possibility of differences of opinion as to what the welfare of mankind is, and such as makes such a declaration as the only substantial one dangerous?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is that danger, and the divided responsibility emphasizes it. I should prefer, however, if you are going to have private foundations to see their powers enlarged, provided you can secure their independent management. Your difficulty lies more in that direction, I think, than in the other; but one of the deductions drawn in my testimony this morning was that the work planned by the foundations ought really to be a governmental task. That under modern industrial organization it is difficult, if not impossible, to get such an independent use of foundation money as will guarantee the public against the abuse of the objects, however high sounding they may be.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mr. Costigan, you have suggested, in answer to one of the questions just asked you, that a man who sits on one board in the morning and on another board in the afternoon might be influenced in his attitude in the one case by his attitude in the other. This morning you presented your arraignment of the Colorado coal companies in an exhaustive manner, and I thought that perhaps in your arraignment of the coal companies you might be influenced by the fact that you are retained by the United Mine Workers of America and had not given the coal companies quite full justice in their efforts to handle their men properly and give the men fair and good working conditions.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The question is, I think, entirely proper, and, as your very question suggests, my opinions ought to be criticized by this commission from the standpoint of my views as a citizen and as an attorney. I do not attempt to pass upon the justice of my own deductions, except in so far as they speak for themselves. Permit me, however, to say this: That I believe your investigation will disclose the fact that the views I hold are not new, but were held by me long ago, long before I was in any sense invited to represent the United Mine Workers of America, and that, without question, that is one of the reasons why I appear here to-day in that capacity.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Costigan, I received the following letter, which I would like to read to you. It came this morning, and I would like to ask for your opinion on certain subjects mentioned here. The letter is as follows:

"MY DEAR MRS. HARRIMAN: As you are the only member of the Industrial Relations Commission whom I have the pleasure of knowing, I am taking the liberty of addressing this letter to you.

"The newspaper reports of the testimony of Mr. John R. Lawson before your commission are so at variance with the actual conditions existing in our coal camp at Oakview, Colo., that I feel, in justice to the coal industry of the State of Colorado, that some of the facts as I know them should be presented to you.

"I have been interested in the coal industry of Colorado for the past 12 years and have always taken an active interest in our camp, not only by a continuous correspondence with our officials but by regular visits to the mines of our companies. During the continuance of the late coal strike I visited our property at Oakview four or five times, so that I have a thorough personal knowledge of the conditions that existed there.

"We had knowledge of the strike there more than two months prior to the date on which it was called, and a number of our employees left after informing us that a strike was imminent, saying that they did not wish to be identified with the strike and wished to remain in good standing with our companies, so that they might retain their situations after the strike was ended. This to me indicated that they were not dissatisfied with the conditions that existed in our camp and that their life there was not a burdensome one.

"Our camp at Oakview was one of the first to be attacked. With absolutely no warning or indication of trouble, on the morning of September 29, 1913, six days after the strike had been called, our camp was fired upon by several bodies of strikers and the lives of the women and children of the camp put in imminent danger.

"You have no doubt heard of the murder trials now taking place at Pueblo, Colo., which are of some of the strikers who deliberately ambushed and killed four of our men and guards.

"There are many other incidents and particulars that I could give you of the conduct of the strike on the part of the miners, and a number of other particulars of the conditions existing at our camp, and the methods we use in running it, but to do this in a letter would take too much space. The testimony that has been given before your commission has had nothing whatever to do with the conditions of the camps and the social life of the miners, except that given by Mr. Lawson, as Mr. Rockefeller's testimony was very general and did not go into details, and it seems to me, to get at the true facts of the situation, the conditions existing at more than one company's camp should be gone into by your commission.

"I would be very glad if you could appoint some time and place where I could talk the matter over with you.

"Trusting that you will be able to arrange an interview before your commission ends its sittings in this city, I beg to remain,

"Sincerely, yours,

"HOWARD WILLETS,

"Chairman Executive Committee of the Oakdale Coal Co., 40 Wall Street.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Do you wish me to comment on that letter, Mrs. Harriman?

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Yes; if you please.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not suppose it is necessary to state, but I perhaps should say that violence in every form has been abhorrent to the attorneys who have been associated with me in these various hearings, bearing upon the Colorado situation, and we feel this particularly because violence tends to unsettle the public judgment, so that the remedies which should be applied for social disorders are often postponed.

Personally I have no doubt that has been the effect of violence in the State of Colorado recently, yet we have had occasion a number of times to point out in Colorado that the first acts of violence in that State in connection with the strike there were not on the part of the strikers. The first man shot in the Colorado difficulties, I understand, was a man by the name of Lippiat, a union organizer. He was shot just before the strike was called by a Baldwin-Felts detective on the streets of Trinidad. The very unfortunate shooting at La Veta, Colo., for which trials are now being held in Colorado, was preceded by another unfortunate shooting in the city of Walsenberg, on a public street, where several union men were shot without any known cause; and in the same way there have been acts of violence playing back and forth. I think it is fair to say that almost all of the preliminary acts of violence were not on the side of the strikers.

With reference to Mr. Lawson's testimony, I think it should be said that he gave no testimony, so far as I am aware, about conditions at Oak Creek. I do not believe that is one of the coal properties of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and I think he was directing his testimony primarily to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.'s properties, and more particularly to the closed camps outside of his general experience throughout Colorado.

I may say, too, that if I am not mistaken during the long hearing in Colorado by the congressional committee no testimony of any consequence was offered with reference to the conditions at Oak Creek. I do not believe any testimony was offered as to those early violations as to which this letter refers.

Conditions in northern Colorado, it should be added, Mrs. Harriman, have always been better than those in southern Colorado. Oak Creek is among the northern properties. The northern strike was called in 1910 primarily as a strike for wages. The strike of 1913 was in the southern field, and it ought to be said that the conditions in northern Colorado have never had the severe features prevalent in the southern part of the State, so that I should not say offhand that an investigation of those properties will not disclose a slightly better condition than that about which Mr. Lawson testified. And, of course, the United Mine Workers of America have no objection in the world to having the facts at Oak Creek or in any other part of Colorado thoroughly investigated by this commission.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. This was Oakdale Co. Would that be at Oak Creek? Mr. COSTIGAN. I thought you were referring to a property in Routt County, Mrs. Harriman. Mr. Lawson has just advised me that the property you refer to is in Huerfano County, and it is then in the southern part of the State, and I think that is a subject that Mr. Lawson would be the best witness upon. But my general remarks, I think, hold in relation to the testimony not having been offered in reference to that property.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask you a few questions, please.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you there the late issue of "Facts in Connection with the Struggle in Colorado," in which there was an explanatory statement sent out recently in relation to the salaries of Messrs. Hayes, McLennan, and Mother Jones?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have it among my papers somewhere, Mr. O'Connell, and I am familiar with the publication. I referred to it this morning.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When was that issued?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Issued in January of this year, I believe.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you the original issue in which the salary and expenses of these three parties were quoted on page 67?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to read into the record the original and then the explanation. On page 67 it reads:

"The committee in charge of the campaign in Colorado consisted of Frank J. Hayes, John McLennan, and John R. Lawson. The report of the secretary-treasurer of the general organization covering the period ending November 30, 1913, shows that out of the daily wages of the miners of the country there had been collected money to pay, among other things, salaries and expenses as follows:

"Frank J. Hayes, nine weeks' salary, $4,052.92; Frank J. Hayes, nine weeks' expenses, $1,667.20; total for salary and expenses, $5,720.12. Frank J. Hayes was thus paid over $90 a day, or at the rate of over $32,000 a year.

"For this same period of nine weeks John McLennan received for salary $2,683.55; for expenses, $1,469.55—$66 a day.

"John R. Lawson received for nine weeks' salary, $1,773.40.

"Mother Jones, whose sole duty was to agitate, received $2,668.62 as salary for the same period—$42 a day."

When our commission was in Colorado and the president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was on the stand, I called his attention to these figures, and I had before me the annual report of the general secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers of America, from which report these figures were taken. The report, however, was taken for a full year's salary and expenses for each of these persons, which is here credited as nine weeks. And we asked if it was discovered if these figures were wrong and an injustice had been done these three persons, or four, as the case would be, what they would do in order to rectify the wrong.

The January Bulletin No. 4, series 2, issued January 2, 1915, "The Struggle in Colorado for Industrial Freedom," was issued signed by Mr. J. F. Welborn, president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and this item appeared:

"We are now authoritatively advised that the figures referred to covered a period of an entire year instead of only nine weeks, as stated in the bulletin; but we are also advised that a correct statement of the case would have been"—and then he gives the names and the correct figures, and so on. What I want to ask is in comparing the statement made in the original bulletin issued, have you in mind what the purpose in quoting these salaries at all, or these expenses at all? What was the purpose behind the issuance of that?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Presumably the object was to discredit the calling of the strike and the continuance of the strike, and to discredit the alleged grounds for it by suggesting that the officers of the United Mine Workers were large beneficiaries of organized labor. The purpose was to suggest, I suppose, that they profited largely both in ordinary times and probably more largely in unusual times. The suggestion is, of course, that they have been guided in their activities solely by financial considerations. In fact, it has been quite common throughout the West to suggest that this strike never would have been called or prosecuted but for what are termed foreign agitators; and by "foreign agitators" are meant these very men, high officials in the United Mine Workers, of whom Prof. Seligman spoke with such great praise in the article to which I referred this morning. People are prone, of course, to discredit those who for a financial consideration appear to be advancing certain opinions, and, as I suggested this morning, the Rockefeller Foundation, in so far as Mr. Ivy Ledbetter Lee represented it, loaned itself in a critical hour of industrial struggle to the dissemination of this gross misinformation, not only in Colorado, but throughout the country. The object was to create public opinion favorable to the operators, and without question that object was successful in a large measure. It is doubtful whether this correction will ever reach thousands of people who received the original information. And it must be remembered in that connection that the use made of these bulletins was in a political controversy in the State of Colorado which determined what the character of the government of the State of Colorado was to be for the next two years.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I have in mind to ask whether you considered this explanation—you might say an apology—of the error committed or offense; that that would receive anything like as wide a circulation as the papers that had copied the original figures and used them when the heat of the affair was at its height in Colorado, this being issued after the strike had been declared off, and little or no attention having been paid to it in a public way—in view of that and that the damage and injustice done these men and women by holding them up as accepting or taking money; the inference I get from it is that they took money, large sums of money, beyond all reason, as salary and expenses, that did not belong to them—and thus, with a view to poisoning the minds of their members and associates against them—

Mr. COSTIGAN (interrupting). And the public.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). And the public, that that was done by not ignorant men, not uneducated men, not unbusinesslike men, but men who were educated and in public life and in everyday business life, and was done with forethought of what the purpose was—comparing that action with the action of men in the heat of battle, with women and children dying as the result of the battle in which they were engaged, issuing a circular headed "A Call to Arms," in the stress that they were laboring under—is there, for instance, any greater fault on the part of the men issuing the Call to Arms than there was on the part of the men issuing this deliberate statement of an untruth for the purpose of absolutely blackening the character of men who were leaders in that strike?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I don't care to pass on the last question, Mr. O'Connell, but manifestly this is neither an adequate apology nor can it remedy the wrong done. The publication came too late—as suggested by you; it came after the strike was ended, after the opportunity was given the voters of the State of Colorado to meet the serious political and industrial questions that confronted them.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson, I think, has some questions he would like to ask you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Costigan, in regard to the letter that was just read from the Oakdale Coal Mining Co. to the effect that they had not had a look-in on the investigation, is it not a fact that the Oakdale Coal Mining Co., through their president, signed the letter of May 4, addressed to the President of the United States, in which they completely and thoroughly upheld the attitude of the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in all the measures they had taken?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I assume it is, because of your inquiry, Mr. Garretson. I have not seen recently that signature.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If you will turn to the Bulletin No. 1 of June 22, you might be able to determine whether or not that is the Oakdale Coal Co. You will find it on page 19.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Page 21 here.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The signatures are on page 21; yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I find the signature on page 21, as suggested.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That letter embodied the language, did it not, as follows:

"Our position with respect to the United Mine Workers of America is absolutely independent of that which has been or hereafter may be taken either by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. or by its officers or directors or by Mr. Rockefeller or John D. Rockefeller, jr., although we heartily indorse the position they are now taking."

You will find that on page 18.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is true. It is printed in heavy black type on that page.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Moreover, did not that letter declare that they were, all the signers, conducting their business and had conducted it in a purely legal manner? In other words, in conformance with the laws of Colorado?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is the substance of it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Before the congressional committee—you were asked a moment ago in regard to wages that obtained in Colorado mines—and before that committee it was stated an average of $4 a day was mentioned as obtaining. Is it not a fact that the miners presented for another series of those coal companies that were represented under those signatures which showed a general average not to exceed $2.10?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There was testimony to that effect, Mr. Garretson.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was it ever disproved any more than the other was disproved?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What was the attitude of the people in general toward the investigation of the State militia made by a committee of three militia officers, headed by Maj. Boughton. Did the people of Colorado regard that as conclusive, fair, and determinative, or did they not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. They did not, although, as I said before, Capt. van Cise and Capt. Danks were and are two of our best citizens.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have those two officers ever testified that the chairman of that commission, a higher official than themselves in military rank, used his seniority as an officer to circumscribe both their liberties of investigation and expression?

Mr. COSTIGAN. They have privately so stated, and it may be that they have publicly stated it to this commission.

Commissioner GARRETSON. As a general proposition, would an investigation made of an industrial situation dominated wholly by either the employing interests or the employee interest be received by the public generally as conclusive or determinative?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Manifestly not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the matter of interlocking directors in the vast charitable institutions and vast industrial corporations, it has been put before this commission that the affiliation with one or the other would in no sense cloud the judgment of the other. We will take the declared purpose of one of the foundations which is for the betterment of humanity. If a director in an industrial corporation who put in five and a half days in the week in the pursuit of dividends, putting on all that the traffic would bear, as a sound definition or interpretation of benefiting humanity do you believe he could be entirely impartial on a half day in the week when he sat as a director of the philanthropic institution?

Mr. COSTIGAN. As I answered when interrogated before, I do not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you, Mr. Costigan. That will be all.

Mr. Greene, please.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JEROME D. GREENE.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. GREENE. Jerome D. Greene.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside?

Mr. GREENE. 116 East Sixty-third Street, New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. GREENE. I am secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. We had prepared here, Mr. Greene, some questions which are in leading form and which undertake to epitomize much that is to be inquired about, and I will read them to you, of course, so that you may correct any of them that you see fit to—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, may I ask whether I may also have an opportunity to make a statement which I think will bear very closely on the points that have been brought out as to the relation of Mr. Rockefeller to his boards and as to the policies of the boards either before or after this question?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and you may select your own time or place, if you think best to read that at the inception, which has been done by a great many witnesses, you may feel at perfect liberty to do so, or if you care to wait until the end of it, you may do that, or you may pick out such time as you wish.

Mr. GREENE. It is not that I intend to read the whole statement, but there are certain points that I wish to bring out.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. You may proceed in your own way.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Rockefeller was asked by one of the questionnaires recently submitted for a graphic exhibition of the so-called interlocking directorates of the Rockefeller boards. I have had such a chart prepared, Mr. Chairman, and have copies here for the members of the commission.

(Copies are here distributed to the members of the commission.)

I should like to read the names of the personnel of all these boards in alphabetical order. It is as follows:

Edwin A. Alderman, president of the University of Virginia.

Hermann M. Biggs, commissioner of health, State of New York.

Wallace Buttrick, secretary, General Education Board.

Andrew Carnegie.

F. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of Education.

Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus, Harvard University.

Hollis B. Frissell, principal, Hampton Institute.

Abraham Flexner, assistant secretary, General Education Board; associate, bureau of social hygiene.

Simon Flexner, director of laboratories, the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

Frederick T. Gates, formerly a member of the personal staff of John D. Rockefeller; chairman, board of trustees, the Rockefeller Institute, General Education Board, and the Rockefeller Sanitary Commission for the Eradication of Hookworm Disease.

Frank J. Goodnow, president, Johns Hopkins University.

William C. Gorgas, Surgeon General, United States Army.

Jerome D. Greene, secretary, the Rockefeller Foundation.

A. Barton Hepburn, chairman of the board of directors, Chase National Bank; formerly president, New York Chamber of Commerce.

Charles O. Heydt, secretary to John D. Rockefeller, jr.

L. Emmett Holt, professor of pediatrics, College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City.

David F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture.

Theodore C. Janeway, professor of medicine, Johns Hopkins University.

J. V. Joyner, superintendent of education, State of North Carolina.

Harry Pratt Judson, president, University of Chicago.

Edgar L. Marston, member of the firm of Blair & Co., New York City.

John R. Mott, associate general secretary, International Young Men's Christian Association.

Starr J. Murphy, member of the personal staff of John D. Rockefeller.

Walter H. Page, American ambassador at London.

Francis W. Peabody, Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, Boston, Mass.

T. Mitchell Prudden, formerly professor of pathology, College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City.

John D. Rockefeller.

John D. Rockefeller, jr., president, the Rockefeller Foundation; chairman, International Health Commission.

Wickliffe Rose, director general, International Health Commission; formerly executive secretary, Rockefeller Sanitary Commission for the Eradication of Hookworm Disease.

Albert Shaw, editor, Review of Reviews.

Theobald Smith, director, department of animal pathology, the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research; formerly professor of comparative pathology, Harvard University.

Charles W. Stiles, United States Public Health Service; formerly scientific secretary, Rockefeller Sanitary Commission for the Eradication of Hookworm Disease.

Anson Phelps Stokes, secretary, Yale University.

George E. Vincent, president, University of Minnesota.

William H. Welsh, professor of pathology, Johns Hopkins University.

If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I should like to state very briefly the way in which these boards have been constituted.

For a great many years, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, through his office associates, carried on philanthropic work along lines similar to those indicated by the titles of these boards of which I will read the titles of: The Rockefeller Foundation, the International Health Commission, the China Medical Board, the Rockefeller Sanitary Commission, the General Education Board, the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and the Board of Scientific Directors of the Rockefeller Institute. As time went on, he thought it would be advantageous to make more permanently available for the benefit of the public the experience of his office, which, I may say as a newcomer into it, had won well-nigh universal approbation for the general principles which were represented in his giving.

I shall have something to say about those principles a little later, with your permission.

Determining, then, to alienate perpetually from himself and put into the power and protection and control of the State separate organizations and funds for carrying on these lines of work, he put into those boards, in the first place, the group of men to whom chiefly in constant collaboration with him was due the credit for such wisdom as there may have been in what had been known as the Rockefeller method of giving. In the executive committees of these boards you will find repeated the names of three or four of those men in each one.

Some questions have been asked as if it were necessary to discover by ingenious inquiry a fact which is patent, namely, the very striking influence exerted on these boards by the group of men who have been associated with Mr. Rockefeller. In other words, Mr. Rockefeller, in giving for all time to the people of this country a large part of his fortune, wished that the initial impulse to the work made possible by his gifts should be given by the men who had determined in general their character in the preceding years. And while forfeiting all his control for the future and very definitely limiting his control for the present, Mr. Rockefeller, by that process, made more largely available to the public funds which had previously been exclusively under his domination and control.

Now, one of the next steps to be taken in the organization of these boards was the addition to this nucleus of men frankly representing the experience of Mr. Rockefeller's office other men holding positions of trust and prominence in the country who had and have the confidence of the American people. I have read you their names, and no question or insinuation which may have been heard here will for one moment check the confidence of the American people in the character of those men as men would not for a moment be a party to benevolences which were secondary to the consideration of promoting the pecuniary welfare of the donor. The question hardly needs to be stated it is so patently absurd.

Now, reference has been made to the interlocking of the directorates with each other. The word "interlocking" has been given a bad name for a perfectly obvious reason. When a man is a director of one company and in such a capacity sells goods to another company in which he is a director he may use the influence which he thus has for his own individual profit. Is there anything analogous to that in the action of a man who at one moment is giving a part of his time to the public service on the education board and at another moment as a member of a sanitary commission? Certainly the analogy has absolutely no bearing in the matter, and the only drawback, the only objection to such interlocking is one which President Elliot stated, the limitation of the time and health and strength of the men.

There may be, it is true, a question of interlocking as between members of Mr. Rockefeller's boards and the boards of institutions that are aided by Mr. Rockefeller. And as to that I will say, although there is no rule or law on the subject, that the unwritten rule of his office has been that the members representing him on these boards do not accept trusteeship and directorship in other philanthropic institutions.

When, to speak personally, I came to into Mr. Rockefeller's office and became a member of the General Education Board I resigned from the board of overseers of Harvard University and from the board of trustees of a local school for girls and from an academy for boys. That is the unwritten rule, designed with just that intention, of enabling the members of Mr. Rockefeller's board to maintain as independent a position as possible. I went into Mr. Rockefeller's office, Mr. Chairman, in 1912 from the position of general manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, in which I was a salaried employee and not at that time a director or trustee.

Shortly after the establishment of the Rockefeller Foundation we earnestly considered what its policy should be, what limitations, if any, should be set up on the choice of future trustees, because, Mr. Chairman, I can not impress upon you too strongly the fact that if you and the public feel concerned as to the future control of these boards you can not possibly feel a greater degree of anxious interest and solicitude than we who are the trustees of these boards feel ourselves. And if there is any subject to which we have given earnest consideration it is exactly that subject. At the first meeting at which we had time to consider at length our policy I took the liberty of presenting, on my own responsibility and without previous consultation with my associates, a memorandum in which I formulated certain general principles and policies of giving which seemed to me as an observer coming in from the outside characteristic of Mr. Rockefeller's office and of the boards established by him. While the foundation did not adopt this memorandum as an official expression of its views, nevertheless the memorandum was favorably received as a fairly adequate expression of principles that had been observed.

These principles were stated as follows:

"1. Individual charity and relief are excluded, except as the indirect result of aid given to other institutions well organized for such purposes."

And that the Rockefeller Foundation is obviously not well organized for answering such requests for gifts and loans is very evident.

"2. Applications for the aid of institutions or enterprises that are purely local are excluded, except as aid may be given to these establishments as models to other localities and as part of a general plan for the encouragement or improvement of similar institutions. Such a general plan is that in accordance with which the General Education Board has aided colleges and universities in all parts of the country in order to promote higher education generally.

"3. It may be said that when an individual or an institution goes into a community with the intention of making a contribution to its welfare no gift of money, however large, and no outside agency, however wise or good, can render a service of unqualified good and permanent value except so far as the gift or the agency offers the means or the occasion for evoking from the community its own recognition of the need to be met, its own will to meet that need, and its own resources, both material and spiritual, wherewith to meet it. Illustrations of this policy are to be found in the work of the General Education Board and the Rockefeller Sanitary Commission for the Eradication of the Hookworm Disease. Financial aid given by the General Education Board to colleges and universities has been conditioned upon larger aid being furnished by the friends of those institutions. The farm-demonstration work of the board has succeeded because the money contributed was used solely for the purposes of demonstration, and even the cost of running the demonstration farms was met by the labor and farm equipment of private owners. The sanitary commission has operated exclusively through State and local authorities, with the aid of State, county, or town appropriations. The work accomplished has been initiatory and educational, in no sense leaving the communities served in a state of continuing dependence on outside philanthropy."

I would have you believe, Mr. Chairman and members of the commission, that nobody can exceed Mr. John D. Rockefeller in the desire to avoid paternalism in giving. If he has made any contribution to the art of giving, it has been that particular thing, and it is so recognized in this country.

"4. In general it is unwise for an institution like the Rockefeller Foundation to assume permanently or indefinitely a share of the current expenses of an endowed institution which it does not avowedly control."

I mean by "avowedly control" runs itself openly, just as the Rockefeller Foundation runs the International Health Commission.

"Such a continuing relation inevitably carries with it a continuing responsibility for the conduct of the institution that is added. The relation should therefore not be entered into unless with the deliberate intention of assuming such responsibility; for an endowed institution a gift outright for endowment, buildings or equipment or some other specified purpose, without any condition to hamper the future administration and policy of the institution added, is the best kind of a gift from the standpoint both of the giver and the receiver. Antecedent conditions, such, for example, as that the institution shall be free from debt, that its accounting methods shall be in accordance with approved standards, and that evidence shall be given of sufficient moral and financial support from its own constituency, may—and, indeed, must—be imposed. A continuing contribution for current expenses and the implied continuing approval or responsibility for management tend to make the receiver subservient to the giver, thus detracting from the receiver's independence and self-respect, and, consequently, from his efficiency."

That, if anything, Mr. Chairman, is the policy of giving in Mr. Rockefeller's office.

"5. On the other hand, the Rockefeller Foundation must carefully"—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Will you read that last paragraph again?

Mr. GREENE. "A continuing contribution for current expenses and the implied continuing approval or responsibility for management tend to make the receiver subservient to the giver, thus detracting from the receiver's independence and self respect, and, consequently, from his efficiency."

"5. On the other hand, the Rockefeller Foundation must carefully avoid the dangers incident to gifts in perpetuity. Having the qualities of permanence and universality it is better able than any private individual to adapt its gifts from generation to generation"—and by permanence, I mean, that it is a corporation, not an individual; and by universality I mean that it is for the betterment of mankind; it is not limited to education or public health—"It is better able than any private individual to adapt its gifts from generation to generation to the most urgent needs of the time. It should therefore be careful not to hamper its own trustees nor the trustees of other institutions by gifts in perpetuity narrowly limited to particular uses."

Reference was made this morning to the obsolescence of certain philanthropic purposes. The Rockefeller Foundation was chartered with that danger specifically in mind.

"These considerations may often lead the Rockefeller Foundation to make its gifts from year to year, or for periods of 5, 10, or 15 years. This will usually be the case when the object of the gift is that of initiating or demonstrating some improvement especially along lines of education or public health. Gifts for endowment will therefore probably be rare and they will be strictly limited to institutions which, like well-established colleges or universities, are destined to be permanently maintained by the endowment method as distinguished from the method of support by public taxation.

"6. As between objects which are of an immediately remedial or alleviatory nature, such as asylums for the orphan, blind, or crippled, and those which go to the root of individual or social ill-being and misery, the latter objects are preferred—not because the former are unworthy, but because the latter are more far-reaching in their effects. Moreover, there are many charitably disposed persons to whom remedial and alleviatory agencies make the more effective appeal.

"7. As a general rule it is not expedient to entertain applications for the aid of projects, however meritorious, that have not been carefully thought out by their promoters, so that the purposes to be accomplished, the form or organization to be employed, the persons prepared to assume the permanent responsibility for the project, the precise program to be followed and the amount of financial support already secured, may be stated with precision as to the basis of the application. It may often happen that good but half-formed schemes are suggested, requiring only a vigorous initiative to bring them to maturity. The promoters of a scheme lay it before some philanthropic agency, expecting that if the suggestion is thought promising the initiative, the subsequent responsibility, and the necessary organizing efficiency will be supplied by the agency in question, the promoters either retiring or remaining as partners in the undertaking. Favorable action on such applications must be limited to those rare exceptions in which the philanthropic agency sees in the plan thus imperfectly presented a suggestion that it can adopt, and for the development of which it is willing to be responsible. But the limitations of time, energy and intelligence in even the best organization would not be equal to the demands made upon it if it assumed the burden of studying and maturing every vague though promising suggestion made to it."

In the same memorandum, Mr. Chairman, I said, "No great philanthropic trust can permanently endure as a paternal institution far ahead of the people in wisdom and foresight. Its wisdom and foresight must in some true sense, like the political government, express the will and intelligence of the people. Its wisdom and foresight must at least be susceptible of recognition by the people in order that they may follow willingly and effectively where it leads. In short, the policy of the trust must, in the long run, be democratic. To accomplish this result a plan should be devised whereby the accountability of the Rockefeller Foundation to the people of the United States should be clearly expressed through periodic reports."

Again: "The early demonstration that the foundation was seeking the best possible way of keeping alive its sense of responsibility to the people and of keeping in touch with the varied and changing needs of the country, would have a moral effect on the public that would greatly strengthen the foundation's position and enlarge its influence."

The policy of the Rockefeller Foundation and its advisers is very well expressed in regard to another matter which has been brought before this commission. It is stated in another document to which brief reference has been made in the answers to the questionnaires.

Evidently one investigation of industrial relations, or any investigation, looms up in the minds of many as implying an inquiry into disputed facts and the bringing in of a definite adjudication and an appraisal. That is very far from the spirit in which the Rockefeller Foundation has entered into the question of industrial relations. The object is to supply, if possible, with a certain scientific detachment the facts not as related to any one dispute but facts which are characteristic of the industrial situation generally in many places with a view to providing the fundamental social and economic facts on which others who will determine public opinion will make up their mind.

The committee of economists which was invited by the Rockefeller Foundation to advise it in regard to the establishment of some sort of permanent organization made report in which this paragraph occurs:

"After full discussion the committee was unanimous in holding that such a proposed institute of economic research should not at the outset attempt work directly educational in character. Although it is recognized that there is great need of popular education in economics, it is inadvisable that such work of propaganda be undertaken as the first or main task of an institution for scientific research. Proper means of publicity should be sought for the publication of the results of its investigations; but any systematic effort at influencing public opinion might, if at all, be better attempted by a separate organization. Quite apart from the existing disagreement of scholars even as to many fundamentals in economics which without careful preliminary studies would make dogmatic teaching of doubtful utility, it is essential for the permanent standing of an institute of economic research that it should early establish its reputation as scientific, impartial, and unprejudiced in its finding and presenting of the facts as to economic and social conditions."

To illustrate what I said about paternalism I think I could hardly do better, Mr. Chairman, than to give one graphic example—

Chairman WALSH. Just a moment with the question, Mr. Greene. Is the full report of that committee of economists available?

Mr. GREENE. I should have to read it to see whether the recommendations of the report were not adopted.

Chairman WALSH. Please bear that in mind. Proceed with what you were going to say when I interrupted you. Mr. Garretson asked in regard to that.

Mr. GREENE. I think the disposition of that report was referred to in the answers to the questionnaires. I want to give an example of the kind of work which I think can be called characteristic and to have it judged by the considerations which those have had in mind who have thought of the menace of such foundations and of the danger of putting the public into a state of subserviency.

You are all familiar in a general way with the purpose of the Rockefeller Sanitary Commission for the Eradication of the Hookworm Disease. Let me mention just one example. When that commission was being undertaken a traveling dispensary had been organized by the local health authorities with the aid of our sanitary commission. It came, in the course of its travels through the country, to a small village in a Virginia mountain county. In that village, living upon an impoverished farm, barely able to keep soul and body together, was a family of nine, living in a one-room shanty—father and mother and seven children—every one of them afflicted with the hookworm disease, illiterate, and barely able to keep soul and body together. They were examined and found to be infected. They were given the extremely simple treatment for the hookworm disease, which usually cures permanently if the conditions are permanently improved—the sanitary conditions—and the dispensary passed on.

Two years later on revisiting that farm one would find a two-story frame house built by the father and elder sons, the younger children in school, the farm productive, at a total expenditure of about $1.10 per capita on the part of Mr. Rockefeller's sanitary commission.

Now, think of the economic enrichment of the country by work of that kind. Who can say that the application of Mr. Rockefeller's effort by that act—and I am not sure that those people even knew of Mr. Rockefeller, because they were dealing with the public-health authorities, through whose invitation alone our commission has done its work—who can measure the economic results of work of that type?

Farm-demonstration work, which the General Education Board promoted in the South, and which it conducted at an expense of three or four hundred thousand dollars—I have forgotten the exact figures—in a few years made possible an increase in the productiveness of corn and cotton per acre to such an extent that if carried to the entire arable land of the South by methods of cultivation and demonstration already known would make an increased annual yield, I am told, in cotton alone of $240,000,000 per annum.

Now, how in the world is service of that kind going to be called a corrupting or pauperizing service where the man's own labor with the information supplied produces for him an overwhelming share of the final result?

A statement has been made which seems to me so strange and almost grotesque that I wonder if it was not made with some humorous intent but partly concealed. It was that in the development of such foundations as this public criticism would be stifled. Can anyone say, in this presence and with knowledge of this hearing and of the public agitation which is going on at all times through the press, that the American people can not through publicity and public discussion criticize freely the gifts of anybody? I could hardly believe that anyone could take such a low or timid view of the strength of the American democracy as to think that it could not protect itself by free discussion from any insidious influence growing out of such foundations as this.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other point, if you will allow me, with reference to the appointment of Mr. King. The trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation have been held very rigidly accountable for the condition of affairs existing in an industry in which they had a bond investment. I should not be one to deny the responsibility attaching even to a bond investment, although one must differentiate between that and the responsibility attaching to a stock investment, but supposing that any of us found ourselves put in the position of trustee for large funds of money which had to be invested in stocks and bonds, and conscientiously sought to discharge the responsibility, not only by carrying out the terms of our trust, but by meeting such obligations as attached to our ownership of securities. Supposing we tried to execute that trust properly, could we do more than to look through the country for the man who seemed to us on the whole the best adviser on the general subject of industrial relations, and to identify him with our organization, not with reference to the adjudication of any particular dispute, but to guide us permanently in the discharge of our responsibility?

I think perhaps I wrote the first letter to Mr. King with reference to his coming into our employ, and I remember saying to him in that letter that it might turn out that in the proper discharge of our responsibility as the holders of investments we could perhaps do a greater service to our country than by so-called philanthropic work.

Now, gentlemen, we can not be held accountable at the same time both for taking no interest whatever in that aspect of our duties and at the same time for having taken the most intelligent and promising steps we could to inform ourselves as to those responsibilities, and I do not think that anyone can seriously maintain—anyone who knows Mr. King—that trustees or directors who exposed themselves to his influence were on that account going to be less humane, less considerate of the rights of workmen, than if, as some one has said, they were going to devote their time exclusively to promoting their business to the extent "that the traffic would bear."

We do not claim to have done anything especially laudable or creditable, but it is a step, and we think a promising step in the right direction.

We do not claim for any particular plan that has been put forward that it is a final plan, that it has met all of the objections—it is perfectly clear that it has not met all of the objections—but as to whether our attitude has been one of unyielding self-satisfaction and complacency with present conditions, or an attitude of open-mindedness and desire to do our full duty in the matter, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that on the whole the public will make a fair and reasonable judgment.

I should be very happy to answer your questions, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. As I told you, I am going to ask you these questions in leading form, and will ask you to be very free to correct any question and also any inference that might not be drawn fairly from the questions, because I have had them prepared by others, of course.

The funds of the foundation amount to approximately $104,000,000?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; that is true; but it requires this qualification, that certain sums pledged—appropriated and which are now liabilities of ours—are still in our treasury because the time for payment, in accordance with the terms of the pledges, has not yet arrived, and we practically hold and are, indeed, responsible for funds in excess of the amount of our capital, $104,000,000. For example, the $750,000 pledged to Wellesley College has not been called for under the terms of the pledge, and therefore it helps to make our total funds somewhat in excess of $100,000,000. As a matter of fact, we made pledges to an extent which brought our total unappropriated holdings on the 1st of January somewhat below $100,000,000, so there was no accumulation.

Chairman WALSH. The funds of the foundation may be increased indefinitely by such future gifts as the foundation may receive from any source?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; that is true, I think, Mr. Chairman. If we accept them.

Chairman WALSH. The annual income of the foundation is now approximately $5,500,000?

Mr. GREENE. Approximately.

Chairman WALSH. Of this income it is provided that $2,000,000 annually shall be applied to such specific objects within the corporate purposes of the foundation as Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., may direct?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; the explanation of that item, Mr. Chairman, is that Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., through his office, had been for many years giving to a large number of charities which were worthy, which had perhaps some personal claim upon him by virtue of his citizenship in New York and his residence in Cleveland. They were not necessarily objects of charity which ordinarily would commend themselves to the foundation as within its general policies, and it was thought that it would be entirely proper, provided they were clearly within the corporate purposes of the foundation, for the foundation to relieve Mr. Rockefeller of the actual handing over of the money and accounting for the funds, but when any such gifts are made by Mr. Rockefeller they have to be passed upon by the Rockefeller Foundation, and a formal vote is taken in each case, and it has to be approved as coming within the corporate purposes of the foundation. If the trustees were requested to make a gift for purposes that did not come within the corporate purposes of the foundation, even if Mr. Rockefeller asked us to do so we should be obliged to decline.

Chairman WALSH. Has any such circumstance arisen?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir. As the list which has been sent to the commission with the questionnaire of January 23 will show, there have been many purposes which the foundation would have been very glad to make contribution to on its own initiative. The largest was $2,500,000 to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, for the construction of new buildings and the enlargement of its work.

(The questionnaire referred to by the witness is printed among the exhibits as "Greene Exhibit.")

Chairman WALSH. There seems to be no actual limitation upon the corporate purposes of the foundation, as shown by the clause in the charter as follows [reading]: "Any other means and agencies which from time to time shall seem expedient to its members and trustees." Does this clause leave the foundation absolutely unrestricted so far as its purposes are concerned?

Mr. GREENE. It is restricted within the legal definition of charitable, eleemosynary, and philanthropic work. Those words are not in the charter and I do not think they need to be. If there should be anything objectionable—over the border line—in the direction of a commercial or business undertaking, it would be proper of course for the attorney general to investigate, or for such legal steps to be taken as might be necessary. It would clearly be a breach of trust, in other words.

Chairman WALSH. And the general law would apply to it?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; the general law would apply to it.

Chairman WALSH. Of the trustees of the foundation there are two members of the Rockefeller family, John D. Rockefeller, sr., and John D. Rockefeller, jr.? Is that correct?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Four are now or have recently been members of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff or secretaries?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. They are Starr J. Murphy, Jerome D. Greene, Charles O. Heydt, and F. T. Gates?

Mr. GREENE. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. There are salaried employees of the foundation, two of whom are on the General Education Board, Mr. Wickliffe Rose and Dr. Simon Flexner?

Mr. GREENE. Dr. Flexner is not on the General Education Board, but is trustee and scientific director of the Rockefeller Institute.

Chairman WALSH. And a salaried employee?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; but responsible to his trustees and not to the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Harry Pratt Judson is president of the Chicago University, endowed by Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And the others, Charles W. Elliot and Mr. A. Barton Hepburn, are the only ones not directly related to Mr. Rockefeller in some business way?

Mr. GREENE. My impression is that that is correct.

Chairman WALSH. The members of the foundation's finance committee are John D. Rockefeller, jr., Starr J. Murphy, and Jerome D. Greene, all of whom are or have been until the last few days members of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff?

Mr. GREENE. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. The members of the executive committee are John D. Rockefeller, jr., Starr J. Murphy, Mr. Heydt, yourself, and Simon Flexner?

Mr. GREENE. They are.

Chairman WALSH. And you have been on Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff as secretaries or salaried employees?

Mr. GREENE. We have been.

Chairman WALSH. The meetings of the executive committee of the foundation, according to Mr. Rockefeller's testimony, are regularly held at Mr. Rockefeller's office at 26 Broadway, and not only are general industrial and financial matters taken up at those meetings, but outside persons, such as Mr. Ivy L. Lee, who has no relation to the foundation, are there present and advise freely with regard to the policies of the foundation; is that correct?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; that may be true as applied to informal conferences, but not to meetings that are called. That is not true of meetings of the foundation, or of the executive committee. I want to say that it would not be improper to invite Mr. Lee to attend the meetings, but I do not recall that it has ever been done in his case. There are occasions when an outsider who happens to be present is asked to stay, but my positive recollection is that has never occurred in the case of Mr. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. Not assuming anything improper, but putting the question in order that you may analyze it and give a correct impression about it; you gather the point of the question?

Mr. GREENE. I do. Mr. Rockefeller has associated with him a personal staff, which advises him with regard to his affairs, both business and philanthropic. Mr. Rockefeller, in the discharge of his duties as president of the Rockefeller Foundation is at perfect liberty to invite the opinion of anybody in or out of his office on any subject, and it is to be expected that men who have his confidence in the office would be frequently consulted by him with reference to the activities of the foundation, in the formation of his own opinion and in the determination of his own vote, but, of course, that is a very different matter from identifying these outsiders with the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. I gathered from Mr. Rockefeller's testimony given the other day that perhaps his father had some other staff of advisers on purely investment matters; is that correct?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is the only staff he has?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; that is the only staff he has; of course, it includes clerks as well as the members of the staff.

Chairman WALSH. The funds of the foundations are not subject to taxation?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; not these things that are used for what may legally be called charitable purposes. They would be taxable if used for any other purpose, but I suppose our charter would be forfeited in that case?

Chairman WALSH. What would be the tax upon the funds of that foundation if it was regularly assessed and paid?

Mr. GREENE. I have not figured it out, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Has anyone ever figured it out?

Mr. GREENE. You can figure it at any rate you choose on $100,000,000.

Chairman WALSH. I mean taking into consideration the actual tax that would ordinarily be levied against that class of property under the laws of New York?

Mr. GREENE. As I understand it, stocks are not taxable now and bonds are in most cases exempt by the payment of a tax in the beginning. The Rockefeller Foundation does not use any real estate. It would be entitled to freedom from taxation on any real estate, if it had its own office building, so far as that building was used for the purposes of the foundation, but an investment in real estate would be taxable just as much as investment of anybody else. That is the protection, which is the protection in this country against the mortmain. Real estate held by a hospital, or charity of any kind, if used for business purposes has to pay taxes; and that will prevent the happening in this country of what has happened in others, the gathering into charitable trusts of large amounts of land. That can never happen in this country on account of this restriction.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you, Mr. Greene, what suggestions of your own, with respect to the general principles that should govern giving and taking were made a part of the policy of the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. They had no authority attached to them, and I ask you to attach only such authority to them as you can ascribe to my having written them, no more, no less. I had been engaged in educational work, and the administering of charitable work for several years. I was secretary at Harvard for nine years and two years at the Rockefeller Institute. Those were my observations.

Chairman WALSH. Please state at this point, Mr. Greene, your experience from the beginning; that is, prior to your connection with the foundation or the Rockefeller activities. Please sketch back, say, from the present day, what you have been doing for the past 10 years.

Mr. GREENE. On January 1, last, I ceased to be a member of the personal staff of Mr. Rockefeller and resigned from all the directorships in which I represented him.

Chairman WALSH. What significance did that have with reference to all of the activities? What changes were taking place, and what caused that to be done?

Mr. GREENE. It was the final determination of a matter which had been very actively discussed from the beginning. The Rockefeller Foundation should have its own organization and habitation, but it is still a very young institution, barely a year old, and some of our expectations with reference to an officer who might perhaps hold the office I am now holding, were not realized on account of his health, and the question came up as to whether I should try to do both, to administer the Rockefeller Foundation as its executive secretary and hold my various business directorships and assist in any way I could in the management of investments, and it was finally decided that was too much for one man, and my request to be relieved was accepted, but I may say that I took the initiative.

Chairman WALSH. Do I understand that the offices of the foundation are being removed to another and separate building?

Mr. GREENE. The Rockefeller Foundation has its office now at 61 Broadway, and they have been there in temporary headquarters since the 8th of January.

Chairman WALSH. Is it the intention that the whole foundation is going to that building, and that all of its activities will proceed from there?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And it is to be separated permanently hereafter from the offices at 26 Broadway?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir. That has been a subject of recommendation by me on three occasions during the last year and one-half.

Chairman WALSH. What determined that course in your mind, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. The evident impossibility of one man trying to do as much work as is implied in being the executive officer of the Rockefeller Foundation and attending to the very many activities of Mr. Rockefeller's office.

Chairman WALSH. Now, please make the sketch, Mr. Greene, that I asked for of your own employment and activities?

Mr. GREENE. On the 1st of July, 1912, I entered Mr. Rockefeller's office. Before that for two years I was general manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and had charge of the administrative side, as distinguished from the scientific side of its activities. Before that I was secretary to the Harvard University corporation for five years; before that, secretary to President Eliot for four years; before that, connected with the University Press of Cambridge for two years; and before that I studied law.

Chairman WALSH. You were educated at Harvard?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; a graduate of Harvard.

Chairman WALSH. And admitted to the bar?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; I was never admitted to the bar. I gave up my idea of practicing before I finished the law school.

Chairman WALSH. With respect to the submission of this general plan of giving on your part, when was that submitted to the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. On October 22, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. Was the entire membership present at the time?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; with the exception of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.

Chairman WALSH. Was it submitted to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. GREENE. I never heard that it was. It was a volunteer act wholly on my part, and I am not sure that any great weight was attached to it. It seemed to be received as a fairly accurate expression, but I doubt if any importance was attached to it by my associates.

Chairman WALSH. That was October, 1913?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Has that general plan been followed since that time?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; there was a tacit understanding, I think, that I should in general be guided by this policy, but no vote to that effect was passed.

Chairman WALSH. Did this policy differ in any material respect from the general policy that had been followed by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., in the past?

Mr. GREENE. No; my purpose was practically to put on paper what I supposed to be his policies as I had observed them.

Chairman WALSH. Take for a period of, say, five years prior to the institution of the Rockefeller Foundation, what amount per annum would you say that John D. Rockefeller, sr., had spent personally, or through any agents, along the same lines that have been and are intended to be followed by the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GREENE. I am sorry that I do not know, Mr. Chairman. It was not my business to know. I have not summed them up in any way; I had no occasion to sum them up, although I advised Mr. Rockefeller upon a great many of them.

Chairman WALSH. You could not approximate them?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; I could not even approximate them.

Chairman WALSH. As I understand you, there was no marked departure in the policy as adopted by the Rockefeller Foundation, and perhaps no change in its activities except as to amounts?

Mr. GREENE. My impression is that there was no special change, but my impression is not worth much on that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Now, this chart that you have submitted to the commission shows the personnel of all Mr. Rockefeller's boards?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. There are none omitted? We may take this as complete?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir. There is a board referred to in one place under the title of "The Bureau of Social Hygiene," which is not one of Mr. Rockefeller's boards. That is a bureau initiated largely by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and the membership consists of four persons, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Starr J. Murphy, Paul Warburg, and Dr. Katherine B. Davis.

Chairman WALSH. The questionnaire contains an answer to the question as to the activities of that last board and the amount of its expenditures, does it?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; I do not remember anything about that with regard to the bureau of social hygiene.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please sketch the bureau of social hygiene, how it is organized, its activities, and its endowment or contributions?

Mr. GREENE. I can do that on the strength of my general information, but I am not a member of the bureau and know of its activities simply because of my close association with Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

I think the first activity of the bureau was making a study of the problem of prostitution, and the idea was, if possible, to precede any discussion of policy, of regulation, or anything else by a knowledge of the precise facts, and the first matter published had reference to the actual facts in regard to commercialized vice in New York City. A book was published on that subject by George J. Kneeland. Mr. Costigan referred to that as an admirable achievement of Mr. Rockefeller's this morning.

The second study was on prostitution in Europe—I think I see the volume in your hand now—by Abraham Flexner. This work was not along the line of argument, but a plain statement of facts about the ways of dealing with that problem in Europe, and I think there is substantial evidence that the mere knowledge of the facts as to certain legislative and other expedients in Europe has very greatly affected the opinions of magistrates and others in this country who have to deal with that problem.

Chairman WALSH. Does this book contain all of the conclusions that have been made public up to this date?

Mr. GREENE. That is the latest publication.

Another undertaking bearing on social hygiene was the establishment at Belford, N. Y., in connection with the State Reformatory for Women, of a so-called laboratory of social hygiene, the purpose of which was to precede the final commitment and disposition of any case by a careful study of the economic and social conditions and background of each person committed to the reformatory, and learn her physical, mental, and moral condition. It hardly seems to need argument that before an intelligent disposition could be made those factors should be taken into account, but it never had been done adequately, and the bureau of social hygiene thought that an experiment of four or five years along those lines would perhaps point the way to an improvement in the administration of our prisons and reformatories.

Chairman WALSH. When was this work begun, Mr. Greene? Can you recall when it was?

Mr. GREENE. Probably about five years ago; I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Did this organization undertake to make a study upon the subject as to whether or not wages and working conditions had any relation to vice and prostitution?

Mr. GREENE. My impression is that those factors are not ignored, but I think it was not the purpose of either of those inquiries, at least I do not think either of them pretended to go exhaustively into that aspect of the matter; but it would not be fair for judgment to be formed as to this feature of the matter on my recollection of it.

Chairman WALSH. No; but I was trying to call your attention to that to find out whether or not, as a matter of fact, the inquiry was made and conclusion reached and publicity given upon that question?

Mr. GREENE. My impression is that Dr. Davis has dealt with that aspect of the matter. I think she has certain opinions on the subject.

Chairman WALSH. Have they been given publicity?

Mr. GREENE. There is one chapter in that book written by Dr. Davis.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will adjourn until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, and you will again resume the stand, Mr. Greene.

(At this point, at 4.30 o'clock on Tuesday, February 2, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Wednesday, February 3, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m. at the same place.)

NEW YORK CITY, February 3, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. The house will now please be in order. We are about to resume.

Mr. Greene, will you please resume the stand?

TESTIMONY OF MR. JEROME D. GREENE—Continued.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman—

Chairman WALSH. Was there something you wished to say, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, Mr. Chairman. In telling you yesterday that I had resigned from my business relations in Mr. Rockefeller's office, and from the directorships which I held, I did not wish to appear to be evading any responsibility I had during the period of time which especially has the consideration of this commission. I am quite prepared to be asked about my connection with Mr. Rockefeller's office during that time, and should rather hope to be given an opportunity to testify about that.

Chairman WALSH. If there was anything said or asked that had that appearance, it was certainly far from my mind or the mind of any of the commission. It is quite interesting to know that your whole matter seems to be passing through quite a stage of transition—that is, the moving of the office—and nothing you said gave that impression and nothing was intended to be implied. I have tried to have these questions prepared so they would go right to the root of things, and so that you would have an opportunity as broad as any criticism to make answer. Therefore, if I put it in that way, I do not wish you to think it contains the seed of any belief or judgment on the part of any of the commission of that kind.

Mr. GREENE. I appreciate your statement highly.

Chairman WALSH. Have you mentioned all of the civic, educational, or philanthropic bodies of which you are at the present time a trustee or a director?

Mr. GREENE. I am a member of all of the boards indicated on the chart where my name appears.

Chairman WALSH. Does the chart contain all of your activities in that direction?

Mr. GREENE. Not all. I hold one as an exception, a position as member of the board of directors of the American Social Hygiene Association.

Chairman WALSH. Any others?

Mr. GREENE. I am a trustee of a country hospital in New Hampshire for personal reasons.

Chairman WALSH. Exactly what connection have you at the present time with Mr. Rockefeller's personal investments?

Mr. GREENE. None whatever.

Chairman WALSH. Do you still confer with Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff on matters pertaining to his personal affairs, and have you so conferred since January 1, 1915?

Mr. GREENE. Since January 1, 1915, I have conferred with Mr. Rockefeller's staff on a great many matters in which I was jointly interested with them on account of the investigation of this commission. Otherwise I think I have hardly had time.

Chairman WALSH. You have assisted in getting up these voluminous documents?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; I have.

Chairman WALSH. And it required a great deal of detail work, and the application of a large number of the managing persons in your office?

Mr. GREENE. You are entirely right, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. What do you understand—you have answered this at least in part, but I will ask it again, in view of what you said about the almost impossibility of rendering effective service where there are many boards to be served on—what do you understand to be the reason for your appearance individually on all these boards?

Mr. GREENE. I do not think I said it was possible, Mr. Chairman. I think the membership of all these gentlemen on all these boards is proper and justified. It does, however, place a pretty heavy burden on them, and the difficulty, if any, lies in the weight of that burden.

What was the rest of your question?

Chairman WALSH. I believe I asked you if you felt that you could render effective service on these many boards?

Mr. GREENE. That suggests another aspect of this question of interlocking, which I am very glad to have the opportunity of explaining.

It is almost impossible to draw a sharp line of distinction between the fields of education, social betterment, and public health. Those are convenient classifications of our work. Conceivably, the Rockefeller Foundation might openly and avowedly be responsible for them all with subcommittees dealing with the separate fields. As a matter of fact separate corporate entity has been given to these related works, but I should regard it as a great misfortune if they became so separated that those points at which these fields touched each other should be treated with insufficient knowledge of what was going on in the related fields. That is a very strong justification of such interlocking as there is.

For example, in considering such a question as the health of workers in factories, a question of public health—there are educational aspects of that question, the teaching of sanitation and hygiene, there are medical aspects in the working out of the medical features of it, and there are legislative aspects, and so forth; those all touch each other, and I believe the efficiency of these interlocking directors in each of these fields is very greatly increased by the knowledge each inevitably derives from the others.

Chairman WALSH. Do you expect to give your full name to the work of the foundation hereafter?

Mr. GREENE. I do.

Chairman WALSH. In your conferences, do you ever at one sitting take up questions relating to the three boards and the health commission and Mr. Rockefeller's affairs? Of course, Mr. Greene, this question refers to the past, assuming that your time has been taken up with this other work recently.

Mr. GREENE. Are you referring to formal meetings or informal conferences, which can not take definite action?

Chairman WALSH. I would like you to express your doings in both. Perhaps we can get to an end better by asking you to state the whole proposition—any sort of conference or any sort of meeting, official or otherwise. I will ask the question again.

In your conferences, do you ever at one sitting take up questions relating to the three boards and the health commission and Mr. Rockefeller's personal affairs, investments or otherwise?

Mr. GREENE. We certainly should not do so at formal meetings. At informal conferences it is possible that those of us who have been in both relations would discuss—would turn from one to another of those matters. It is perfectly possible.

Chairman WALSH. How do you keep separate your different personalities? How do you know when a trustee of one board leaves off and the trustee of another board begins? How do you know when a philanthropic matter leaves off and Mr. Rockefeller's personal matters intervene?

Mr. GREENE. I have never discovered, Mr. Chairman, that that question presented any difficulty whatever, except the difficulty as to time and strength. It has never raised questions of incompatibility of interest or conflict of interest in my whole experience, never.

I should be very glad, Mr. Chairman, if you could put that question more concretely and suggest what kind of conflict of interest might arise.

Chairman WALSH. I will try to illustrate as you have asked. Suppose you are all in conference there and the question came up as to a plan for settling the Colorado difficulty, and Mr. King, for instance, submitted a plan of this sort:

We will say he submitted the plan that he did submit of this question of publicity, and you recognize, of course, that publicity is a great force, the force of education. I will withdraw that question. I am going to put it in an extreme case, so as to give you an opportunity to go over the whole question.

Suppose Mr. King had written out a plan for you and said the only way to bring about industrial peace and establish justice in Colorado—this was some time back, of course—was to call an immediate conference between John R. Lawson, Ed. Doyle, John D. Rockefeller, jr., John D. Rockefeller, sr., and Mr. Welborn, and that they should enter into a contract with the United Mine Workers of America for the next two years, based upon the outlines of contracts with other coal companies. Then the question of publicity should arise—shall we use a large part of this fund on behalf of the foundation to circulate that principle as applying to industry and as being a means of establishing industrial peace everywhere?

Mr. GREENE. My answer to that question is that I should feel perfectly at liberty to differ with Mr. Mackenzie King as to the wisdom of that proposition, and should probably, during the pendency of the strike, have differed with him if he made that suggestion. In the second place, I am emphatically opposed to the use of what you apparently mean by "publicity," and I should object, as secretary and trustee of the foundation, to the funds of the foundation being used that way.

Chairman WALSH. Could you search your conscience and feel that the reason you did not want publicity on that was that it conflicted with the personal interests of Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. GREENE. I should be opposed to the use of the funds of the Rockefeller Foundation generally for propaganda or publicity on matters of public controversy. The sole use of the funds of the Rockefeller Foundation for propaganda, I should say, should be limited to matters like sanitation, public health, in so far as they are not controversial, where there is a common agreement that what is needed is a diffusion of existing knowledge and information having to do with the public health.

But as to publicity, there are two meanings to that word, Mr. Chairman. The word has been given quite a black eye, chiefly because of a discredited method of publicity. I am referring now to the method of ingratiating the public and winning over the support of newspapers either through the publication of advertisements, which may be thought to bring pressure on the expression of editorial opinion, or by the deliberate buying up of editorial and news space, if that is possible.

Suspicion that that has been done has undoubtedly existed in the United States. Now, that method of publicity has been entirely discredited and its place has been taken in the enlightened usage, I think, of most of our corporations by a method of stating frankly the facts from the interested point of view of the corporations, with the names signed to the statement in such a way that there can be no question as to who is responsible for it. Statements thus made are set up to be refuted by anybody who can bring to bear contrary facts, and, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, at this moment the chief exponent of that honest, candid, and fair method of publicity, which stands up and takes the responsibility for what is done, is Mr. Ivy L. Lee. I made his acquaintance last June, I think it was, and from the very first I was impressed with the fact that that was Mr. Lee's contribution toward the Colorado situation, and it was a contribution which, in my opinion, was very much needed.

I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that I think the operators were very delinquent in not taking steps to bring out what they considered the facts of the situation as the United Mine Workers of America were doing, and I am glad to be able to say that the United Mine Workers of America used what I may call the modern method of publicity. Even their pamphlet on the Ludlow strike, which they entitled, I think, the "Ludlow Massacre," they had printed on the title page the name of the publicity agent of the United Mine Workers of America, who was responsible for that statement.

I do not think anything is to be gained on this occasion, Mr. Chairman, by mere recrimination, nor should your time be taken up by people who have nothing of their own knowledge to testify to directly, but I find it very hard to let this opportunity pass without saying that, so far as I know, not a single one of those gross misstatements and criminal accusations that occurred in that pamphlet and other pamphlets issued by the Mine Workers of America, though disproved on the witness stand before this commission and others, has been retracted by the United Mine Workers of America. A great deal has been said about the mistake that was made as to the compensation paid certain union officials. I think that was a very serious error, but it could only injure the operators themselves who were responsible for letting out that statement. It came to my notice very soon after it was brought out before your commission at Denver, or subsequently in the newspapers, and I know I said at once, and my colleagues agreed with me, that that thing should be corrected, and why it was not corrected until the 1st of January I do not at this moment know any better than you do; but, of course, it should have been corrected promptly. No one but the operators had anything whatever to lose by the publication of that statement, and as for the relative publicity given to the retraction of that statement, I think I have heard it read into the record of the proceedings of this commission three times, and it has been made a matter of such wide discussion that I presume five times as many people know the correction as heard of the lie as it was told. I do not know who is responsible, but the fact that it is false has received more publicity than the original statement.

Chairman WALSH. Just for the moment, going back to my illustration. What I mean by publicity is, Mr. Rockefeller said that the money of the foundation could be used that way under its powers.

Mr. GREENE. There are a great many things, Mr. Chairman, that are injudicious, and possibly some things that are wrong, which could be done by the foundation before coming up against the arm of the law; and the only safeguard that I know of against that, as in the case of the management of a hospital or university or any other charitable foundation, is the force of public opinion brought to bear upon the selection of trustees and the force of public opinion as a constant influence in their work, and the ultimate power of the legislature to abolish a trust if it is unwise used.

Chairman WALSH. State the number of persons now employed by the foundation, for all kinds of service, if you please, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. The foundation, Mr. Chairman, is a very young institution. Its executive staff is at present very small. Its salaried staff consists, in addition to the secretary, at present of only three or four clerks. And the extension of its organization will depend upon the development of work during the next year or two.

The foundation has instituted the International Health Commission, and it is carrying on the hookworm work around the world. And it would be impossible for me to say, offhand, how many men were being paid with money of the foundation. I think somewhere between one and two hundred, possibly.

Chairman WALSH. You may give us a list of that, if you have not already done so.

Mr. GREENE. I will be glad to give you such a list.

I want to say with reference to the International Health Commission, Mr. Chairman, that that was established primarily in order to extend around the world the hookworm work, the method which has been worked out in this country.

Now, that is a case very much in point, for this reason: We have had a sort of contract or understanding with the British colonial office for teaching the public health authorities of the tropical colonies how to deal with the hookworm disease.

Now, what could we teach the expert medical authorities of Great Britain on that subject? They have better facilities for training public health officers than we have. The first pathological work in the study of the hookworm was done by the English in Egypt, and they have a public health service organized in their various colonies. What could we teach? What we could teach was just this: That public health work of that character to be successful must first enlist the understanding and sympathy and the active cooperation of the common people.

Now, what has made our work in the past successful? Not that Mr. Rockefeller came down and poured out a few millions of dollars, but that going down there and working in a small way at first the people got interested. They got interested and convinced that they had this disease and that it was a great economic handicap, and by their own effort they could get rid of it.

The other method of public health work is by regulation of the central authorities, and such regulation applied to colonies is often odious and is not observed, and we could teach there something quite new, I think, to the British authorities, the possibility of interesting the people in their own salvation. That is the Rockefeller Foundation's contribution to the public health of the world.

Chairman WALSH. Please give a list of the principal studies the foundation has and is now conducting?

Mr. GREENE. The principal study is the investigation of industrial relations, on which Mr. King is now beginning. He is devoting probably the whole of this year to the study of the best possible approach to that subject. He is drawing what he calls a chart, which brings in almost every aspect of human relations, I should say, in order that when he does begin his great intensive work he will do it with knowledge of all other aspects of the matter and after consultation with others. The foundation as at present constituted is employing no other investigators.

Chairman WALSH. How many assistants has Mr. King in his department?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. King has a private secretary and a stenographer. He has received a great many applications from persons desiring to serve as investigators, but has been obliged to decline them all on the ground that his present work was that of intensive study.

Chairman WALSH. When do you think any publication will be given out as to Mr. King's work?

Mr. GREENE. That would be entirely a matter for Mr. King to say. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a matter of years?

Mr. GREENE. I should hope that what he regards as the approach to the problem would become known within a few months. But as to publication thereafter I have not any idea whether it will be a year, two years, or five years.

Chairman WALSH. Please state the study which you as secretary make, to make sure that the plan of investigation is broadly conceived and carefully, and that the work is scientifically conducted and scientifically tested?

Mr. GREENE. The only case to which I can now refer, of course, is that of the investigation of industrial relations. My method of making sure of that is to acquaint myself with the investigator, get a knowledge of his character and his ability; we take some chances, of course, Mr. Chairman, of having made a mistake in some cases, but trust to experience to show whether the original confidence was justified.

Chairman WALSH. Was Mr. King the author of the Lemieux Act, the Canadian industrial trades dispute act?

Mr. GREENE. He is so regarded, I think, in Canada.

Chairman WALSH. One of the administrators of it?

Mr. GREENE. As minister of labor I think it was his duty to have to do with the administration of the act.

Chairman WALSH. Did it occur to you that perhaps the working people of the United States would feel that he was deeply committed to that by reason of having been the author of it and the administrator of it, and did it occur to you that perhaps you were taking an investigator with a very staunch preconceived attitude?

Mr. GREENE. I expect to find in Mr. King a prejudice in favor of the characteristic feature of that act. And the characteristic feature of that act was complete publicity as coming from the investigation of both sides in advance of the tying up of any public-service corporation, including the coal companies. That, I think, was a prejudice which we should not seriously lay up against Mr. King.

As to whether that is a panacea, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe Mr. King so regards it. But it has been applied to the general situation in Canada, meeting with opposition on the part of both labor sometimes and of capital sometimes, but on the whole commending itself to the public.

Chairman WALSH. Did you as secretary think that that was a pretty good thing when you got Mr. King's services?

Mr. GREENE. I thought it had worked pretty well in Canada, and that it was certainly good in those features of which I spoke, but I am not aware whether it would be applicable to this country and whether it would be possible to enact into law certain features which are essential to it.

Chairman WALSH. Speaking now generally, Mr. Greene, and looking forward, say 10 years, do you believe that there should be such interlocking of directorates as now exist among the three Rockefeller Foundations, or between Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff, and a majority of each of the three executive committees?

Mr. GREENE. Of course, Mr. Chairman—

Chairman WALSH. In referring to this group that we have been talking about here, what other term might be used than "interlocking directorate"? It is a common term, and whether or not it can be properly applied to this in view of the explanation you have given as to what we might also call the interlocking information, it is necessary to use some term.

Mr. GREENE. I don't think of a better word, unless it be "overlapping" might be used, or "overworked" might be used, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. If this group of interlocking, overlapping, or overworked gentlemen wanted to give special encouragement, or, as suggested by Brother Ballard, "underpaid" gentlemen—that, I believe, we have not gone into as yet—if this group so designated and characterized wanted to give special encouragement to a particular college or particular civic agency or particular denomination or particular method of teaching economics has it the legal and financial power to select the individuals or agencies and subjects to be specially encouraged?

Mr. GREENE. I am afraid we could do a lot of damage, Mr. Chairman, before we could be stopped. But the risk is not, perhaps, as great as that would imply. I think wherever large discretion is placed, reliance is put on the judgment of the trustees. Public opinion, I think, is extremely exacting in such matters. There has been a great deal of talk about academic freedom and limitations on it in this country. The question was asked of President Eliot, Mr. Chairman, on my suggestion, as to the traditional doctrines on economics of Harvard University. He said there had been no characteristic doctrine, in spite of the fact that the protected industries of Massachusetts were largely responsible for the growth and prosperity of the college. He neglected to state that he was the most conspicuous free-trader in Massachusetts during the period when four-fifths of the endowment of Harvard was obtained. Now, public opinion in Massachusetts would not tolerate anything different; and I do not think public opinion in the United States generally would tolerate a lower standard of independence and integrity.

Chairman WALSH. What is there to prevent the Rockefeller Foundation from unduly influencing public thought and unduly influencing the agencies which in turn may influence public officials and university professors?

Mr. GREENE. I think what I have already said, Mr. Chairman, answers that question.

Chairman WALSH. The forces of public opinion?

Mr. GREENE. The force of public opinion, and, in the event of vicious or very unwise trustees being imported into the organization, a wholesome fear of the consequences.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any legal provision which at present would prevent such misuse of power?

Mr. GREENE. I want to be perfectly clear as to what you mean by "such misuse."

Chairman WALSH. By a misuse of power such as I have designated—that is, unduly influencing public thought, unduly influencing agencies which might influence public officials, or university professors.

Mr. GREENE. I do not see any legal provision to safeguard the foundation on that point.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any provision in the constitution or by-laws of the organization?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir. I think that that is a point upon which the trustees must be free essentially, just as every citizen is free to use or abuse his powers, his liberty, and take the consequences.

Chairman WALSH. Several witnesses, including Mr. Rockefeller, have called our attention to a provision in the membership corporation law of New York State which gives the legislature power to amend or repeal a charter given, a charter like that of the Rockefeller Foundation, and I want to ask you a few questions as to that. Would not a misuse of power have to be very great to attract enough public attention so that the legislature would make an issue of the charter—a political issue or a legislative issue?

Mr. GREENE. The public would have to make up its mind, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the abuse was of such importance as to merit legislative interference. But it seems to me that the exact nature of the legislative interference would be determined by the gravity of the danger. If it was very grave and serious the charter might be annulled. If dangerous tendencies were indicated, the charter might be amended or provision made for designating some of the trustees or something of that sort. In other words, a safeguard, a precautionary measure, could be very nicely adapted, it seems to me, to the degree of danger that was exhibited.

Chairman WALSH. You have observed, I suppose, that in many of these fields requiring legislation which is now admitted by all to have been to the great benefit of the whole body of the people, have been matters of controversy before legislatures for many years before the thought was finally worked into legislative action? That is true, is it not?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; I think that is true.

Chairman WALSH. Can you name any case now in which a legislature has acted except after most flagrant abuse? I want to go your thought thoroughly upon this subject.

Mr. GREENE. I am not enough of a student of legislation to be able to answer that question in the form in which it is put; but I think there has been a great deal of legislation which I think probably has procured abuse and a great deal which has followed it.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose the public interest were aroused after the legislature had adjourned, or suppose, again, that the particular grievance was that the foundation controlled the legislature, what public action could be taken?

Mr. GREENE. I should think that if any such shocking state of affairs occurred as that, that the life of the offending corporation would be very short.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you are familiar with the shocking conditions that obtained in the railroad industry, are you not, extending over a period of many years, and the efforts of legislatures to control the situation and pass remedial laws. Suppose, now, that the foundations should fall into bad hands, and that the men operating the foundations, and having this potential power of publicity and public education, should likewise be interested in industries like the railroad industry, for instance, where they did openly control legislatures and avenues of publicity. What would become of the power to repeal the charter or to amend it?

Mr. GREENE. Your first question was as to railroads and other corporations which had grossly—

Chairman WALSH. No; I cited that—I put the proposition down because I do not think that it applies to your present organization, or to the Rockefeller Foundation itself. But we will say now that a very rich and powerful economic organization, or powerful man, had charge of a foundation, and one that had unlimited resources of publicity, and he was also engaged in what might be called an exploiting industry that was doing a great deal of harm to the community, could he not use the foundation to help him in his what might be called nefarious conduct—improper conduct?

Mr. GREENE. With your hypothesis I think it is perfectly possible. As I said before, I think a lot of harm could be done before you could stop him; and that is equally true of anybody in a responsible position, whether the President of the United States, or a governor of a Commonwealth, or the chief of police, or the chairman of this commission.

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Well, you recognize the great power that goes with the foundation of that sort, of course?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; I do.

Chairman WALSH. Granting that these are remote possibilities, I am very glad to assume even that they are remote possibilities, do you feel that the public should embody safeguards in the incorporating act along the old and well-known theory of locking the barn before the horse is stolen, instead of afterwards?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, the barn has existed in this country with a tolerable degree of security for 300 years, and the American people have been using the endowment method of contributing to the public welfare during that period, and I do not think merely a priori considerations will probably lead them at this time to change a policy which has been productive of so much good. The alternative to a rich man is to blow his money in on his own amusement, or pile it up for his own aggrandizement, or to make it somehow serviceable in this country. This country is unequaled by any other in the strength and the duration of that tradition by which men of means in this country have dedicated a part of their means to the public welfare.

Chairman WALSH. Might a person controlling or having the potential power to control a very large industry have another outlet—that is, to fail to make so much—to intentionally fail to make it just as he intentionally and very properly devotes it afterwards to some good cause?

Mr. GREENE. I didn't get that question.

Chairman WALSH. I say, might there not be another outlet for this excess, if you could call it so, of wealth—that is, for a man who has charge of a large industry to refrain from making so much; for instance, like giving the workers in that industry a greater compensation or a greater share of the product?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, I think that we all agree that, given certain standards of decency and justice and considerate treatment, the American workingman does not ask for a gift or for bonuses over and above what is a fair rate of remuneration. I am very much mistaken if he would.

Chairman WALSH. But not calling it bonuses, though that seems to be a common term, but not calling it bonuses, is it your idea that a workman would receive a larger portion or share of the product of an industry, and if he did receive a larger share, should he be looked upon as a man receiving charity?

Mr. GREENE. I can speak only from my own feelings, in the matter, Mr. Chairman. I did not suppose that workmen wished to profit by exceptional treatment of the kind you indicate.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, that is not their viewpoint. Their viewpoint, if I may state it, as expressed often before this commission, is that it is a matter of justice; that a fair share of the product is being withheld from them by the machinery of modern industrial devices.

Mr. GREENE. They should certainly have what is regarded as just. Over and above that, I should suppose that any payment would be in the nature of a gratuity.

Chairman WALSH. Take the concrete case—it is a compelling sort of case, perhaps, in its aspects—in New Jersey, where it has been reported to this commission that the unfortunate conflict which came up was over a question of 40 cents per day in wage, and assume that some man had potential control of that property that had a great deal of money, a great excess of wealth that he might bestow after he got it from the industry. Do you believe it would or would not be a proper outlet for him and an act that would not detract from the self-respect of the worker, for instance, to pay him $4 a day instead of $1.60 a day?

Mr. GREENE. That would depend on whether the amount asked for was reasonable. If it was reasonable, certainly it would be better for him to pay his employees more. If it was an unreasonable demand I should say it would be better for him to dedicate his money in some way to the public good. That is a case on which I have no information as to the facts.

Chairman WALSH. In what way do you arrive at what is or what is not reasonable?

Mr. GREENE. I do not arrive at it, because it does not happen to be my business. But if it were, I should try to get some criterion.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I am trying to draw out now, if I can, to follow up the thought that you left here as to the alternatives, that a man with money has; that is, that he should blow it in or have a good time or think he was having a good time, or spend it imprudently, we will say—

Mr. GREENE. I think that is not, Mr. Chairman, the only alternative. There is another alternative, which I think is of the utmost importance, and that is spending his accumulation in the promotion of additional industry and giving employment to additional labor—and what is more important than giving employment to labor?—because I think that is not the best way to put it, but increasing economic production for the benefit of the world; and that, I think, is just as good philanthropy as giving money away.

Chairman WALSH. Since the legislature has the power to repeal or amend a charter such as yours, do you believe that it was wise to, or would it not be a better situation, to have the foundation start with such limitations of its power, and then come back to the legislature whenever such limitation might prove to be an obstacle to real public service?

Mr. GREENE. The matter seems to me, Mr. Chairman, rather academic than otherwise, because the limitations proposed for the proposed charter in Washington would not in any way, I think, hamper or embarrass us or change anything that we have done or intend to do. But when we were not successful in finally getting the charter in Washington and came up here, we thought that the best and most proper way to proceed was to ask for a charter on exactly the same terms on which it had been given to at least three other foundations in the State. But at all times I think we should be prepared to consider proposals for limitation, and as I said yesterday, I do not think anyone can be more interested than we are in those limitations, in the discussion of those limitations, so far as they may be shown to be necessary. We are more interested than anybody else, we might say, in having our limitations properly arrived at.

Chairman WALSH. You made a statement some time ago about the terrific force of public opinion—well-directed public opinion—well-thought-out public opinion. How does it find its expression in the field of legislation? That is the part I am trying to arrive at. Would you accept the Congress of the United States—the House of Representatives and the Senate—as being expressive of the will of the people based upon its thought?

Mr. GREENE. It does not always instantly express the state of public opinion, the Senate being elected for longer terms is less quickly responsive than the House; but they both undoubtedly show the effect of public opinion in their make-up.

Chairman WALSH. In its last analysis is there any other way for the American people to arrive at a state of public sentiment except through their legislative body; that is, in the field that might require legislation?

Mr. GREENE. I should say that is the way in which their wishes are recorded, Mr. Chairman; but in the formulation of their wishes I should attribute greater importance to the newspapers and to public speech and discussion.

Chairman WALSH. There were thousands of criticisms and suggestions published in the newspapers and magazines when the question of the incorporation of your foundation was before Congress, were there not?

Mr. GREENE. There were many suggestions.

Chairman WALSH. The matter was debated in Congress, and a hearing was had before two committees, one of the House of Representatives and the Senate committee?

Mr. GREENE. The hearing before the Senate committee was on the original bill in 1910. The hearing before the House committee was in 1912. It was not a public hearing, as I recall it.

Chairman WALSH. But they heard the matter, and they received advice from the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And they received the Peters bill?

Mr. GREENE. They did.

Chairman WALSH. Containing the amendments that the House of Representatives thought proper to be made and the limitations placed upon the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. The limitations were made in the second draft of the Senate bill, and in the form that later was introduced into the House of Representatives.

Chairman WALSH. So, then, they did have a public hearing on the substantial features of the bill in both the Senate and House.

Mr. GREENE. Public in the sense that the subject was a matter of public discussion; not in the sense there were two public hearings at which arguments pro and con were heard.

Chairman WALSH. There was an extensive and serious discussion of the matter in the Senate, was there not, certain Senators expressing their grave fears of the granting of power and others accepting the viewpoint practically as expressed by yourself?

Mr. GREENE. There was no discussion, Mr. Chairman, of the bill itself, but several Senators found it relevant to other matters under discussion in the Senate to devote several pages of the Congressional Record to the expression of their opinions on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. So the Senate was reasonably well informed in that matter in that somewhat roundabout way you have mentioned as to the points at issue?

Mr. GREENE. I think so, as the whole public were.

Chairman WALSH. After that bill failed to go through both Houses, by reason of Congress adjourning at the time, I understood from Mr. Rockefeller, then you handed Mr. Rockefeller a memorandum which he read to the commission the other day at the City Hall, which stated that you went to the majority leader of the New York Assembly and asked him to get the State assembly to pass the act incorporating the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. That is my recollection.

Chairman WALSH. You did that, did you?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who was the majority leader?

Mr. GREENE. My impression is it was Senator Wagner. At any rate I had been previously acquainted with Senator Wagner, and naturally went to him as the leader—I think he was the leader; he was at that time or had been. I think at the moment he may have been presiding; at any rate, I asked him, and he said Senator Foley would introduce the bill if I asked him. Then I went to the Republican leader, and I think also to the Progressive leader if there was one. My recollection is a little indistinct, but I went to the leading men in both houses and was assured that they were all enthusiastically in favor of the measure and would support it when it came up.

Chairman WALSH. Who said that?

Mr. GREENE. All of the leaders, all of the party leaders; both the majority and the minority.

Chairman WALSH. Of what measure?

Mr. GREENE. Of the bill.

Chairman WALSH. The bill granting the charter?

Mr. GREENE. Yes. There was no opposition at all. I offered to do whatever was necessary, in the way of circularizing the assembly, pointing out the general characteristics of Mr. Rockefeller's benefactions and our policies and methods and everything to enable them to form an opinion of the merits of the enterprise. But in the absence of any disagreement among any of the party leaders, I was told that that was unnecessary; I was very glad to save the time.

Chairman WALSH. Who told you, Senator Wagner or Senator Foley?

Mr. GREENE. When the bill was finally in Senator Foley's hands I think it was he that told me it would not be necessary to circularize.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any publication in the newspapers of the terms of the charter before it was passed?

Mr. GREENE. I do not remember having seen one. The newspapers paid very little attention to it, to its passage, which was rather a surprise to me, as I could not understand why it only had an inch or two in the papers at the time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed since this inquiry came up—do you have a press-clipping service at your office, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. I have received press clippings, limited, I think, to an expression of editorial opinions. I have also had voluntarily sent to me a great many others, so that I have a large and unopened collection of clippings.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed that some of the leading newspapers in the United States have carried statements since this inquiry was projected to the effect that the Rockefeller Foundation was operating under a charter granted by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. GREENE. That has not come to my attention.

Chairman WALSH. Your attention has not been called to that?

Mr. GREENE. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you tell the majority leader, or Senator Foley, about the alleged safeguards which were put into the national charter and explain to them that those safeguards were not needed, according to your opinion?

Mr. GREENE. I do not recall that, Mr. Chairman. He may very naturally have asked me whether it was the same, and if he did, I told him; and if he did not, I may not have said it to him.

Chairman WALSH. Did you give the majority leader, Senator Foley, copies of the publicity matter which you have included in your answer to this commission?

Mr. GREENE. I do not think I did, Mr. Chairman. They were very hurried interviews that I had, hurried because they hurried them, and my recollection is that they accepted my representations very quickly and with avowed confidence in the propriety and the advisability of this legislation.

Chairman WALSH. Well, outside of the general reputation which you might have in the community with which they were acquainted, had you had any other legislative matters up, or anything of that sort?

Mr. GREENE. It had been my duty for several years, Mr. Chairman, serving with the committee on experimental medicine of the State medical society, to oppose legislation which threatened if carried out to make it impossible to carry on medical research and that ostensibly for the protection of animals.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you meet Senator Wagner when you took up the question of having the State of New York charter the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. I think I met him in the majority leader's room. I am quite sure.

Chairman WALSH. At Albany?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have your act with you when you went to see him?

Mr. GREENE. I certainly did.

Chairman WALSH. Was he notified by anyone, or do you know, that you were coming?

Mr. GREENE. Probably. I do not recall the circumstances.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any person present when you met Senator Wagner?

Mr. GREENE. My impression is there were two or three gentlemen waiting to see him in the same room.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recollect who they were?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you then handed him the proposed charter, which omitted all of this matter that had been put in the Federal charter, and said what to him?

Mr. GREENE. I think I told him that we had decided now to seek a charter, and that we were taking a form upon which the people of New York, the Assembly of the State of New York, had already passed, and that with the necessary changes indicating that this was the Rockefeller Foundation rather than the Sage Foundation, and so on, that it was almost identically the same bill.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have legal advice in the drafting of the bill?

Mr. GREENE. We had the advice of Mr. Murphy in drafting the bill. In fact, I think he drafted the bill.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Starr J. Murphy drafted the bill?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did he examine it as to its constitutionality, whether or not the power under the constitution was in the legislature to grant a charter with such wide powers as had been indicated here?

Mr. GREENE. I assume that he had an opinion on that point, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Did you at any conference with the majority leader, with Senator Foley, regarding the incorporation of the Rockefeller Foundation, also discuss other proposed or pending legislation?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; certainly not. I had no other relation with Senator Foley either before or after. I did write a letter when I heard the bill had passed, thanking him for his good offices in the matter, and that ended my relation.

Chairman WALSH. During the period when you were seeking a charter for the Rockefeller Foundation, did you appear before the Legislature of New York for or against any legislation affecting the public schools of New York?

Mr. GREENE. While this was pending?

Chairman WALSH. During the same legislature we will say?

Mr. GREENE. I appeared at the hearing of the McKee bills.

Chairman WALSH. What were the McKee bills?

Mr. GREENE. At that time I think the Rockefeller Foundation was already in existence. I think it was already in existence when this hearing took place. I am sure it was.

Chairman WALSH. Did you appear as a member of the General Education Board, or as a member of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff, or in a private capacity?

Mr. GREENE. I appeared as a citizen of New York City.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make—you wrote a letter that has been read here making an explanation as to the Rockefeller Foundation to the senate, or was it to the house committee—to whom was that letter?

Mr. GREENE. That letter was sent to members of the senate, I think, upon the passage of the bill in the house by a large majority.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make any written explanation to the legislature?

Mr. GREENE. Never.

Chairman WALSH. Similar to the statements which had been sent to the Senators and Congressmen of the United States?

Mr. GREENE. No; I was quite ready to do so, and should have considered it only proper to do so, but was told it would not be necessary.

Chairman WALSH. By whom?

Mr. GREENE. By the senator in charge of the bill, I think; I can not imagine who else.

Chairman WALSH. Senator Foley?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do you remember as a matter of fact whether it was Senator Foley or Senator Wagner?

Mr. GREENE. I think I could state with a degree of definiteness it was Senator Foley, because when I had once been introduced to Senator Foley it was he and he alone with whom I discussed any such matters as that.

Chairman WALSH. Were public notices issued at your office of the intention to introduce the bill, or as to its scope?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was anything said by your office, any publicity given as a comparison between the charter applied for or received from the State of New York and the bill known as the Peters bill in Congress?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; not the slightest.

Chairman WALSH. Why did you not include in the New York charter the alleged safeguards which had been publicly discussed, which according to your statement to the United States Senate had met with the cordial approval of the incorporators of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GREENE. Because we put them in in deference to a sentiment expressed in order to secure the passage of the bill, because we thought they would not materially affect the bill. They were all restrictions which Congress could at any time have put in if it found it necessary to, but which if we had had a perfectly free choice, as we did have here, we should not ourselves include at this stage in our history.

Chairman WALSH. Please state the steps that you believe would be necessary on the part of the public to secure through the legislature or through the courts an annulment or restriction of the foundation's charter; that is, just what would the public do about it if convinced that the foundation was acting against the interest and welfare of all the people?

Mr. GREENE. A lawyer would have to say, Mr. Chairman, what legal steps should be taken. I believe information can be given to the attorney general ordinarily, and the attorney general can proceed against the trustees who violate their trust.

Chairman WALSH. The point I am trying to give you, just bearing upon the study of the question of limiting such charter in advance or depending or relying upon the power to amend or nullify by the courts, have you thought of the possibility, for instance, if it fell into bad hands, of unlimited publicity by the foundation to confuse the public mind, court procedure, of delays, blandishments, promises, for example, that the courts have declared that the alteration of any charter must be reasonable, I believe, which might suggest a very long drawn out fight in the court and so forth—have you thought of all those things?

Mr. GREENE. I have thought of them more since they have been brought to our attention at this hearing, Mr. Chairman, than before, because they did not seem to me to be really very grave dangers.

Chairman WALSH. Has the constitutionality of the act ever been questioned since its passage?

Mr. GREENE. Never at our office or anywhere in any quarter, so far as I am aware of.

Chairman WALSH. The constitution of the State of New York seems to provide that the subject of an act shall be expressed in the title; that no private bill, I think it says, may be passed by the legislature which shall embrace more than one subject and that subject shall be expressed in the title. The title of the act to incorporate your foundation, it seems, reads as follows: "An act to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation." Have you ever considered whether or not that did express the title, and whether the proposition or failure to express the subject in the title had a large part to do with the bill being passed by the legislature of New York without that consideration which the Congress of the United States gave it and to the people at that time?

Mr. GREENE. I think that makes a pretty large demand upon one's credulity, Mr. Chairman. The title of the act exactly expresses its subject, which was to create the Rockefeller Foundation, and the purpose of the Rockefeller Foundation was defined a few lines lower down; and I can not imagine anybody who was seriously interested in that matter failing to read the description of the purpose of the foundation and observing its very wide scope.

Chairman WALSH. I probably involved too much in my question. Had the foundation considered that requirement of the constitution of New York, or had Mr. Murphy, before he drew this act?

Mr. GREENE. I do not know whether that specific point had occurred to him.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I am going to ask you some questions that I have asked heretofore, because I believe perhaps you are better equipped to answer them than some of the other witnesses. That is, as to the powers under the act of the Rockefeller Foundation, as you understand them; what the foundation, if it wished, could do? I would like to abstract the personal, of course, Mr. Greene.

Mr. GREENE. Yes; I perfectly understand that.

Chairman WALSH. And in answering you might go to the very greatest extreme of it falling into bad hands; might the foundation, if it wished, conduct a propaganda against trades-unionism?

Mr. GREENE. I can imagine it making a start in that direction; I can not imagine anything more atrocious.

Chairman WALSH. But I mean, has it the power to do it?

Mr. GREENE. I do not think it takes any special knowledge of the facts to say that—

Chairman WALSH. I am sorry to put that in, but I put these questions to you as I would put to anyone.

Mr. GREENE. Yes; I have got the opportunity of going out into the street and firing off a gun and killing somebody, if I had the gun.

Chairman WALSH. You do not think it is parallel?

Mr. GREENE. What I mean is to limit—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The misuse of legally granted power, to go out and kill a man?

Mr. GREENE. What I mean is liberty to do wrong, to do very great wrong, is the commonest, the very commonest attribute or corollary of complete human liberty, and persons who have intrusted to them important responsibilities have the power for a while by complete lapse of all consideration of ethics, morality, and law, of doing a lot of mischief. But it does not take any particular legal knowledge to know that.

Chairman WALSH. No; nor expert knowledge.

Mr. GREENE. No; nor expert knowledge. To that extent I am willing, with the extraordinary hypothesis that you put before me, I am willing to make an affirmative answer.

Chairman WALSH. That is, your answer is yes; that the foundation might, if it wished, conduct a propaganda against trade-unionism?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Might it use its influence against the use of the union label in the publication of agencies which apply to it for funds?

Mr. GREENE. I do not like the question, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. That is, I ought to put another question?

Mr. GREENE. I do not like any of these questions, because they suggest different types of wrongdoing which are perfectly open to a person who has a discretionary function. You might make me feel very uncomfortable by asking many questions as to what I personally might do in violation of the laws and customs and proprieties of our society. But they don't seem to me to be quite fair questions.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I am asking—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). I hope you do not mind my saying so.

Chairman WALSH. No; I do not. Nevertheless, I have framed these questions in such a way as to give you an opportunity to answer them, and it is not done without thought, some thought, the best we are capable of, nor is it done merely to ask a question that is unfair. You have probably noted the criticisms, have you not, of persons that represent a very large number of people in the body politic—you have observed those and you note the extreme to which they go?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; I do.

Chairman WALSH. In the opinion of some of us?

Mr. GREENE. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I am stating these questions not to be unfair but that you who have the information and the facility of expression, if I may say it, might make answer to them.

Mr. GREENE. I will do my best.

Chairman WALSH. So I hope you will not have understood that there is any intention to do anything unfair. Might the foundation circulate literature against workmen's compensation acts?

Mr. GREENE. It could, but it would not, because I believe compensation acts are, happen to be unanimously approved. And, moreover, I will say in answer to that further, that that type of activity is repellant, so far as I am aware, to every member of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. You say that compensation acts are unanimously approved. Have they not been adopted in States after the most bitter opposition to them and the expenditure of very great sums of money—have they not been defeated time and again before finally passed?

Mr. GREENE. I mean to say, Mr. Chairman, I think there would be no disagreement in our body as to the desirability.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, in your body?

Mr. GREENE. It is simply based on my personal impression.

Chairman WALSH. But I might perhaps pick out, in good time, pick out a number of gentlemen, the number that would fill your entire body, good men, men of honesty of purpose that do oppose workmen's compensation acts and are opposing them before legislatures to-day.

Mr. GREENE. I should say that they were violating the proprieties, if they so used their position as members of a trust, a charitable trust.

Chairman WALSH. And if they were all of one opinion, if they all thought the workmen's compensation act was to the detriment of the workman, as there is one line of thought, that he ought to be allowed to have the recourse that everyone else has, to the courts of his country, and get perhaps greater compensation than he could, if they were all of one mind and opposed it upon that philosophic and commendable ground, they could do it, could they not?

Mr. GREENE. I think they could for a time violate the proprieties of their position to that extent. But I think that they should not do so, whether they favored or opposed legislation of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Has the foundation the power to finance institutions opposed to trade-unionism or to circulate their literature, I am asking, under its powers now?

Mr. GREENE. If such an act could come within the scope of legally charitable or eleemosynary work, that power exists.

Chairman WALSH. Could it buy advertising space to state the arguments against any legislative proposition that it thought had to do with the betterment of the welfare of mankind?

Mr. GREENE. I think it could violate the proprieties of the case for awhile in that manner.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, you understand that in the congressional act you were limited by express terms to activities along eleemosynary and philanthropic lines?

Mr. GREENE. That was sheer surplusage, Mr. Chairman, put in at the suggestion and to meet the objection of a lawyer in the Judiciary Committee of the House, rather to make the bill commend itself to the House, but not because it added anything to it. It did not add anything to the bill.

Chairman WALSH. But it was in there?

Mr. GREENE. It was in there.

Chairman WALSH. It is not in the bill that you handed to Senator Foley, which was passed?

Mr. GREENE. There were a great many other conditions. The bill that was passed was a shorter bill, but my claim is that the mere absence of those terms could not in any way alter the fact; that is, a charitable agency of this sort, like the Rockefeller Foundation, is confined to charitable work. We thought there would be no harm in putting the words in, nor could there be any good done by putting them in.

Chairman WALSH. Has Mr. King received any payment for his services except from the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; and not a cent from the foundation except after October 1, although he was in conference with Mr. Rockefeller and the rest of us between June and October.

Chairman WALSH. Did he go to Colorado at any time?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did he come from Canada to visit your office at your instance and request?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; and that happened to be at my personal instance.

Chairman WALSH. Who paid his traveling expenses and the like?

Mr. GREENE. His traveling expenses were paid at that time by Mr. Rockefeller.

Chairman WALSH. By Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr.

Mr. GREENE. I think so; I can not recall at this time. I really do not know, but my impression is that is correct; it would be perfectly proper, because he had not then entered into the employ of the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. The report he made as to a scheme to bring about better industrial conditions in Colorado—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). If you will allow me, I recall more definitely now approving the payment of those bills by the foundation of all of Mr. Mackenzie King's traveling expenses.

Chairman WALSH. Could the foundation use its funds to secure private reports regarding conditions in a particular industry, or plans in a particular industry that might bring about what the owners conceived to be industrial peace?

Mr. GREENE. I think if the Rockefeller Foundation, while it was not primarily in any existing dispute, if however it had the means of injecting into that dispute, through such a man as Mr. Mackenzie King, any suggestion or series of suggestions looking toward a closer contact between the employers and employees, and a more sympathetic relation between them, that the foundation would be doing a very great service.

Chairman WALSH. On August 9 Mr. King wrote a letter submitting in substance the plan afterwards adopted by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.—August 6, 1914—did he not?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And he has never had any connection with the Rockefeller interests except as an investigator or the head of the department of research and investigation into industrial relations?

Mr. GREENE. He has never had any other relationship to the Rockefeller Foundation than that.

Chairman WALSH. And whatever he did at that time with reference to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was paid for out of the funds of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Chairman, there is a leading quality to that question which I think justifies my saying this—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Very good. I put it in a leading form and direct as I could.

Mr. GREENE. I think I must explain how Mr. King entered into the situation.

Chairman WALSH. Could you answer my question first and then explain?

Mr. GREENE. It is true that while Mr. King was coming occasionally to New York to discuss the possibility of his entering into a permanent or definite relationship with the Rockefeller Foundation that on one occasion while Mr. King was in Ottawa it occurred to Mr. Rockefeller that Mr. King might be able to make a suggestion which would have a bearing on the establishment of better relationship between employers and employees in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and asked him, as one man has a right to ask any other man, if he would feel like embodying on paper certain ideas he had suggested. Mr. King gratuitously and very reluctantly, because he had not had the time to elaborate the thing to his own satisfaction, sent his ideas on the subject. It was an entirely proper, and I may add a fortunate, transaction. I think we are very greatly indebted to Mr. Mackenzie King, Mr. Chairman, for the point of view which he has enabled us to put into the problem of industrial relations. It is a point of view tending distinctly toward humanity and mutual understanding.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose that his report had been of a character that you thought was—that the plan was inimicable to public welfare—would that have had an influence or not? Suppose it was radically opposed to what you conceived to be the best interest of society as a whole, do you think you would have employed Mr. King to make this study for the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. The qualifications which I should impose, if I was alone determining it, and I shall say the same for the foundation, are experience to deal with such a problem, coupled with complete integrity. I should give a man employed under those circumstances a large degree of trust and confidence. One of the last things which I should expect of such a man would be that, at the beginning of his service, he would present in a final and conclusive form a panacea for the solution of the very things he had been employed to investigate, and had he submitted a plan in any spirit of that kind I should have thought that it could hardly be taken very seriously. And if it was, in my opinion, contrary to the best interests of capital and labor, I should have felt it was inconsistent with the proper function of an investigator, and that would not be the kind of man I could trust.

Chairman WALSH. And would you not have had the fear that it was inimicable to the public welfare?

Mr. GREENE. No. I should allow a man I trusted to go to great lengths contrary to my opinion, if I had confidence in his ability and if he knew, as did Mr. King, a thousand times more than I did on the subject.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that at that time it was the carefully thought out and definite policy of yourself and associates to combat with the whole power of the Rockefeller fortune, the right of the independent American workman to select his own place of work, without dictation from any other person as expressed by the so-called closed-shop union, including the check-off system?

Mr. GREENE. I did not find myself, Mr. Chairman, where I had to pass judgment on that particular issue. I did believe, conscientiously, but perhaps mistakenly, that the real issue in Colorado, after the beginning of the strike, was the restoration of peace; I believed that; that that was the primary issue. I believed that if, in the course of this discussion, facts came out which showed that the operators, including those for whom as directors we were personally responsible, either before or after the strike, had done things that should not have been done, I should say I would be prepared, as a director, to assume the responsibility which a director has for the acts of the person he has chosen to represent him, and of whom he presumably approves as long as he is in his employ. In spite of that, however, I believed as a director, it was not my business nor in the public interest to discuss questions of better relations between capital and labor and the terms of future employment until the restoration of peace. That was my own belief, that it would have been a mistake; and that is the reason why I did not myself personally, although I was a new director and much in need of information, go to Colorado during the pendency of the strike.

Chairman WALSH. You have the report made by letter of date of August 6, 1914, from Mr. King to Mr. Rockefeller; you have that in mind, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that that report was made to Mr. Rockefeller as the representative of his father and as an investor in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. or to Mr. Rockefeller in his capacity as the representative of his father and a director, a trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GREENE. It had nothing whatever to do with the Rockefeller Foundation, Mr. Chairman. It was a piece of advice gratuitously given by a man whose opinion had been asked by Mr. Rockefeller with reference to his duties, undoubtedly, as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. Was not he working for the foundation at the time he did it?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was not his work—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). But if he had been it would have made no difference. If it happened that July 1, rather than October 1, had been the date at which he began his study, and there was a chance for longer experience of that kind, I think Mr. Rockefeller should be commended rather than criticized for asking his advice, but it happens that he was not then employed by the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Where I gathered the notion was his letter where it says: "Under those circumstances I am inclined at this time to believe that you will think I am taking the right course in not giving my whole time to the work of the foundation until October 1." Was he doing a part of the work of the foundation prior to October 1?

Mr. GREENE. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did he do anything before this work in the field of industrial relations?

Mr. GREENE. No; he meant he was going with the foundation on a full-time basis on October 1, but it did not imply that he was on part-time basis before that.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to call your attention, as I did the attention of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., to some statements made by Dr. Schurman, of Cornell——

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). I heard them all. That may save the time of the commission.

Chairman WALSH. I am much obliged, but I prefer to ask the questions and put them in the record, because, no matter how accurately we think our memory may be, there may be some lapse which would be unfortunate. Might not the foundation, as suggested by Dr. Schurman, champion free trade or protection?

Mr. GREENE. I have already answered that. I think that might occur.

Chairman WALSH. Or trusts or competing concerns out of which trusts grow?

Mr. GREENE. I think it could.

Chairman WALSH. Might it not become the champion of socialism, or individualism, or the program of the Democratic or the Republican Party?

Mr. GREENE. I can conceive such things might happen.

Chairman WALSH. And might it not endow a college of a certain religious denomination?

Mr. GREENE. I do not know whether they could legally do that or not.

Chairman WALSH. Might it not subsidize any existing or any new religious denomination?

Mr. GREENE. It might find some devious method of accomplishing that end if it was ingenious enough and totally unmindful of its obligations.

Chairman WALSH. And might it not do anything, as Dr. Schurman says, and everything which its trustees think likely to effect reform or improvement in the material, economic, intellectual, artistic, religious, moral, and political conditions of the American people or of mankind?

Mr. GREENE. In the sense in which Dr. Schurman apparently means they might do it, meaning thereby a fair possibility that they would do it, I totally disagree with Dr. Schurman, whom I know and respect highly.

Chairman WALSH. If it was possessed of the legal right to do those things, would the public learn that an amendment of the charter was needed before great damage might be done in the hands of dishonest and unwise persons?

Mr. GREENE. I think the public could be trusted to look out for itself in all those respects, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything to prevent the doing of any or all of those things aside from the wisdom and disinterestedness and honesty of its trustees?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; the ultimate power of the legislature and the influence of public opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Rockefeller testified last week that he understood that under the laws of the State of New York the corporation—a corporation like the Rockefeller Foundation—could not reduce its incorporators below the number provided in the original charter; is that your understanding, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. I do not think Mr. Rockefeller was correct on that point; I do not think he had thought of it before; I think that is wrong.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of fact the statute provides that may be done, that you may reduce at any meeting of the board of trustees—reduce the number below the number provided for in the original charter.

Mr. GREENE. If you say so, that is the case.

Chairman WALSH. I do not say so, and have no knowledge, and I do not think you would want to put me in that controversial position in this matter. I would like the question to be read.

Mr. GREENE. What I meant was that I assumed that was based on your information, which I have not got. That is what I meant by that remark.

Chairman WALSH. Aside from any information I may have received from any source, as a trustee of the foundation, and as a person having this power, if it does exist, what would you say about the proposition of whether or not you could meet and under the terms of your charter reduce the number of the trustees say to three?

Mr. GREENE. I think that is another one of those possibilities of which we have spoken, although that could be done of course, only by a vote of the body.

Chairman WALSH. How is your charter amended? I mean how is your constitution amended, rather?

Mr. GREENE. The constitution is amended, I think, only at a stated meeting, or meeting duly called for that purpose, and notice of the precise change having previously been sent to the members. The exact language of it I do not remember, but it is adequate.

Chairman WALSH. Has any question ever been raised as to the legality of an increase or decrease in the number of the trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation, prior to the time the question was asked of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., a few days ago?

Mr. GREENE. I think not. The whole tendency of our boards is to start with a few, 7, 8, 9, or 11—11 is the present number of the Rockefeller Foundation—and gradually, as men are discovered, to increase the number. The General Education Board I think now has 17 or 18 members. We are only too glad, when we can find the sort of man we want, to associate him with us. That is our policy, but has nothing whatever to do with the legal question you have just asked. I suppose if the law says we can reduce our number to three, we could, and that is one of those extremely unwise, imprudent, and improper things which we might do, but which we would never dream of doing.

Chairman WALSH. It depends upon the honesty, in other words, the honesty and disinterestedness of the trustees, whoever they may be?

Mr. GREENE. And their common sense.

Chairman WALSH. Now, how long has the foundation been in existence? What was the date of its charter?

Mr. GREENE. May 14, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed, from the work you have done, the necessity for any safeguards or restrictions in a charter of this kind, based upon this short experience of a year?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; I have not. I do place great stress on the accountability to the public for our acts.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything in the constitution or by-laws to limit compensation or limit the members who may receive compensation?

Mr. GREENE. There is something, I think, in the—in either the law or charter or constitution which limits compensation to reasonable compensation for services rendered. That would, of course, always be a matter of interpretation.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be at liberty, say, to vote a salary of $50,000 a year to a secretary?

Mr. GREENE. I should not say so.

Chairman WALSH. Or $10,000?

Mr. GREENE. I can not pretend to have an unbiased opinion on that point.

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps I am unfortunate in my selection of the illustration, and it was not intentional, I assure you, Mr. Greene.

Mr. GREENE. I think it should have some relation to the existing standards of compensation for the general kind of work—educational, philanthropic, or administrative.

Chairman WALSH. We have seen salaries in certain departments of activities, as commercial and otherwise, increase prodigiously during recent years.

Mr. GREENE. And also diminish since the time of the insurance scandals.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; when it was thought to have been discovered that it was a very great abuse of funds that belonged to many persons who did not have a very good chance to control them; that was found.

Do you believe there should be any limitation in your constitution or by-laws, for instance, for future generations, as to compensation to be allowed?

Mr. GREENE. As the constitution and by-laws can always be modified by the boards themselves, I do not think any restriction of that sort would have any effect, any greater validity, than the establishment of a series of precedents. I think, on the contrary, the precedents established would be the stronger safeguard against excessive salaries.

Chairman WALSH. What procedure did you take in adding to the number of the board, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. We talked over the question of possibly adding on new members. I remember the question came up as to what was the best way of perpetuating sound traditions in the board, whether they should be incorporated in statements of policies in the records, or in rules and regulations, and the prevailing opinion was that the better way was to train young men for future trustees in the responsibilities and methods of trusteeship in the foundation.

Rather curiously, the first name suggested after that determination was reached was that of President Charles W. Elliot, who was then 81 years old.

At the mention of his name there was a general agreement that it would be very fortunate if the foundation could prevail on him to serve on the board, and at the next regular meeting of the full board at which members were elected, his name was presented and he was elected. It was the same in the case of Mr. Hepburn. His name was discussed informally among the members of the board and at a special meeting of the board called for another purpose his name was put in the notice of the meeting, and I think something like two weeks' notice was given. But there was no resolution providing for increasing the number of the board and there would not be, I take it, in any case. If we should know of a good man to put on the board we would discuss the matter and elect him at the next regular meeting.

Chairman WALSH. I want to refer to your analogy made a moment ago. For how many years had those practices out of which grew the insurance scandal been in effect before any investigation was had?

Mr. GREENE. I suppose a good many years.

Chairman WALSH. What fight was made by the companies to prevent publicity of the scandal?

Mr. GREENE. You are asking me now, Mr. Chairman, about a subject which I am but very superficially informed about.

Chairman WALSH. Did the companies fight to maintain the practices, so far as your observation goes, or did they, when their attention was called to them, acquiesce?

Mr. GREENE. They may have, but it was the whole point of that movement, that those companies regarded themselves as organized solely for profit—that is what they were organized for. And men who take such a limited view of their responsibility could be expected to resist any such attempted interference with their affairs.

Chairman WALSH. Were you present when Mr. Rockefeller testified that, as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., he could not be expected to take the time to learn the details about health condition, methods of compensation for accidents and for deaths, and so forth?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Rockefeller's position, Mr. Chairman, is different from that of other men. It might be said to be unique, solely on account of the very mass or volume of his investments. I believe that a man who has many investments, should, as a shareholder or director, give a maximum of his personal attention without overriding or interfering with the proper exercise of their functions by his executives. I think Mr. Rockefeller has to do the next best thing; he has to surround himself with men who can help him by directly representing him on these boards, and that any legislation which makes it more difficult for him—for a man of very large wealth to have such representation, is legislation not in the public interest. It forces him either not to have any representation or the most perfunctory sort, that is, limited representation—limited by the amount of time at his disposal. Mr. Rockefeller has endeavored to have his associates aid him in conducting the affairs of these companies.

Chairman WALSH. Might I ask if you feel the same in regard to your position as one of the directors representing Mr. Rockefeller's interest in the company as you have stated?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; I do. I think it is my duty to get as well informed as possible with the conditions in the company. But I had to take them up one at a time, and I did not happen to be familiar at the outset with the affairs of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., but I studied its reports, and acquainted myself with its financial history and took such opportunities as I had to become acquainted with the officers in Colorado.

Chairman WALSH. Did you see the reports showing the labor conditions in Colorado and Wyoming?

Mr. GREENE. My opinion is that I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Or the financial statements that might contain anything in reference to labor conditions—did those financial statements contain anything about the labor conditions?

Mr. GREENE. Not the financial statements that I refer to.

Chairman WALSH. Did you personally see the list of alleged grievances of the miners?

Mr. GREENE. I think I have seen the list several times.

Chairman WALSH. Did you personally know the amount of the company's allowance to miners for the loss of limbs or to survivors of those who lost their lives?

Mr. GREENE. Not until I heard them read by yourself. I thought, however, it was possible to draw an unfair inference perhaps—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I wish, Mr. Greene, you would clear up any inference of that kind from your standpoint.

Mr. GREENE. I do not wish to understate in any way the responsibility of directors for the conditions of the companies which they manage. I do think, however, that in judging their accountability one must take into account what may be called the general standards of that business and of the community in that field. I think that a high-minded and progressive director would not be content with that standard, but I think he would not be wholly open to censure if in general he observed the standards of his time with regard to the industry in which he was interested.

My information is, with reference to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., that although there are many intolerable conditions which have been described here as feudal, as to which Mr. Rockefeller expressed his own disapproval, that many of those conditions have been more or less incidental to the remoteness of the region in which they occurred and the crude state of society in those remote places. I believe, in spite of those facts and the allowances made for them, that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. has, on the whole, done not less than its neighbors, and probably somewhat more in the direction of maintaining suitable conditions for its employees. I have satisfied myself of one thing, and that is as to the integrity and the good will of the leading officials of the company. I do not know enough yet of the actual conditions of the company to satisfy myself, or to have a right to speak or express any opinion as to the ability of their executive management, but I have heard the testimony here—the testimony read to the effect that, on the whole, considered by the standards of its neighborhood, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was not the least progressive, but was perhaps the most progressive of all of the companies; and that it was amenable to suggestion from the State department of labor, and that it was perhaps a leader in welfare work for its employees.

Now, I have no particular defense to make of welfare work, and certainly no defense for welfare work as a substitute for wages, but I believe it to be true and supported by evidence before this commission, that on the whole the wages paid to the employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. have been high as compared with the standards by which that matter should be judged; that, in addition to paying wages at a time when the company was practically making no money on its stock, the officers of the company have also interested themselves in the erection of hospitals, in the maintenance of schools, and the provision for medical attendance, and that all that should be counted in their favor.

I do not like any better than the members of this commission some of the feudal aspects of that work, but the alternative undoubtedly to the providing of schools of the company would be that there should be no schools at all.

Chairman WALSH. You heard the testimony of Mr. Robert Fulton Cutting with reference to the contributions which Mr. Rockefeller had made to his organization; that was private widows' compensation?

Mr. GREENE. I heard it or read a reference to it in the newspapers, but I do not know how adequate it was.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, in the light of that, do you believe that the allowances made to those widows in Colorado are a fair allowance to the family—to the wives and children—for the loss of the life of their father and husband?

Mr. GREENE. They seem to me, Mr. Chairman, very inadequate in amount, but I am not prepared to say that in paying anything at a time when the company was practically making no money, that they were not, in so far as they were paying, taking a step in advance. I am not prepared to say they were not.

Chairman WALSH. What allowances are made to widows in this city that are paid out of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GREENE. The very essence of that experiment is that there is no fixed amount. Each case is given careful investigation and the resources of each widow taken into account. If she has children beyond the school age, who can work, their wages are taken into account and the allowance is justly adapted to the need in each case. It was the possibility of discrimination in that way, which would be more difficult if legislation was adopted, which made it seem best to us for a number of years to carry on experiments in that regard.

Chairman WALSH. Might that policy not be adopted by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in the case of the death of a father or husband?

Mr. GREENE. I think, perhaps, that would be a proper field of effort, but my belief is that those problems should be worked out like the workmen's compensation act, with reference to the economic situation.

Chairman WALSH. But would you feel that the necessities of the case were quite immediate if there were a large number of men killed in an industry per year?

Mr. GREENE. It seems to me that is one of the most striking cases of where to apply the compensation act, and I am glad one is contemplated in Colorado.

Chairman WALSH. What steps have you taken since the testimony of last week, either as a director or as administrative secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation, to have a list of accidents and compensation therefor at the Colorado mines investigated?

Mr. GREENE. It has not been incumbent upon me, as secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation, during this particular period, to consider that subject.

Chairman WALSH. Did the reading of the list of the names of the dead and injured make a deep impression upon your mind, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. It did make an impression on my mind.

Chairman WALSH. Could your foundation do something in that field? Would it be within its scope, for instance, to apply even the New York proposed plan?

Mr. GREENE. I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, that the Rockefeller Foundation should take up the work in that field over against any other equally urgent field on account of the fact that it has a bond investment there, if that is what you mean.

Chairman WALSH. On account of that fact—what I mean is, and I will put it straight—that it has a bond investment and that it has a potent and actual control over the industry?

Mr. GREENE. The Rockefeller Foundation has no potent or actual control and no control whatever, and nothing to do with the industry, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I perhaps did not state that correctly. I mean on the ground that the Rockefeller interests, or that Mr. Rockefeller has the power—the potential power—and the actual control over the industry, and that he is also a trustee and his representatives are trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation, so that they have the information at one side and the means at the other, and a concrete case of, perhaps, what might call for an intervention by an agency of that sort.

Mr. GREENE. I think in general, Mr. Chairman, that the Rockefeller Foundation should consider its proper field of activity without primary or secondary references to Mr. Rockefeller's business investments among which the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. investment is but a small fraction. Moreover, I think, with reference to the situation in Colorado, that the problems there are chiefly economic rather than problems of charity—that is, the issues that have been raised by this great struggle are not issues with which, at this time, the Rockefeller Foundation is the best agency to deal, except in so far as our investigation of the general problems of industrial relations may yield material applicable either there or anywhere else to the amelioration of industrial unrest.

Chairman WALSH. If a controversy arose in any part of the world where 12,000 or 15,000 people were being subjected to strife, cold, hunger, and discomfort, would you feel that the Rockefeller Foundation should hasten to relieve that great number of people so suffering?

Mr. GREENE. I think the Rockefeller Foundation is open to appeals for emergency relief from any part of the world.

Chairman WALSH. Would the fact that there was no economic base for a war or a conflict that left the people so situated make the Rockefeller Foundation refrain from going hastily to the aid of those human beings?

Mr. GREENE. I think the Rockefeller Foundation would consider absolutely nothing but the needs on the merits of the question.

Chairman WALSH. Then, if you found, for instance, that there were great numbers—is it familiar to your mind the account of the names of the people and their injuries that were read into the record, constituting the list of 25 accidents, fatal or otherwise, in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; I remember that distinctly.

Chairman WALSH. If there was a great body of people so situated, would the fact that their injuries and suffering arose primarily from an economic base, as in Colorado, cause the Rockefeller Foundation to hesitate to go to their relief in any way that might suggest itself as being wise and humane?

Mr. GREENE. I think they would consider the question purely as a humanitarian question. If there was such a situation in Pennsylvania and North Carolina, or anywhere else, where a certain amount of suffering was going on, I should say that the Rockefeller Foundation would not consider it as its own function to replace the local agencies which might deal with such a situation.

Chairman WALSH. But if it was widespread, like it is in Belgium, growing out of the war?

Mr. GREENE. That was a question of five or six millions of people certain to starve unless something was done and done quick.

Chairman WALSH. I used that simply as an illustration. What is the number that you would consider widespread enough disaster to call for that aid?

Mr. GREENE. I could not fix the number.

Chairman WALSH. What I want to elucidate to the commission, and want you to elucidate to them, is exactly what you mean by stating that the trouble in Colorado was economic, and should be approached along those lines?

Mr. GREENE. That the problem is not a problem or question of charity. There are certain conditions there that must be remedied by legislation partly and partly by improving the relationship between employers and labor, and perhaps by a new definition of capital on the part of the workmen and a new definition of labor on the part of capital. That is the question uppermost in Colorado. Incidentally, there may be human need of an acute sort, but not in that respect much different from that which exists in localities where we do not feel called upon to intervene, because primarily that kind of intervention should be left to the local agencies, for reasons which on the whole are consistent with those that limit the functions of such a foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Greene, you have kindly sent us a complete list of gifts which have been made by the Rockefeller Foundation from May 13 to January 1, 1915.

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. This list shows that the foundation through its own members has made 19 gifts to 13 different agencies amounting to $1,834,000, and that through Mr. Rockefeller the foundation has made 56 gifts to 50, totaling $3,116,000. Is that a fair epitome?

Mr. GREENE. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly explain how this list was made up before it was sent to the commission. What part did you have in the preparation of the list and the effort made to have it compiled?

Mr. GREENE. It is extracted from the minutes. It does not include the things like the investigation of industrial relations, but consists of gifts to outside agencies. It does not include appropriations for the support of our own administration and work.

Chairman WALSH. Please distinguish the nature of the bookkeeping as applied to work done for Mr. Rockefeller as compared with work done for the Rockefeller Foundation on its own initiative; is there some distinction made in your books?

Mr. GREENE. Yes. Those gifts which Mr. Rockefeller designates or indicates to us, which we call, for convenience, "Founder's requisitions," those founder's requisitions are communicated to me by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., or his agent, and instructions are issued to the treasurer by me in the form of a duplicate of that requisition indorsed by me. Those gifts are assembled at each meeting of the Rockefeller Foundation board or of its executive committee—are reported by me as designations by the founder and are approved as coming within the corporate purposes of the board. As I have said to you, there are many things within the corporate purposes of the board which have personally appealed to Mr. Rockefeller, such as gifts to his denomination, gifts to the Baptist organizations, which the Rockefeller Foundation might not itself select, but which it has every reason to help on Mr. Rockefeller's recommendation; merely continuing gifts he has made in the past.

Chairman WALSH. Different gifts have been noted to government offices, for the New York Department of Health, the city superintendent of schools, the supervisor of the poor for Westchester County?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you see any possible embarrassment in such connection between the Rockefeller Foundation or any foundation and governmental agencies?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; I feel there is great good in such gifts, because they illustrate a function these boards can fulfill to the great advantage of the public, viz, the function of initiating certain lines of public expenditure, which, if approved, ought to be taken care of by the public, but which the public will not always initiate, because it is not sufficiently certain how the experiment would work. In that way the gift, for instance, to the department of health enabled it to establish, I think, the first public diagnostic clinic for venereal disease in the world, so far as I know, at least the first in this country. It made it possible for any person or any physician to obtain a diagnosis by means of the most approved modern methods for two years, during which time this experiment was made here in New York City. And in a year when there was universal retrenchment in the city expenses that work was regarded as being so well demonstrated, and of such great public benefit, that it effected so much for the health and happiness of the citizens, that provision for it was included in the city budget of this year.

Now, I regard that as a triumph of that particular policy of a private organization, and the same is true in the case of the schools. There has been a gift to further an experiment in the matter of the feeding of the school children, a matter in which more experience is probably necessary.

The General Education Board work is another instance where there has been an admirable result. The Federal Government never felt authorized to carry on farm demonstration work except in the States affected with boll weevil, although it was just about as badly needed in the other States, on account of some constitutional limitation; but when the General Education Board had carried on farm demonstration in all the other Southern States with great advantage to those States, Congress, this last year took over the entire cost of the farm demonstration work to our complete satisfaction.

Chairman WALSH. So that from your experience you have no doubt and no embarrassment of any kind, nor do you see any that might occur in the future from carrying on work of that kind through governmental agencies?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. On the contrary, you see some difficulty—

Mr. GREENE. That, I think, is going to be one of the great things that private foundations can accomplish, in taking the initiative.

Chairman WALSH. How much, all told, has the foundation given for that Belgian relief, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. It has given something like a million dollars. It has engagements involved in the appointment of our war relief commission, and they are taking on expenses in Europe of which we are informed from time to time, which will go beyond that somewhat; but I think at the present moment it is a little under $1,000,000—more like $950,000.

Chairman WALSH. Who made that gift, was it Mr. Rockefeller's initiative or was it made by the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. It was the intention of the foundation to go into that field, and it was voiced by every member of the board at the meeting on October 21, 1914; and the executive committee were instructed to take the matter up at once with a view to generous action. Mr. Murphy and I were made a subcommittee of the executive committee to take further action, because much had to be done, and quickly, in the way of chartering ships, etc., and what has been done subsequently has been done largely under Mr. Murphy's and my personal supervision.

Chairman WALSH. Were the Belgian gifts listed to our commission? In the questionnaire my attention has been called to the alleged fact that they are not, and I wish now to ask the reason?

Mr. GREENE. The reason is the expenditures by the foundation itself were not gifts, properly speaking. We did not send any money to Belgium, but chartered ships and bought food. I could, of course, with entire propriety—I might just as well have added that, but I took you at your word and put in the gifts to other agencies, and excluded such expenditures as Mr. Mackenzie King's work, which is not a gift, but our own work. Our relief work is not exactly a gift, but is the carrying on of humanitarian work by our staff.

Chairman WALSH. Are the dates given in your list intended to mean the dates when the appropriations were made or the dates when checks were drawn?

Mr. GREENE. Dates when appropriations were made.

Chairman WALSH. Of the 75 gifts, how many were determined upon at a full board meeting, or were they all so determined?

Mr. GREENE. That would be impossible to answer without going into every meeting; but all, of course, were determined at meetings at which a quorum was present.

Chairman WALSH. What I want to get at is whether in the actual operation of the work done it is done by the whole board of trustees or the executive committee.

Mr. GREENE. The executive committee acts with complete authority between the meetings of the board and actually determines many of the gifts; but on the more important matters—

Chairman WALSH. Oh, I see; it has been amplified a little here so I take it in fairness to you I ought to put it to you in advance.

Mr. GREENE. I see.

Chairman WALSH. Because it is more a matter of getting your attention directed to the whole subject. It seems that of 19 gifts by the foundation to 13 agencies, 5 were on dates when the board met, one when neither met, 13 when the executive committee met.

Mr. GREENE. I see.

Chairman WALSH. That is what I meant by that first question.

Mr. GREENE. It does not refer to what I may call the founder's requisitions?

Chairman WALSH. Those are the foundation's own gifts—the larger number I am going to come to next were at the direction of Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. GREENE. That is contrary to my understanding of the record.

Chairman WALSH. Well, will you look it up?

Mr. GREENE. If you will be good enough to call my attention to the specific case.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I will. Now, your written record seems to show that of 56 gifts through 49 agencies at the direction of Mr. Rockefeller, one was made on the date of the board meeting; 47 when no meeting is recorded for either the board or committee meeting. Is that according to the accepted practice of the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; those gifts for purposes obviously within the corporate objects of the foundation are made by the treasurer on my authorization and subject, of course, to repudiation by the executive committee at its next meeting; but those gifts are made by the treasurer on my authorization; that is, with the complete understanding of the board, of course.

Chairman WALSH. The foundation has been working since the middle of May, 1913, has it not?

Mr. GREENE. It can hardly be said to have been working since then, but to have been in existence since then.

Chairman WALSH. The earliest gift recorded is December 5, 1913. Did the foundation spend no money between May and December except for administration purposes?

Mr. GREENE. I have no doubt that is so. It seems to me that we should be very well justified, perhaps, in spending even a longer time in deciding what we were going to do with so large an income; I think we should have been justified in accumulating the whole income for a year, in order to go very slow in the determination of our policies.

Chairman WALSH. About how much time was spent in investigating the 13 agencies which the foundation has, of its own mind, without Mr. Rockefeller's recommendation, given money to?

Mr. GREENE. Well, I should say a great deal of time. I could not possibly measure it.

Chairman WALSH. Could you tell who did the investigating—what individuals?

Mr. GREENE. Of the applications which come to us?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREENE. I should think that Mr. Murphy and I did the most in the way of assembling the information, and passing judgment on the various representations made to us; and that Mr. Rockefeller, jr., came next.

Chairman WALSH. It has been extended beyond what I intended, and I am going to run through with some generalizations which I think you can answer very briefly, Mr. Greene, regarding large foundations in general. Under what conditions do you consider that endowed corporations might become a menace to education or to the industry and welfare of the masses?

Mr. GREENE. I think they might become a menace if they departed from the relationship which I laid down or described in my statement of yesterday; that is, by having a continuing indefinite relationship to such organizations.

Chairman WALSH. Has Mr. Rockefeller, yourself, or the trustees recognized any dangers in connection with the future foundations established by him of such moment or such immediacy, as you might call it, to call for some action upon their part?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir; we have not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that the present safeguards give adequate assurance that the various Rockefeller foundations will never become a menace?

Mr. GREENE. I hope so.

Chairman WALSH. What means have been provided by which the public would promptly know in case one of the Rockefeller foundations was being used, whether knowingly or unknowingly, against the public interest?

Mr. GREENE. All our actions nearly are public; that is, when we make a gift to an agency, usually it is published at the other end, whether we publish it at our end or not. The essential publicity of those gifts, the large number of persons who know what is going on, seems to me to constitute a safeguard.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that the size of endowments should be limited either by the State or the national law—the endowment of a foundation?

Mr. GREENE. I do not, Mr. Chairman, because I do not want to see any obstruction put on the disposition of rich men to dedicate their money to the public welfare. I think it would be a great misfortune to have anything said here or in any other connection which tended to make a rich man who was going to dedicate money to the public say: "No; that will get me in for a lot of trouble, and I will blow it in on myself." I think nothing should be done which would tend to make men of wealth less inclined to dedicate their money to the public good.

Chairman WALSH. Should foundations be required to consume their income, or be prohibited from showing an increase in capital out of income accruals for a stated period of five or ten years?

Mr. GREENE. I think the urgent things needing to be done are so much in excess of any income that that question is rather academic. If any abuse threatened in that direction, I should be entirely in favor of such limitation. It is possible the foundation might want to accumulate an income for a year or two in anticipation of some very large appropriation, but ordinarily I should consider that a wholly theoretical and academic question.

Chairman WALSH. Should the payment of foundation funds to members of governing boards be prohibited or specifically restricted in the act of incorporation?

Mr. GREENE. I think there should be a restriction to reasonable compensation for services rendered.

Chairman WALSH. Is that in the act itself?

Mr. GREENE. I do not recall exactly, but it is in our fundamental law somewhere.

Chairman WALSH. Should the legislature or Congress prescribe minimum qualifications for trustees or prescribe that qualifications be stated in the record?

Mr. GREENE. I should find it almost impossible to imagine any formal qualification which would be desirable to which legislative sanction could be given. My answer therefore would have to be in the negative.

Chairman WALSH. Should benevolent corporations be required by their incorporating acts to report both fiscal and service operations to officers of the State or national government which incorporate them, as required by such State or national officers?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How often should such reports be rendered?

Mr. GREENE. At least once a year.

Chairman WALSH. Should the records of foundations incorporated by the legislature or Congress be open to public inspection as are the records of public officers?

Mr. GREENE. I should feel doubtful on that point. I think that they should be accessible to well-qualified persons. I think they should not be public because, as Mr. Rockefeller pointed out in his testimony, unfavorable action on many applications is often taken for reasons not at all derogatory to the applicant, and it might have a very injurious effect. We are obliged constantly to decline to take up many charitable activities which merit support. And if

It was known that we declined to aid them it might be thought that that was some reflection upon them.

Chairman WALSH. Could you suggest any other limitation that you think should be placed upon—at least partial public inspection of the records of the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. No; I can not suggest any specific measure of that sort. I should be perfectly willing to have the published report made twice a year or quarterly. I think those reports should not be so frequent as to be vexatious and interfere with the work of the foundation; but anything that seemed to be a reasonable published report—reasonably frequent public report—should be made yearly, semiannually, or quarterly.

Chairman WALSH. Should trustees be expected to inform themselves as to the qualifications of their investigators?

Mr. GREENE. They certainly should.

Chairman WALSH. Would you say that an officer of one of the large foundations carries the weight of the foundation rather than his own personal weight when he participates in the local activities within the field of the foundation's program? For instance, do you think his word would carry more weight along these governmental lines that we have mentioned than that of an individual?

Mr. GREENE. I think that is a factor we must undoubtedly take into account, that he can not wholly disassociate himself. That is often a great detriment, but a member of a foundation, feeling an interest in certain matters as any other citizen is just as much entitled as any other citizen to express his opinion, though he may feel a little more hesitation on that account. But I do not think that should be any reason for inaction. As a citizen, I think he should participate actively in public affairs.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will adjourn until 2 o'clock p. m. Kindly resume the stand at that time, Mr. Greene. I think I am about through, but others may have some questions.

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in order and we will proceed.
Mr. Greene.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JEROME D. GREENE—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock says he has some questions he would like to ask.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you tell this commission, Mr. Greene, how many of the directors of the Rockefeller Foundation are interested in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. John D. Rockefeller jr., and Mr. Starr J. Murphy are now directors of that company. I was until January 1.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What control has the Rockefeller Foundation over the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. GREENE. None whatever. Did you say what interest?

Mr. WEINSTOCK. Yes; the foundation as a foundation.

Mr. GREENE. It has a bond investment in the bonds of the Colorado Industrial Co. to the amount of $1,600,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is in the nature of an investment?

Mr. GREENE. That is in the nature of an investment.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is a little over 1 per cent of its gross holdings; that is, the gross holdings of the foundation are $100,000,000?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And out of that $100,000,000 is $1,600,000 investment on the part of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. GREENE. Yes. Mr. Costigan yesterday stated that we had other interests in Colorado to the extent of about $10,000,000. Of course he was counting for Colorado, I suppose, every railroad security of a railroad that passes through Colorado, but I think that was perhaps somewhat straining the meaning of the words that our real interests there, investment interests, were something very far short of the figure Mr. Costigan named.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What power, if any, has the Rockefeller Foundation, or rather the board of directors of the Rockefeller Foundation, in controlling or guiding or directing the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. GREENE. It has no interest whatever, Mr. Weinstock. If the identity of interest in the sense that Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Murphy are members of both has any bearing on the situation, I should hope that it would mean, as to the future policies of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., if there were any effect, it would be an effect in which the general humane interest of that body of men—the foundation—was a factor. It certainly would go in that direction rather than in a contrary direction.

I can not imagine how the fact that nine-tenths of the time of those gentlemen was spent in very earnest consideration of how best to fulfill their functions as trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation would have an adverse effect on their judgment as directors of an industrial corporation. May I say one thing more, however, with reference to that point? A good deal of reference has been made to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., as if Mr. John D. Rockefeller were in business there. It is true that that is one exceptional case in which largely on account of fortuitous circumstances he had an interest to an amount which justified his standing by the property, so to speak, during a building-up period, in order to place it upon a firm financial basis. That process has been going on. There are very few instances wherein Mr. Rockefeller can be said to be in business in that sense. He has retired from business, and so far as I know it is not the intention of Mr. Rockefeller, or Mr. Rockefeller, jr., or Mr. Murphy, or any other member of the foundation, to go into business or to keep in business in the sense that has been attributed to their connection with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

I might call it almost an accidental condition. I recall only one or two companies in which Mr. Rockefeller may be said to be standing by the property, with all that that means, for its financial stability during a period when it is gradually being worked up on to a strong financial basis, and his mere standing by, I think, in some instances is a matter of tremendous value to a large body of small stockholders whose interests are thus safeguarded. But it is an accidental relation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the directorate of the Rockefeller Foundation has no control and no influence over the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., what foundation was there, then, yesterday for this statement made on the part of Mr. Costigan. I read from his testimony. He said: "The Rockefeller Foundation, if I am correctly advised, and if I understood Mr. Rockefeller correctly the other day, was incorporated in the State of New York in 1913 for the dissemination of knowledge, the prevention of suffering, and the promotion of the well-being and the civilization of the people of the United States and of the world."

"Practically within a year after this incorporation its promoters had the responsibility properly laid at their very door for a record of total failure along each of the designated lines of activity. They, or at least those most influential in the foundation, had sanctioned or permitted the spread of misinformation on matters of public importance of the first degree, the concrete enlargement of human misery, and an unmistakable lapse from just living human standards entirely at variance with our boasted civilization."

While this does not say so directly, yet it leaves the very pronounced inference that the situation in mind on the part of Mr. Costigan was the Colorado situation.

Mr. GREENE. In so far as the statement implies that the Rockefeller Foundation, a new organization, born hardly over a year ago, is a factor in the Colorado situation, it is absolutely false and unjust.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Pardon me; he goes on further to say:

"In a great human crisis, industrially speaking, precipitated within the very household of Mr. Rockefeller, his foundation has been heedless or impotent. And the conclusion forced on an unprejudiced public has been and is that Mr. Rockefeller, the business man, has cold heartedly and without hesitation brushed aside and imposed silence upon Mr. Rockefeller the philanthropist."

Mr. GREENE. I hardly care to debate that assertion, Mr. Weinstock. It was made by a gentleman who, however well informed with regard to general conditions in Colorado, was delivering here as a witness material which was the summing up of an attorney rather than the statement of a man, of facts of his own knowledge. And I should rather not be drawn into a debate as to those assertions.

In saying that the Rockefeller Foundation is not concerned with the situation, and has not been concerned with the situation in Colorado, I think I have said all that it is incumbent upon me to say.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, from your point of view there was no foundation for Mr. Costigan's statement?

Mr. GREENE. I think it was unjust, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask some questions. Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Greene, according to your statement, continuity of gifts or aid continuously given, might tend to create a spirit of subserviency on the part of the receiver?

Mr. GREENE. It seems to me so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And then you followed with the statement that in some directions you had given for a period of 10 or 15 years?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; we have made some pledges, I think, for 10 years. So far as I know, none for longer than 10 years.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I think the language used was 10 or 15 years. I only want to quote that correctly.

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, isn't the very thing that you say might be brought about by continuous performance reasonably engendered by a period of continuity of 10 years?

Mr. GREENE. I think not where the purpose of the gift, as is usually the case, is that of initiating or demonstrating a line of activity which the public has not yet fully decided to support. The purpose of the Rockefeller Foundation has not been and is not primarily to do the community's work for it. A self-respecting community, like a self-respecting individual, rather prefers to do its own work; but a community will accept the function, it seems, of such an organization as the Rockefeller Foundation in the way of experiment and demonstration.

As to local charities in the State which created the Rockefeller Foundation, a slightly different situation arises, because the foundation may be considered to be, in a sense, a citizen of that State, and to have certain obligations of citizenship to support charities and other obligations. That danger might arise under those conditions; but there is no more constantly pressing consideration in our minds than that of not creating a condition of dependence upon the foundation which will prevent the community from having the right sense of its own obligation. That sense on our part is often considered a hardship by persons who think we have plenty of money and who have difficulty in raising funds themselves, and who would much prefer to have us do the whole thing. You would be surprised, I think, at the number of times we are asked to assume the whole load, and we decline to do so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If it is the settled belief and policy of the foundation to inculcate self-respect in the community and to encourage the community to assume those burdens that are properly its own, is not the corollary of that that you should also breed it in the individual in exactly the same degree and follow a policy that is liable to go against the paternalism theory of the employer wherever you find it?

Mr. GREENE. But the Rockefeller Foundation does not make gifts to individuals.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am not speaking of gifts at all; but will not the inculcating of an independent spirit lead to an attitude which does inculcate that?

Mr. GREENE. By what means?

Commissioner GARRETSON. By every means legitimately within its power. In other words, that is the exact doctrine that men associated together in trade-unions stand for—that is, the breeding of self-respect and the assertion of right on the part of the man to certain things and not to be given to him as a dole.

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The idea is the same and the opportunity is the same.

Mr. GREENE. Yes; and in so far as that idea exists, it seems to me one which is entirely consistent with our ideas and should have our moral support.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, following up the idea of continuity of gifts and, in line with your own testimony in some respects, as to what might take place under a pernicious management at some time in the future if the foundation entered upon a steady campaign, great reference has been made to public opinion as a regulating power and as a correcting power. If they started out under the educational system with a plan of teachers' pensions and other methods recognized as legitimate, if legitimately applied, of affecting and controlling the whole corps of teachers extending from the kindergarten to the higher collegiate institution, pensions for all classes of instructors, with a steady campaign of that kind conducted for a generation, what would be the condition of public opinion at the end of that generation? Would it be a natural or an artificial public opinion fostered and created by the very influence—

Mr. GREENE. I think very likely it would be artificial; but it requires an expenditure of a sum of money compared with which the capital of the Rockefeller Foundation would be only a small fraction.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then the pernicious foundation would be limited only by the amount of money at its disposal in carrying out a propaganda of that kind?

Mr. GREENE. Assuming that it was carrying such propaganda?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE. It would certainly—the experience of pensioning agencies shows that even for higher education the resources likely to come to any one giving institution or foundation are going to be very inadequate to come anywhere near dealing with that problem. So it is an academic question, wholly outside of the range of possibility, I should say, as to any extensive use of the funds of the foundation for that purpose.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In your opinion, has there at any time been an influence of that kind exercised either on the press or the pulpit or any form of education that has had that effect?

Mr. GREENE. Influence—

Commissioner GARRETSON. Financial influences.

Mr. GREENE. So far as I have observed, none that has had any evil effect. I think there has been great pressure brought to bear to improve some of the minimum standards of school efficiency—minimum standards for admission to college—which has enormously improved education throughout the United States—not by specifying doctrines to be taught, but by holding communities up, perhaps, to a standard—a very moderate standard—and thus inciting the members of the communities affected to put a pressure on their own fellow citizens, which has resulted in a great improvement of education in the United States.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Assuming that public opinion in the United States is absolutely uninfluenced by any man, what has public opinion as evidenced either by court action or legislative enactment really accomplished in the way of creating activities, pernicious or other, according to the opinion of any great corporation on this continent—industrial corporation?

Mr. GREENE. I should say that one had only to keep his ears and eyes open and to have been a person of average intelligence living in the United States in the last 15 years to see that public opinion had had an enormous influence in changing the whole attitude of the persons who were carrying on business in this country.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has it curbed actual activities in any actual direction?

Mr. GREENE. It seems so to me.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Legislative or court?

Mr. GREENE. It seems to me so. The whole ethics of business, it seems to me, has had a great change during the last 15 years. As Mr. Elliot testified, a great many things used to be done by men who now frankly admit them, but who say they would not dream now of doing any such thing.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is ethics; but neither legislative nor court procedure.

Mr. GREENE. No; but—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting.) If the ethics have been bettered, that is one thing; but what practical result in the way of creating those activities has taken place.

Mr. GREENE. That would require a greater familiarity with the recent legislation than I have, and I am not a competent person to speak on that point. My impression, however, is very strong that desirable legislation has taken place along those lines.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, going over to another feature, have you any personal familiarity with the Lemieux Act, as it is called?

Mr. GREENE. I have read it through, I think, several times.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, its practical workings in Canadian industry—that is a Canadian industrial act.

Mr. GREENE. No; I have not studied its practical application in relation to strikes and threatened strikes as to which it has been used.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, are you aware as to whether or not it has been conformed to or has been absolutely disregarded by both interests?

Mr. GREENE. I am not aware as to the extent to which it has been followed. I am aware that it has been the means of preventing strikes which would have been disastrous to the general public on some occasions—by information. I could not tell you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you studied any as to what its effect had been in destroying the power of labor unions and paralyzing that power?

Mr. GREENE. I do not see, Mr. Garretson, how it could paralyze them in any legitimate activity, because what the act calls for is to withhold aggressive action, leading to strike or lockout, until there has been an opportunity for the public to get the facts. I do not see how anybody could complain of that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you aware of the fact that the employer has proven in scores of instances used that interval to fortify himself against the impending struggle?

Mr. GREENE. Fortify himself in what way, do you mean?

Commissioner GARRETSON. By preparing and hiring men to take the places of the men who threaten to leave his service, and other—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). I suppose those facts among others would become public, would they not?

Commissioner GARRETSON. They are notoriously public.

Mr. GREENE. That is the result that I should hope would occur.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They are notoriously public. You have never heard of them?

Mr. GREENE. I have heard of the fact that the act has not in all instances applied in the way in which it was hoped, but as a contribution to industrial peace through the greater publicity of the acts of both employers and employees, I think it is a significant contribution. I do not think anyone would deny that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Referring to publicity, what is the difference between a system of publicity that buys the space in a newspaper through paying the money for a place in its advertising columns, or using methods to influence editorial columns, or using what are called the frank, open publicity systems, provided the two were arranged for putting across exactly the same fact or misstatement of fact?

Mr. GREENE. All the difference between a deceptive or dishonest method and a frank, open, and honest method.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then a frank misstatement of the fact is desirable and a hidden method of putting out a misstatement of fact is undesirable?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; because the responsibility is fixed by the statement that it is put out by authority, is put out to be knocked down by anybody who has got the fact to knock it down with.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then the dissemination of untruth, if done openly and by a responsible person, is not subject to criticism?

Mr. GREENE. If done in good faith it is subject to criticism possibly on grounds of judgment or want of intelligence; but it is not open to criticism on the ground of honesty. The reason why the indirect method of publicity is not as desirable as the direct is that the indirect method makes use of a blind or shield and any artificial prestige which the journal, magazine, or editorial column may give in addition to the intrinsic merit of the proposition which is being supported.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then an open statement that it is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, when in fact it is only a fraction of a truth, is the proper method of presenting it?

Mr. GREENE. We are all under obligations to try to get the whole truth and state the whole truth; and any failure to take reasonable precaution to get the whole truth in a statement that purports to be the whole truth can not be too severely censured.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You referred to certain feudal characteristics in the conduct of affairs in Colorado as a necessity in a crude community. Is not what constitutes a crude community largely a matter of opinion?

Mr. GREENE. I think I did not state that perhaps. I did not make the sweeping general statement that they were a necessity in crude communities. They seem to be necessary under certain conditions of society in order to supply conveniences or facilities of education, or what not, which would otherwise not be obtained.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Why should they not be obtained in such communities?

Mr. GREENE. Presumably, they would be provided by the corporation only because they were not provided, or would not be provided, in any other way. Where that is not true it certainly would not be justifiable.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does an obligation rest upon the State to furnish certain of those?

Mr. GREENE. I think the obligation rests primarily upon the State, and it reflects upon the State that that issue should arise. Although I think there is a feeling that as the corporation is presumably getting a profit from its operations, it should, through the incidence of taxation, be paying a substantial part of the costs. But I think the State should assume the function.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But if on the other hand the corporation is evading the payment of proper taxes through influence it exerts—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). Of course—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Over the taxing powers—

Mr. GREENE. That is absolutely abhorrent to any decent man.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever made any investigation to find out whether or not the companies that perform this—that on account of this system of feudalism are evading any of those responsibilities, Mr. Greene?

Mr. GREENE. Oh, it is possible.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I say have you made any investigation?

Mr. GREENE. I have not made any investigation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would you consider that a proper thing for investigation by a director of that corporation—which you are not now?

Mr. GREENE. I should feel that it was entirely a proper subject of investigation. It is one of those things which, with the proper degree of contact between the director and the officers of the company and the property, would become a matter of knowledge to be observed—it would be observed. That state of affairs would become known, if there was the proper amount of contact.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If a director knew he could not evade the responsibility for the pernicious form of action, would it?

Mr. GREENE. The question as to his precise responsibility for it and the reasonable efforts which he should make to prevent such a state of affairs would be another question that I should not be able to pass upon without knowing the facts.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am not talking about the degree of responsibility, but there would be responsibility there?

Mr. GREENE. Certainly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Going back to this question of interlocking directors, the question of interlocking directorates has only been dealt with by the foundation in its reports from the standpoint of interlocking among the various institutions that are gathered in the general group?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Carrying it further into its ordinary meaning as applied to-day, as between an institution like the foundation and large industrial corporations, there is very little of it at present in that direction; but if it existed, if men who were in charge as directors of those large enterprises, were likewise directors of the foundation, do you believe the man whose moral sense permitted him to exploit the public in his business could dissociate himself and that that moral sense would rise up and dominate his vote in the foundation on an entirely different basis?

Mr. GREENE. I think that kind of a man would be wholly unfit to be a member of a foundation. I think that as a practical matter it is a good thing for charitable corporations to have on their boards of directors men of affairs. I should not specify that they necessarily needed to be directors of corporations, but they might frequently be such. I think that they are likely perhaps to be men of more practical vision than men whose lives are exclusively devoted to philanthropy, because I think there is always a tendency on the part of those of us who are dealing wholly with philanthropy to become perhaps a little theoretical, perhaps a little sentimental, not sufficiently practical, and that it is of advantage to have men of affairs associated with us. I think that in the case of an executive like myself, whose whole time is supposed to be devoted to the foundation, it would be a mistake for such an executive to hold exacting directorships.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you believe that a man who conducted a business on what might be termed an unmoral basis that the moral could not dominate him altogether in the other connection?

Mr. GREENE. A man of that sort I should not seek as a colleague in the Rockefeller Foundation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe from your own experience, Mr. Greene, that a man of strongly dominant character being the founder of an institution like this, that men can be associated with him in the conduct thereof without being compelled to bow to the dominancy of the individual himself, if it is asserted?

Mr. GREENE. I think it is possible. There is no use blinking the fact when a man's salary is paid from a certain source it has just this degree of significance: His tenure is dependent upon his giving satisfaction to his employer, and there are men perhaps of a type such that that would mean subservience. I happen to know that Mr. Rockefeller has no use for a man of that type whatsoever. I have never known, with the exception of President Elliot, a man with whom I have been associated who is more completely dominated by the idea of coming to his decisions by conference and consultation on the part of men who he thinks will be independent and fearless in the expression of their opinions. He does not care where a suggestion comes from. He is perfectly willing to reverse his own opinion the next minute, even if the office boy or anybody else suggests the idea, which on its intrinsic merits is better than the idea which he previously followed. That happens to be his characteristic. I think it is a most fortunate one, and, in fact, most people would not be content to be associated with a man who conducted his affairs differently.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then that very influence does reach not only from the immediate circle of those in contact with the founder, but on the application of the same principle would reach as far as the benefactions went, provided they entered in any degree into the same set of human feelings?

Mr. GREENE. There is always the possibility, it seems to me, of setting up a relationship of undue subservency. We can only guard ourselves from it by care and good judgment in the exercise of our function.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, in every criticism that has been made, first, against the existence of foundations, and, second, against the menace that they might present once you grant the premise that it might fall in the future into evil hands, your own testimony has confirmed the attitude of those who have seen the menace there if that condition did exist?

Mr. GREENE. I do not resent in the slightest degree the suggestion that there might be a menace. Foundations of this type are rather new, although endowments are not new, and any public-spirited citizen is entitled to the full expression of his views on the subject, and the suggestion that they might be a menace a priori by no means ought to be dismissed in an off-hand way; I should think that that question was one in which nobody could be more interested than we are, because, after all, we are limited by the tenure of our lives, and we have some interest in the carrying on of the foundation into the future.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Just one more question, and this is of a practical nature. I do not know whether you will care to express an opinion upon it or not. I do not know whether your investigations have ever taught you anything of the attitude of the lower official strata in an industrial corporation; that is, the bosses who come directly in contact with the men. Have you ever had occasion to notice how thoroughly that class of officials, the miners, reflect the attitude and opinion of the head of the industry?

Mr. GREENE. I think they often do reflect the attitude and opinion of that head. I think sometimes also they fail to reflect it, and that men coming up from the laboring class into positions of responsibility for which they are not accustomed are often more likely to be martinets to the men under them than the owners of the property would have any idea of.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There is no doubt. I think that is true. What I desire to bring out more fully is this: Your idea is exactly that that was embodied in the old slaveholding theory, that a negro made a worse taskmaster?

Mr. GREENE. I wouldn't say that as a general reflection on such men, because I have been told, on what I think is good authority, that that is a danger which has been kept in view in the corporation with which I am connected, with which I have been connected.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, speaking of this phase of it, that there is an immense power lies for either good or evil in the full expressed attitude of the head of a corporation as reflected by the downstairs boss?

Mr. GREENE. I think so. I think it is apparent in everything. It is apparent in the public-service corporations, where an attitude of indifference to the welfare of the public is expressed right away by the behavior of the lowest employee in his contact with the public, and if the head of the company is attentive to the public interest and is himself courteous and open in his relations you see at once a difference in every rank of employee in relation to the public.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, if for any reason the head of the corporation, the executive head, had seen fit to change his opinion in regard to certain matters in the conduct as to what he considered desirable in the conduct of a business affecting the personal relation, no greater agency for its successful carrying out could be utilized than the full operation of that change to that class of men?

Mr. GREENE. I think that all of us, if we, to use the expression that you used yourself the other day, "grow in grace," we shall probably exercise a better influence upon such organization as we happen to be connected with, and that any improvement or change such as you suggest would tend to be reflected in the conduct of the business.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In that case open confession would not only be good for the soul, but would be good for the other fellow's body?

Mr. GREENE. I should think it would be good for everybody.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. How often do you see Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. GREENE. Very rarely.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that Mr. Gates, who formerly had charge of these activities, did not see him for eight years at one time?

Mr. GREENE. I do not know whether it is true or not. That surprises me.

Chairman WALSH. Have you heard that statement made?

Mr. GREENE. Have I heard that statement made?

Chairman WALSH. Have you heard it made before?

Mr. GREENE. I think not.

Chairman WALSH. You say very rarely. I would like you to state just about how frequently do you see him. Do you see him as much as once a week?

Mr. GREENE. I think I have seen Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., twice in the last five years.

Chairman WALSH. Twice in the last five years?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What period of time—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). And never at a meeting of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Never at a meeting of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GREENE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Well, where do you gather this view that you have just given of Mr. Rockefeller, sr.? Was it prior to five years ago, or during those two visits, or through some one else, or how?

Mr. GREENE. It was through the policies of his associates, which I knew to be policies in which—in the making of which he had had a very important part. Of course, largely through my intimate association with Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr. But it was to that extent secondhand acquaintance. It has been confirmed by a visit of some weeks with Mr. Rockefeller last year, in which I had a good opportunity to verify my impression.

Chairman WALSH. Your statement about accepting suggestions that grew out of a conference with the office boy is a mere statement of what other persons connected with him or tradition, as it were, of his life?

Mr. GREENE. My statement had reference to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr. I have no right to extend it to Mr. Rockefeller, sr.

Chairman WALSH. How often has Mr. Ivy Lee seen John D. Rockefeller, sr., if you know?

Mr. GREENE. I do not happen to know, but I think probably two or three times.

Chairman WALSH. He has seen him, though?

Mr. GREENE. I think it has been testified to here.

Chairman WALSH. How about Mr. Starr J. Murphy; how often does he see Mr. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Murphy is Mr. Rockefeller's personal counsel, and has frequently been in conference with him, but how often I could not say. But I should suppose many times a year.

Chairman WALSH. You are on the personal staff of John D. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. GREENE. I was.

Chairman WALSH. And the duties of the staff were to advise Mr. Rockefeller about investments? How did you advise with him?

Mr. GREENE. With the committee, as he called it, we formulated our recommendation.

Chairman WALSH. In writing?

Mr. GREENE. Often in writing and often transmitted through Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., for him to pass upon.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. Mackenzie King, how often has he seen Mr. Rockefeller, more than once, Mr. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. GREENE. I do not know, sir. I think he has seen him once. I am not sure whether he has seen him twice or not.

Chairman WALSH. The reason I asked you about Mr. Gates was that it had been stated to one of our investigators—and I want you to know that—

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is the reason I asked you the question.

Mr. GREENE. It is quite possible.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Gates stated himself, while he was the personal adviser of John D. Rockefeller, sr., attending to those various activities, that he had not seen him for eight years at one period.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Rockefeller, sr., has been in retirement from active participation in business for about 15 years. I think it is about 15 years, and it is quite possible that during those 15 years eight years elapsed during which Mr. Gates's communications were made wholly in writing or through the medium of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr. That is quite conceivable. May I make one other statement, very briefly?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. If you will kindly hold it over until I ask you a few questions, then you may make it.

Mr. GREENE. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever conducted any investigation along any of the lines planned by the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. No.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever supervised any?

Mr. GREENE. May I follow that by saying—

Chairman WALSH. Certainly; make any explanation you desire.

Mr. GREENE. The Rockefeller Foundation has not planned many things yet. It has planned this investigation in industrial relations.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). I have never made a study of industrial relations.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever supervised any such investigation as is planned by the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. GREENE. I have not supervised such investigation, but I have had experience in university administration, in which one is brought in contact with men who are qualified investigators, and it gives a certain amount of experience in forming opinions of men, their methods of work, and certain scientific standards which apply generally.

Chairman WALSH. That leads to another question. Will you briefly state now what part of your past experience you consider has particularly fitted you to direct the many lines of activity planned by the Rockefeller Foundation? Give the character of the work that has preceded this work.

Mr. GREENE. I would rather have that question answered by those who are responsible for my appointment, Mr. Chairman. I do not claim any special qualification for this work. If I have any, I presume it is derived largely from my experience in university administration, and the administration of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

Chairman WALSH. Well, briefly and as concisely as possible, of what did your university investigation consist, or, for instance, that might equip you to supervise the investigation of industrial relations of the country and the world?

Mr. GREENE. Intimate association with men of that type in the Harvard faculty, with every one of whom I was intimately acquainted, and with general lines of work. But I do not pretend to be an expert in that or in any other line of special investigation. I do not think it is necessary. I do not think it follows that the executive of a charity like this or of a university needs to be an expert in the various branches of inquiry carried out. The president of the university can not be an expert chemist, an expert sociologist, and an expert lawyer, but he may be very competent to form an opinion as to men in all those fields of activity.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please furnish the commission with a transcript of any resolution or memoranda or other data which exists in regard to the increase in membership of the trustees of the foundation?

Mr. GREENE. There are no such resolutions or memoranda with regard to the increase. There are resolutions appointing or electing President Elliot and Mr. Hepburn and those I gave to the agent of the commission day before yesterday I think.

Chairman WALSH. You have given us all of that that you have?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you a couple of questions, which I will. We have the practice of allowing a few questions to be asked. Some gentleman wants to know this:

Is there no possibility for a great nation such as this to provide itself with all of the institutions which are of vital necessity to its life, without having them bestowed by the good will of an individual?

Mr. GREENE. The resources of this country would undoubtedly be sufficient, but I think that most people would agree, without lacking in any deference to the independence and patriotism of our legislators that in the field of activity in which we are engaged, private institutions have a certain advantage, particularly in the way of initiation.

Chairman WALSH. You stated this morning—

Mr. GREENE (interrupting). They are all equally in the control of the people. It was a disappointment to me when I had charge of the Rockefeller Foundation charter bill in Congress, that it did not pass there, because it seemed to me that it was nothing more or less than creating a trusteeship or receivership for the benefit of the American people, that no matter what the person's opinions were with regard to the money in question, here was an opportunity to see that fortune, or a substantial part of it, put it in trust for the American people.

Chairman WALSH. What work have you, any of your foundations or boards, initiated that have not in some respects been carried on before?

Mr. GREENE. I think it would be impossible to name anything probably that had not been done before in this world. There was the institution for medical research. There are but few in Europe, and none of them now in Europe actually endowed as the Rockefeller Institute. The hookworm work had elements of novelty in it, of course, but whether it was unprecedented or not I should not be able to say.

Chairman WALSH. You stated this morning that you do not think it necessary to have reports of foundations open to general public inspection. That is, you would extend the privilege of inspection to those who might be particularly interested or for some reason. Is that a fair statement? This is handed to me by some one else.

Mr. GREENE. I should not wish to have anything concealed. It would not be to the interest of the foundation that any of its doings, it seems to me, be withheld from the public. Of course, there are matters under discussion, half formulated schemes, the pros and cons of which are being urged, and the publication of which prematurely might prejudice the end in view. But when the thing is done and becomes a matter of record, money appropriated, there is nothing, it seems to me that ought not to be known, and if it were thought best to permit some representative of the public interest to inspect the minutes, there certainly should not be anything in the minutes that we should object to having inspected in that way.

Chairman WALSH. This is followed by the question: Suppose the foundation knowingly or otherwise did something against the interest of the people, how can the people, the ordinary man, get this information if you would not allow the complete public inspection of the foundation's work?

Mr. GREENE. By the condition or terms of that very question if it is a matter of such serious import I fancy it would be known.

Chairman WALSH. If there is anything that you wish to submit that you have not been asked in amplification or explanation of your testimony, we will be glad to have you do so.

Mr. GREENE. There is just one thing I should like to mention, because on two or three occasions I have heard reference made to the bird refuge in Louisiana bought by the Rockefeller Foundation.

I imagine that that has appeared to some people perhaps as the setting up of an aviary for somebody's amusement, or to take care of birds for considerations merely of humanity. I am not saying that that would not be an adequate motive. I think it could not be justified, however, on grounds of great urgency.

The reason the Rockefeller Foundation paid $225,000 for a large tract of land—I have forgotten how many acres, 85,000 acres I think—in Louisiana was that one of the most serious dangers which is now threatening American agriculture is its total blight, now in one region and now in another, by insects, and the enemy of the insects, and the protector of our agriculture of our farmer is the insectivorous birds. These birds have certain migration, seasons of migration, and at certain times of the year they congregate in some parts of our country, and the pothunter can go in there and slaughter them by the million, for food or for sport, or plumage or what not. It takes them when they are defenseless, when they are there in enormous numbers and threatens to obliterate the whole species, as whole species have been thus obliterated, unless some one, a public-spirited man, something such as the Russell Sage Foundation, which has bought Marsh Island, in the same region and as McIlhenny which dedicated another tract in the same region to the same work, unless the American public follows the example and has a reservation elsewhere there is great danger that will threaten the agriculture of our country.

We have only to look at the object lesson in Jamaica where vegetation was blighted because the equilibrium was destroyed through the importation of the mongoose which destroyed the birds, which was finally itself destroyed, and the birds being destroyed, insects came in and blighted the whole thing, and then finally the parasite attacked the mongoose, he was removed; the birds came back and vegetation returned. That has had a very graphic illustration in Germany where the landowner was saved during a blight, he had set apart a large area for the birds to take refuge on his land. That is one example. There is nothing sentimental, I think, about that, because it was just good business.

Chairman WALSH. Is this place where the land was selected a place in which there is a seasonal, a natural refuge for birds?

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. If you will, briefly, tell us what sort of birds usually are there.

Mr. GREENE. Our interest in it was chiefly to get the insectivorous birds. I presume they are the kind of birds usually used for food and sport.

Chairman WALSH. Where did the request come from?

Mr. GREENE. That consideration alone would not have interested us.

Chairman WALSH. Where did the request come from?

Mr. GREENE. The chief promoter of this preserve, Mr. McIlhenny, of Louisiana.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. McIlhenny, of the Civil Service Board—National Civil Service Board?

Mr. GREENE. It may be a brother. I do not know, but it is not that one.

Chairman WALSH. What is his viewpoint? What is his motive, if you know?

Mr. GREENE. I think the motive—

Chairman WALSH. Is it that of a sportsman, or in regard to the insects?

Mr. GREENE. I think his motive is the love of birds and appreciation of this agricultural interest.

Chairman WALSH. I believe that is all. You may be finally excused. Thank you, Mr. Greene.

Mrs. Dominiske.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. MARGARET DOMINISKE.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Margaret.

Chairman WALSH. Margaret Dominiske?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you born?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. In Newcastle, England.

Chairman WALSH. Newcastle, England?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been living in the United States?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Twenty-six years.

Chairman WALSH. How long?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Twenty-six years.

Chairman WALSH. Twenty-six years. Are you married or single?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I am married.

Chairman WALSH. Is your husband a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where was Mr. Dominiske born?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. In Tioga County, Pa.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any children?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I have three.

Chairman WALSH. What are their ages?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Ten, eight, and six.

Chairman WALSH. When did you move to Colorado and where have you lived there, please?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. We moved to Colorado about 17 years ago, and I lived in Erie, Lafayette, Tollerburg, and Ludlow.

Chairman WALSH. Ludlow. Where are those places located, please, Mrs. Dominiske, with reference to the northern or the southern coal field? Lafayette, as I remember, it is in the northern coal field.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Lafayette and Erie are in the northern field.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. And Tollerburg and Ludlow are in the southern field.

Chairman WALSH. What has been your husband's business?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. He is a coal miner.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been married?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Eleven years.

Chairman WALSH. Eleven years?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What kind of churches are to be found in the coal fields of southern Colorado?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I never saw one only in Trinidad.

Chairman WALSH. How is that?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I never saw any one only in Trinidad.

Chairman WALSH. In Trinidad. Are there any halls in these camps for the people to meet in?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know why not?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Are there any saloons?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Lots of saloons.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever trade at the company's stores in those towns in which you lived in Colorado?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How do the prices in those stores compare, would you say, from your everyday standpoint as a housekeeper, with those stores in the little towns nearby?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Why, they were quite a bit higher in the camps.

Chairman WALSH. How did you come to observe that, Mrs. Dominiske? How did you come to know they were higher in the camps?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, whenever I got a chance I would go to these other stores and buy, and then you could see the difference.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever know of anybody having trouble because of not trading in the company's stores?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, a friend of mine told me when she lived in Terco, Colo., that the prices were so high in the company's stores that they could not buy there, and they used to go and take their trunks to Trinidad and get what they wanted and ship them back. But on one occasion one of the men was caught, and he was fired, lost his job; and after that they were not allowed to take their trunks any more unless they were going to stay or on a long visit.

Chairman WALSH. Why did you trade in the company's stores when you could get stuff cheaper at the towns nearby?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. We was not allowed to go to those other places. I knew my husband would be discharged if it was found out.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, why do you say that, Mrs. Dominiske? Was it anything except suspicions, or a thought, or had anything been said to you about it?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. The people that were in these coal camps before I went there told me.

Chairman WALSH. So that was the thought of the coal camp?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That you had to trade there?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever gone to the expense of trying to determine what difference it made in your husband's wages trading under those circumstances in the camp as compared with what you might do if you could get out and buy where you could get cheaper?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I don't understand your question.

Chairman WALSH. The point is—maybe it is too involved—Mrs. Dominiske, did you ever try to determine how much of a difference that made in your husband's real wages; that is, the increased amount that you had to pay for provisions in the coal camps? I will try to put it plainer. About how much higher would you say that the provisions in the camps were over what they were in the little towns nearby?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I couldn't say how much higher, but they were quite a bit higher. I do not know just how much.

Chairman WALSH. Is that generally known among the women keeping house in those camps?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you remember what took place the day before and on April 20? Where did you live on April 20, 1914?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Ludlow tent colony.

Chairman WALSH. In the tent colony?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was your husband in the colony with you?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you remember what took place the day before and on April 20, 1914?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes, sir. A ball game the day before.

Chairman WALSH. A ball game?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes; on Sunday.

Chairman WALSH. You heard read here, I believe, by the commission, and you have probably seen it in our records before, or read it, a so-called publication that was made, signed by Mr. Lawson and many others, and entitled "A call to arms"? You saw that, did you?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And that was issued on April 20, 1914, according to its purport. Now, do you remember what took place the day before and on April 20, 1914? Just describe the happening at Ludlow on those two days as concisely as you can in your own way.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. On April 19 there was a ball game, and all the people from the tent colony was over there watching the ball game.

Chairman WALSH. How many people were in the tent colony?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Oh, I don't know how many, but I should judge maybe five or six hundred.

Chairman WALSH. Women and children living there in the tents?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That was after the strike?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The miners bought or leased a tract of land and put up tents, and you were all living there, Mrs. Dominiske?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. We were over at this ball game, and four militiamen, one on horseback and three afoot, and the ones on foot had rifles with them, and they had them pointed toward the men that were playing ball. And one of the men in there said: "You can watch this ball game, but it does not need any guarding." And one of the ladies that was there said in a joking way that if they would take some B. B. guns and start after those militia that they would take those guns and run for their lives. He said: "Go ahead, have your good time to-day, and to-morrow we will get your roast."

Chairman WALSH. Get your what?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Roast. The ball game was over, and we went on home, and didn't think no more about it till next day.

Chairman WALSH. What occurred on April 20?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. About 10 o'clock next morning we were late getting up that morning, later than usual; it was about 8.30, I guess, when my husband went up to the office tent. And I had let the children sleep late on account of their being up late the night before, and I had thought I would wash and put on my wash water, and I went up to Mrs. Jolly's to get some postal cards I was going to send away from our Easter, and I went up there to get the cards, and while I was up there somebody came and said that the militia was out there and wanted to see Mr. Tikas.

Chairman WALSH. Who is Mr. Tikas?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. He was the Greek leader.

Chairman WALSH. What kind of a man was he personally?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, he was an awful quiet man.

Chairman WALSH. And as to disposition, was he a kind man?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. With reference—

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, he was an awful kind man and everybody liked him.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. And when he went out to talk to this militia—

Chairman WALSH. Now, please speak a little louder, Mrs. Dominiske. I know you are not accustomed to speaking, but you will have to lift your voice so that it will carry farther.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. When he went out to see this militia, Mrs. Jolly and I went with him, and they handed him a piece of paper with a name on it and told him they wanted that man, and Tikas asked him who gave them authority to come after him—did he get it from the militia or civil authorities, and they said they got it from the military authorities. And he said that the military authorities was at Las Animas and Huerfano County now. And they told him to produce that man in half an hour or they would search the camp and take him, and he told them that he could not produce the man because the man did not live there, and he was not in the camp. And so we came on back over to Mrs. Jolly's house. And we had just got in there—was in there a few minutes—I don't know how long—when they came and telephoned for Louis Tikas and said that Mr. Hamrock wanted Tikas to go over to the military camp.

Chairman WALSH. Who was Mr. Hamrock; was he a soldier?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes; he was one of the militia.

Chairman WALSH. Maj. Hancock, of the militia?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes; I believe he was in charge of the militia.

Chairman WALSH. He was some sort of an officer?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. He was an officer, yes; and Tikas told him he would meet him half way. Tikas went, but Maj. Hamrock did not come, so Tikas came on back. He had only been over to the house, to the tents a few minutes when he got another phone to go up to the depot, Maj. Hamrock wanted to see him at the depot, the Colorado Southern depot. So he went up. And then I went on down home. And I heard some singing and music and I looked out the end of my tent, and I had a window in it, and I went and looked out and it was the Greeks celebrating their Easter Monday. They were singing and dancing and playing music.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of music?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. They had mandolin and a violin and a flute, I think. While I was standing there, there came a lady by and she told me, she said "You better get out, the militia are coming." I said I didn't care; let them come. They have been here before and they won't hurt us.

She went and a few minutes after she left there was a bomb fired. I went out and looked up toward the trucks to where the military camp was and I could see the smoke; I saw the men going, that is, these militiamen going on horseback over toward Water Tank Hill, what we call it. Then in a few minutes there was another bomb fired. So the lady that lived next door to me said "I am going over to the pump station and get over there out of this; I think there is going to be something doing." I asked her if she would take my children over, that I wanted to see my husband before I went. So she took my children and went to Water Tank Hill—to the pump station; and I went up to where my husband was. We saw Tikas coming running over from the depot and he had a handkerchief in each hand, waving a handkerchief, and he said something to us, but we didn't hear what he said. When he got near enough to us he called to us to get back, to go up to Water Tank Hill. And so then there was another bomb fired, and I ran over to the pump station. After we got over there, there was, oh, several, I don't know how many—maybe 15 or 16 women and children standing on top of this well looking around, when they started to fire at us. And so then we got down the well as quick as we could.

Chairman WALSH. How many went down into the well?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Oh, I don't know, maybe there was 60 or 85 in there, counting the women and children and all.

Chairman WALSH. It is a great large well which contains the water that is used to put in the tank for the railroad?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes. The boy that was left in charge of the pump house came, and he told us, "If you don't want to get shot you better go to that barn." So we ran to the barn, two of my children had got in the well, and I took the youngest one to the barn, and about half past 2 one of the children, the little girl, got up out of the well and came over to where I was, and the men—that is, the militia—shot at her. And they had just quit shooting when the little boy came, and they shot at him and the bullet whizzed right through the top of the barn where we were. It was banked up and we were all laying down. About 3 o'clock was when they started to shoot so awfully hard. And about a quarter to 6 one of the men from the arroyo came up to where we were.

Chairman WALSH. What is that arroyo?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. It is a ditch back of this barn. And he came up where we were and he said we had better get out of here because he said there is about 50 militia right close to the camp and he said they are burning up the tents and if you crawl out here you can see it. So I crawled out, and I looked down and I saw about six or eight tents burning. And then I saw five militiamen cross from the tents that was burning over to those that was not burning, and three of them had torches and two had cans. I don't know what was in the cans, but I think it was oil. They went into one of these other tents, and I got back into where my children were. Pretty soon some said it looks like there is a train coming, and maybe we had better get out under the cover of this train, that that will be our only chance of escape. So I went and crawled back out and looked out again to the tents and I saw the militia going into them, they was all on fire, so I judge from that they had set it on fire, and when this train came—

Chairman WALSH. You say that they had torches and that they were lighted?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, it looked like a broom to me; that is what it looked like from where I was at, looked like they were brooms lit. Then when the train came, why, we all got out of the well and out of the barn and went to the arroyo. And on the way there as she stooped to get under the fence, one of the ladies had a big apron on, and she stoops to get under the fence and there was a bullet passed right through her apron and another passed over my head and exploded. It was an explosive bullet and exploded in front of another lady, and she had a baby in her arms, and she fainted. We got into the arroyo and we went down to a ranch about 5 or 6 miles from Ludlow. Next day we went to Trinidad.

Chairman WALSH. The next day you went to Trinidad?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many people lost their lives at Ludlow on April 20, 1914?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. There were 12 children and 2 women and 5 men, I think.

Chairman WALSH. Who were those people and what positions, if any, did they hold among the striking miners?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Tikas was a Greek, and he was a Greek leader. Fyler was the secretary of the local.

Chairman WALSH. What local, the miners' local union?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes; in Ludlow.

Chairman WALSH. How many of his family were at Ludlow on that day—Mr. Fyler's family?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. There were two boys and three girls, and one of them a married daughter with a child.

Chairman WALSH. Did you spend part of the day with any of them?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes; I was.

Chairman WALSH. Did you later identify any of the dead?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. When and where?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. In Trinidad, at the undertaking parlors.

Chairman WALSH. Had you ever seen this cellar in which the women and children lost their lives?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe what kind of a cellar it was, whether it had been used as a room or a place to sleep, or what was it?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. It was a cellar; it was all timbered up and finished nice and was used as a bedroom, and it had a bed in it when I saw it.

Chairman WALSH. Was it used for any particular purpose among the people there?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I think it was.

Chairman WALSH. Had children been born there?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Children were born in there.

Chairman WALSH. It was a place where they took women?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. So that they could be kept away from any noise in case of any trouble, away from being disturbed?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I think it was.

Chairman WALSH. Was the cellar timbered and did it have steps?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. When did you see the cellar after the colony was destroyed?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. About a week after.

Chairman WALSH. Describe the cellar as it then appeared.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well it was all smoky on the inside and it was right after a rainstorm, and it had quite a bit of water in it, and we did not get to go right in the inside of it.

Chairman WALSH. What day did you identify the bodies; was that on the 21st or the 22d?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Twenty-first.

Chairman WALSH. The 21st?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. The day after.

Chairman WALSH. This occurred on—the deaths occurred on the 20th.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. The 20th.

Chairman WALSH. And you identified them on the 21st?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No; it was on the 22d.

Chairman WALSH. On the 22d?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes; two days later.

Chairman WALSH. Did you advise Mr. Lawson and these other men who signed that call of what you testified before the commission here substantially? Did you tell your story to the mine leaders of the mine workers?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I told it to some of them.

Chairman WALSH. You told it to some of them?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Upon the 22d instant when the so-called call to arms was issued?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did you see the fire when it started, Mrs. Dominiske?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No; I did not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not know—how do you know how it started?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No; I do not know.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did you see the members of the militia in the tent colony immediately before the fire started?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. The first I saw of them is when this man told me that if I looked out I could see the tent burning.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Then you saw the militia?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I saw the militia in the tent colony then.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not know whether the militia came there before or after the fire started?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No; I do not, I am sure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, did you hear from anybody how the fire did start?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No; I do not believe I did, but one of the—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of your own knowledge?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Not of my own knowledge.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not know how the fire started?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At what time did the women and children and men begin to leave the tent camp?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. In the morning, you mean?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; in the morning.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Right after the bomb was fired.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That was about—do you remember about what time that was?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Close to 10 o'clock, if not at 10.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They began to leave at that time?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many left?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, I guess everybody left that could get out. They started the machine gun as soon as the last bomb was fired. They started to firing the machine gun and everybody tried to get out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many children and women, so far as you can judge left the camp on that morning?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, I don't know.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would there be as many as a hundred?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, I do not know; I couldn't say about that at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many women and children in the camp altogether?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. I do not know that either. There was quite a few.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They started to scatter right at that time?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. When did the fire happen, about what time?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Close to 6 o'clock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Was it after dark?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. It was just getting dusk.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner LENNON. I would like to ask you to describe the water tank for fear the people would not just comprehend what it is, and how 50 or 70 people could get into the well, and how they supported themselves.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Well, this is it.

Commissioner LENNON. Just describe it so that the people may understand.

Mrs. DOMINISKE. It is an awful big well; it had three landings.

Commissioner LENNON. Running around the inside?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes; it had three landings.

Commissioner LENNON. A well 18 or 20 feet across, was it not?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Oh, yes; I guess it was; it was an awful big well. I do not know just how big.

Commissioner LENNON. There were steps going down from one landing to the other?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. And the people stood on the landing?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Is that all underground?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. I understood you to say that you sent your children up to the well, but you did not go first because you wanted to see your husband?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. Where was your husband?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. He was up to the office tent.

Commissioner BALLARD. What was he doing there?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. It was Saturday—was their pay day also—and on Monday they always check up and counted their checks and he had went up there to check up with Mr. Fyler.

Commissioner BALLARD. How long were you in the tent colony—how long did you live in the tent colony?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Since September, 1913.

Commissioner BALLARD. You were there some months?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. Who paid your expenses while you were there?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. The union.

Commissioner BALLARD. Who is paying your expenses now?

Mrs. DOMINISKE. The union.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. You are excused.

Mrs. Petrucci.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. MARY PETRUCCI

Chairman WALSH. What is your full name?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Mary Petrucci.

Chairman WALSH. Mary Petrucci?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How old are you, Mrs. Petrucci?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Twenty-four.

Chairman WALSH. Twenty-four?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live now?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Ludlow.

Chairman WALSH. Ludlow, Colo.?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is your ancestry; your father and mother were natives of what country?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Italy.

Chairman WALSH. You are of Italian descent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you born?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In Hastings, Colo.

Chairman WALSH. What is Hastings, Colo.—is that a coal-mining camp?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. It is a mining camp.

Chairman WALSH. About how many people are there in Hastings?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I could not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a married woman?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is your husband a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not your father was a citizen of the United States?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. He was.

Chairman WALSH. You are a native born Coloradan?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you go to school, Mrs. Petrucci?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In Hastings.

Chairman WALSH. In the mining camp?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You were raised in Hastings, were you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When did you leave there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. When I was 13 years old.

Chairman WALSH. At what age were you married?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Sixteen.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you say you lived now?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. At Ludlow, Colo.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask you, if you will, to give a little brief description of your life, when you lived in Hastings; that was a mining camp of what company?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I think of the Victor-American Fuel Co.

Chairman WALSH. Was your father a miner there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you live in a company house?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a school in the camp to which you went?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you go to school at any place outside of Hastings?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Not when I lived in Hastings.

Chairman WALSH. Were there any church facilities in Hastings?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. None at all?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. None.

Chairman WALSH. You had had some religious training, your ancestry were religious people, were they not?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What faith did they profess?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. They were Catholics.

Chairman WALSH. After you left Hastings where did you go then?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I went to Tabasco and Berwind.

Chairman WALSH. Are both of those mining camps?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir; they belong to the C. F. & I.

Chairman WALSH. They belong to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What age did you leave Hastings?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. When I was 13 years old.

Chairman WALSH. What was the first place you went to?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Starkville.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you when you were married?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In Ramey.

Chairman WALSH. Was Mr. Petrucci a miner when you lived there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; he was running a box-car loader.

Chairman WALSH. For the railroad company?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; for the mining company.

Chairman WALSH. You married him at what place?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In Walsenburg.

Chairman WALSH. That is a mining town, is it?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I suppose so.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you living at the time you married him?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In Ramey.

Chairman WALSH. Is that a mining camp?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You simply went to Walsenburg to be married?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. After your marriage where did you live—in what mining camp, in Ramey?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In Ramey.

Chairman WALSH. The Ludlow mine called Ramey?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you live in Ludlow before April 20, 1914?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Since January.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you live prior to that time?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In January?

Chairman WALSH. Before January?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I lived in a house on a ranch. It was leased by my husband and this other man.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you when the strike was called?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In Ramey.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. Petrucci was working for a mining company, was he?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; he was out on strike.

Chairman WALSH. He went out on strike, did he?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of weather was it when he went out on strike?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I could not tell you; it was in September.

Chairman WALSH. Now, when you went out on strike where did you go? Where did the miners and their families go?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In the tent colony.

Chairman WALSH. In Ludlow?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. About how many folks were in the camp when you went to the tent colony.

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I could not tell you how many.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a large number?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were there 1,000 people, men, women, and children, or 500, or what?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I suppose about 600 or 700.

Chairman WALSH. And they had tents there side by side, did they, with streets running down between them?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And did they start a little organization there and have some leader that exercised some authority about keeping order and things like that?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who were the different leaders of the Ludlow colony?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Louis Tikas and Mr. Fyler.

Chairman WALSH. Louis Tikas and Mr. Fyler?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How did the people in that camp get along together? Was there disorder and fights or anything like that?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What were your relations to each other while you were in the camp? I am trying to put it into everyday terms. Were you happy there and friendly with each other, and did you visit back and forth?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir; we had a good time.

Chairman WALSH. How did you like it in comparison with the coal camp?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I liked it better in the tent colony.

Chairman WALSH. You would rather live there in the tent colony all the year around, would you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you living when the strike of September, 1913, began in Colorado?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I was living at Berwind.

Chairman WALSH. At Berwind.

Mrs. PETRUCCI. In 1913?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mrs. PETRUCCI. At Ramey then.

Chairman WALSH. Stating it briefly, did you have some unpleasant experience with the militia in speaking to you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes; they came up there and insulted us every day until we had to move down so we would not be insulted.

Chairman WALSH. Did you stay at Ludlow until the colony was destroyed in April, 1914?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was that the day after the Greek Easter Sunday?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who brought you to this meeting, Mrs. Petrucci?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Mr. Lawson.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. John R. Lawson?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was that the day after the Greek Easter Sunday, that the occurrence at Ludlow took place?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What did the members of the colony do on the Greek Easter?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. They were just having a good time.

Chairman WALSH. What did they do? I think the lady who preceded you stated that they had a ball game or something?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Oh, yes; on Sunday.

Chairman WALSH. Did the crowd turn out to the ball game?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. During the winter following the strike in September, was there any severe or cold weather?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How did you find it in the tent colony?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. It was pretty warm; we had coal and everything.

Chairman WALSH. And your conditions were comfortable?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You did not suffer in that way?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you visit back and forth with the others there in the camp?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What time of day did you leave your camp?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. When?

Chairman WALSH. On April 20?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I didn't leave my tent at all.

Chairman WALSH. You are the lady, I believe, who lost the four children?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was the basement in which these lives were lost under your own tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When and how did you get to that place?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Well, in the evening when the fire started I came out of my tent; it was all on fire, and I came out of my tent, and as I was coming out of my tent under that tank there was a lot of militiamen, and I was running out and hollering with my three children, and they hollered at me to get out of the way and they were shooting at me and I ran into this place.

Chairman WALSH. It was three children you had?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You ran into this place where that basement was?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What had that basement been used for—to take care of ladies during confinement in the camp?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And they were kept away from the noise and any disturbances that might take place?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did anyone see you and your children leave the tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What did anyone say or do when you and your children left the tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. These were the guards that saw me. As I was coming out of my tent they were hollering at me to look out, and shooting after me, and that scared me, and I went into the cave.

Chairman WALSH. How far were the guards from you when they hollered at you and shot at you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. About 25 yards from my tent.

Chairman WALSH. They could see you plainly and you could see them?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Into what tent did you and your children run in connection with the other tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Right at the back of mine. My tent was No. 1 and this was No. 58, right on the back of my tent.

Chairman WALSH. When you went in there was it your intention to take the children into the cellar of that tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir; for protection.

Chairman WALSH. How did you get into the cellar of that tent? Was there boards over the cellar?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. There was boards, but there was steps to go down.

Chairman WALSH. Was the door open or shut when you reached the tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Open.

Chairman WALSH. Was it left open or shut after you went down?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Left open.

Chairman WALSH. If it came to be closed, did you ever know how it came to be closed?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where were the steps into the cellar of the tent into which you went, after you left your tent? Where were the steps in this tent you ran to for protection?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. They was dug in the earth.

Chairman WALSH. Just earth steps?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where were they with reference to the front or back of the tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. They were just like this [indicating], right in front of me. Chairman WALSH. After you walked right in there you could go down the steps into this basement room?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How deep was the room under the surface of the earth? Mrs. PETRUCCI. I think about 6 feet.

Chairman WALSH. How many people were in the cellar when you got down into it?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Three women and eight children.

Chairman WALSH. Who were the women?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Mrs. Costa, Mrs. Valdez, and Mrs. Patragon, and myself.

Chairman WALSH. Were those other women friends of yours that had been in the tent colony?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How did you get your children in there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. They followed me; I had my baby in my lap and the little girl by the hand and the oldest walked by himself.

Chairman WALSH. How old were the children?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. One was 4; he would have been 5 yesterday; the little girl was 2½, and the baby 6 months old.

Chairman WALSH. Did you talk to Mrs. Costa after you got in the tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What conversation did you have when you got in there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I said to Mrs. Costa "They are burning the tent and we had better get out." She said, "Oh, Mary, you had better stay in, because it is safer in here, and we could not burn," not realizing about the smoke.

Chairman WALSH. What time was that with relation to the time you went into the tent—how long afterwards?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. It was not more than 10 minutes after I was in there that the tent started on fire, and we soon became unconscious.

Chairman WALSH. You were in there 10 minutes before you lost consciousness?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Before you lost consciousness did you realize that the tent was on fire?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I seen that it was on fire.

Chairman WALSH. It was not on fire when you went in there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir, or I would not have gone in.

Chairman WALSH. Were you unconscious all night?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir; until the next morning at half past 5.

Chairman WALSH. What was your first consciousness the next morning?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Just as soon as I came out I went to look at my barrel for a drink of water, I was so suffocated, and then I happened to look back and there was five or six more tents that were not burned, and I was going to the depot, and when I was going to the depot there were guards coming down and I was looking back for fear they would shoot me.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you suffer when you came to, Mrs. Petrucci? Were you in bad physical condition? Did you feel badly?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I suppose I was worse than a drunken person. Every place I would go the road was all mine.

Chairman WALSH. The road—

Mrs. PETRUCCI (interrupting). Yes; like a drunken person.

Chairman WALSH. And how long did you feel that way that morning? How long did that last? That bad feeling?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I don't know how long it lasted, because as soon as I got to Trinidad I had to go to bed.

Chairman WALSH. How long were you in bed?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I was in bed nine days. I took pneumonia.

Chairman WALSH. Pneumonia, and in bed nine days?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you suffer a great deal during that time and before you were taken to your bed?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When did you get to Trinidad, and how were you taken to Trinidad?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Well, I went up at the depot that morning, and when I got there somebody paid my ticket, and when I got in Trinidad I didn't know nothing, or didn't know nobody.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you relate your experiences to the leaders of the miners after you got to Trinidad?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who first did you tell your story to?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I told my first story to Mrs. Champion.

Chairman WALSH. Is that a friend of yours?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; she lives in Denver.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Champion?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. She made an investigation down there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That was a lady that lived in Denver?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you told her this same story?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know your children were dead when you were taken out that morning?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And when did you find it out?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Well, when I went around up to the depot, I sent Mrs. Holeran down to see, and she couldn't find this place where the children were.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been out of Colorado before this trip?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. This is the first time, of course, you ever were in New York or these cities that you passed through?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Oh, I was in Washington in May.

Chairman WALSH. You were in Washington in May?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. After this Ludlow affair?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And that was the first time you were ever out of Colorado?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you don't know what school facilities other people had?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No.

Chairman WALSH. You didn't know, except from what you heard, that people went to church and got religious—

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You had just been told that. Did you go to church in Trinidad any?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any place in the towns in which you lived to which the people could resort for social intercourse—that is, to meet each other daily or nightly?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. There was no such place?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have some questions, Mr. Weinstock?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know, Mrs. Petrucci, how the fire started?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; I do not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You did not see the fire at the start?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; I did not see the fire at the start, because I had my cellar door shut; because the bullets were coming in there so thickly I had to close it. And when I saw it, it was kind of a stream across the door—there was, you know, that was carried down—you know I got out of my tent; it was all on blaze.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At the time you left the tent it was already on fire?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, the fire had spread from one tent to another?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. All down the line?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I don't know if it spread or they set them on fire, but I suppose some one set my tent on fire, because my tent was the first one burning.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The fire started in your tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That was the beginning of the whole fire, right in your tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What time of the day did that happen?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Well, it happened in the evening, I guess about 6—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At night or in daylight?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. It was still light.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did you notice anybody around your tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did the fire start inside the tent or outside?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. From the outside, it was, but when I saw it it was all on fire.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Were you in the tent when it took fire?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes; I was inside of my cellar.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At the time the fire started?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then couldn't you tell how it happened?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir; I got frightened, you know. I had my three children with me, you know, and to save me—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did you have a cellar in your tent?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you were down in the cellar?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And then when you saw the fire you came out of the cellar?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes; I jumped out of the cellar with the baby in my lap, and then took one of the other children, one by one, by the hand and pulled them out of there and run into this cave.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What had become of your neighbors, the ones that had the tents next to you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I don't know. There were three of them in that hole—in that cellar.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. With you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you took them from your cellar—

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; they was not in my cellar; they were in this bedroom cellar that we just spoke about.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, let me make sure that I understand it. Did every tent have a cellar, too?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Not every one of them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your tent had a cellar?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And then this other tent that you went to also had a cellar?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And then you came out of your cellar and went over to this other one?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, as you came out of your tent to go to this other cellar did you notice any people around there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Nobody?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No; just the militiamen under that tank.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How far were they from where you were?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. About 25 yards, I think.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They were the closest persons to your place?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you have no idea how the fire started?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Just one question. Did they keep away from you the knowledge of your children's death when you were taken out that morning?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did the people tell you that your children were dead?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. They took you right off to Trinidad?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No. This—I sent Mrs. Holleran down to see if my children were alive yet. I sent her down, and nobody knowed that place.

Chairman WALSH. And what did this lady tell you? Did she tell you your children were dead?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. She did not.

Chairman WALSH. She did not find them?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And who went to Trinidad with you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. There was lots more women up at the tent-colony depot.

Chairman WALSH. Did you try to find your children again before you went to Trinklud?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What did you think had become of them?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I was not thinking any way.

Chairman WALSH. Your mind was in such a condition that you could not think?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon wants to ask you a question.

Commissioner LENNON. Were your children and the others found after you had gone to Trinidad?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. They were found afterwards?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. Those were all the children you had, were they—the three?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I had four, and one had died the 7th day of March, and this was the 20th of April.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you a question or two.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mrs. Petrucci, you finally came to yourself and came out yourself?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. And walked away?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. You were sort of half dazed and half unconscious?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Do you remember whether, when you went in that cellar, whether the door was closed?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. It was open.

Commissioner BALLARD. The door was open?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. And after you all got in there why it was closed, after the tent was on fire?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir. We couldn't close it because we didn't have time to.

Commissioner BALLARD. The door never was closed?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. The smoke came right in?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Did you all pull any bedclothes over you or bed covers down there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. I did not, but Mrs. Costa did. There was one in there, and she took it and put it over herself and her two children, and I asked her to give me some of it and she said there was not enough for herself.

Commissioner BALLARD. Well, how long had you been in the tent colony?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Since January.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you liked it there very much?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Who paid the expenses while you were there?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. The union.

Commissioner BALLARD. Who is paying your expenses now?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. The union.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you a question or two, Mrs. Petrucci.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Were you the only one that came out of that cellar alive?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No, sir; I and another woman.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did she regain consciousness before or after you did?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. She regained before I did.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did she arouse you?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. She left on her own volition?

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And you afterwards

Mrs. PETRUCCI. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you very much, Mrs. Petrucci.

Call Mr. Lawson, please.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN B. LAWSON—Recalled.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Lawson, Commissioner Weinstock wanted you recalled for a few more questions, or some more questions.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Just take your seat.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are international board member, district 15?

Mr. LAWSON. District 15.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you are also president of the State Federation of Labor of Colorado?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir; that is a mistake. Mr. John McLennan is president of the State federation of labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Well, for the information of this commission, Mr. Lawson, will you tell us what you know about a journal called the United Mine Workers' Journal?

Mr. LAWSON. That is the official organ of the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. It is published and owned by the United Mine Workers?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, is it regarded as a reliable journal?

Mr. LAWSON. I think it is by the miners; yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, they have confidence in its character and in its integrity?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; I believe they have.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the United Mine Workers' Journal would not knowingly or intentionally publish any misinformation, would it?

Mr. LAWSON. I believe not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You yourself have confidence in its character and standing?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You remember that when you were on the witness stand the other day, Mr. Lawson, I read to you out of the records of the hearings a document that had been placed in evidence by the mine owners of Colorado which contained a set of resolutions adopted by the miners of Pennsylvania?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In which they charged—

Mr. LAWSON. Pardon me; you read that out of the Coal Age, I believe.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, it was a clipping from the Coal Age that I read from the Denver proceedings—that is, from our transcript of the testimony.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you will recall that those resolutions, adopted by the mine owners, charged the United Mine Workers of America in Pennsylvania as having broken their contract.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that there had been a hundred strikes in violation of their contracts?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that was the charge, as I recollect.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, to refresh your memory and mine, let me read from the proceedings of the other day just what was said.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (reading): "In the document that you read yesterday afternoon to the commission, among other things as nearly as I can recall the language, you made the statement and went on to say that you believed that the United Mine Workers of America were worthy to be recognized and dealt with because they always observed their contracts.

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. That they had not violated any of their agreements?—Answer. Yes; I made that statement, or a statement similar to that.

"Question. That was the substance?—Answer. Yes; that is the substance.

"Question. You note the claim is made here—referring, of course, to the resolutions passed by the employers—that there were a hundred strikes in violation of their contract?—Answer. Yes; I have heard that claimed so many times all over the country that it is familiar to me.

"Question. Is it a fact?—Answer. No; it is not a fact.

"Question. How many strikes did take place in violation of the contract?—Answer. There might have been, and I will be as fair as I can in this matter—let me admit that there may have been here and there in this country a local strike wherein some members of the local union who were not perhaps good union men, succeeded in misguiding members of that particular local. Those very few instances have been charged up against the United Mine Workers of America as a violation of contract when, as a fact, in nearly every instance I can recall that has ever come before the international executive board, and I have been a member of that board since 1905, the matter has been taken up and the men have either gone back to work and stayed at work under the contract, or the charter has been taken away from them, and they have been put out of the union.

"Question. Now, seemingly from the resolutions passed by the mine owners the union officials were utterly unable to carry out their part of the agreement. There is nothing to indicate to us that these men were disciplined or that the charter was taken away or that they were ordered to go back to work unless you have testimony to that effect.—Answer. In the first place, I want to again call you attention to the fact that the Coal Age is one of the official journals of the operators.

"Question. The Coal Age is not saying this. This resolution was passed by the operators.—Answer. That is the same thing, so far as I am concerned.

"Question. The Coal Age simply published it.—Answer. The operators are making the contention there that these things are taking place, and until I could know all of the facts and what action was taken by Mr. Gilday or by the international executive board I would not be in a position to answer that question as you would desire to have it answered; but I am not willing to admit that the miners' organization of any State violated the law without more full information."

If you were here when Mr. Mitchell was being examined, you must remember that I put the same question to him, and that Mr. Mitchell answered substantially as you did, that he was not familiar with the facts and therefore was not in a position to make answer. Whereupon I asked that this letter be sent to the mine operators—or rather I wrote a letter to Prof. Charles McCarthy, who is managing director of our commission and has charge of the machinery of the commission—and I wrote to him as follows [reading]:

"Among the charges made by the Colorado coal operators against the United Mine Workers of America is that the unions are contract breakers; and as proof thereof they have submitted at our Denver hearing a set of resolutions adopted by the coal operators of Pennsylvania, which set forth that in over a hundred instances did the United Mine Workers of America break their contract and go on strike despite a provision in the contract that there should be no cessation of work, but that all disputes should be submitted for peaceful adjudication.

"The attention of Mr. John McLennan, of Colorado, and also Mr. John Mitchell, while testifying before the commission, was called to these alleged violations. Neither of these witnesses, however, were sufficiently familiar with the facts to answer the charge.

"I think it of great importance in our work to know authoritatively what are the facts. I therefore ask that you have a circular letter sent to every coal company in the country asking what has been their experience in the matter of the observance of agreements on the part of the coal miners and to cite specific instances where contracts, if any, were broken. It might be well in this same circular to ask each company also to state what advantages and disadvantages they find in unionizing their mines."

Since I dictated that letter, Mr. Lawson, there has come into my possession a clipping from the United Mine Workers Journal, which, you tell us, is the official organ of the United Mine Workers of America and which is dependable and reliable and which would not knowingly or intentionally publish any misstatement—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). Yes, sir; that is my judgment.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have here a communication sent to the United Mine Workers Journal by Mr. W. O. Smith, who, from all I can learn, is ex-president of ex-chairman of the executive committee of the Kentucky district of the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it that he represents probably the highest type of unionist; that he seemingly is a man of influence within the union, because, as he goes on to recite here, he was asked by the unionists to intercede in their behalf and in the interest of certain strikers in a certain coal mine to get them reinstated. Now, I have found in my experience, Mr. Lawson, two kinds of unionists. I have found one type of unionist who substantially says: "May unionism ever be right; but, right or wrong, unionism." I have another type of unionist who says, substantially: "May unionism ever be in the right and may it ever strive to right wrongs; but when it is in the wrong and when it ceases to right wrongs I am no longer a unionist."

I want to say, further, before I read this, Mr. Lawson, and invite your comments on it, that I have also found two kinds of critics of unionism, the one critic who slaps the unionist on the back and calls him a horny-fisted son of the soil, but who takes mighty good care not to call the attention of that unionist to the weaknesses and failings and shortcomings of unionism. I have found other critics of unionism like the man whose letter I am about to read, who is a real friend of the unionists, and in a friendly and helpful spirit does not hesitate to point out to the unionist and to unionism its shortcomings and failings, in order that it might be better able to correct those shortcomings and failings, and who therefore, in my judgment, is the best friend of unionism. You will recall that when Dr. Eliot was on the witness stand that he made the statement that in his opinion some of the worst enemies of unionism were to be found within its own ranks—the unionist who was a contract breaker, the unionist who was a violator of law.

Now, Mr. Smith in sending his communication to the United Mine Workers of America Journal has this to say in the matter of contract breaking. He says, among other things [reading]:

"For many years the United Mine Workers of America has preached and practiced the doctrine of the inviolability of contracts, and by so doing has won the respect and confidence of the general public—a mighty influence, affecting all industrial disputes and conflicts. But for the past two or three years this respect and confidence has been waning, not because the officials have failed to do their duty, but because of the indifference of the conservative members of our unions and the activity of the later radical element, which is responsible for the greatest menace that has ever threatened the United Mine Workers of America—the local strike. During the past two or three years the international, as well as the district and subdistrict officials, have been confronted with many perplexing problems, some of which seem to threaten the very life of the organization; but I believe I am safe in saying that no problem has given them as much concern as the problem of local strikes in violation of agreements.

"Thousands of dollars are expended every year in the effort to organize the 250,000 nonunion miners in the United States, while hundreds of our members go on strikes almost every day in absolute inexcusable violation of existing agreements."

Now, here we have testimony from a most reliable source and from the ranks of unionism itself that the United Mine Workers of America are contract breakers; and your comment is in brackets.

Mr. LAWSON. I think, Mr. Weinstock, the letter of Mr. Smith might be well taken as an honest criticism by a member of our organization or by an official who has a desire—as I believe every good member of our union or every good official of our organization—to show that the organization is maintained through the fact that it does not believe in violations of contracts. I believe that is one of the things that the organization can boast most proudly about, is the fact that it does not violate its contracts when once entered into. I desire to reiterate that statement and make it just as strong and emphatic as I know how.

This statement from Mr. Smith has reference to individual membership and, perhaps, local unions. I want at this point, first, to draw your attention to the fact that there is a channel through which every single grievance, whether it be from a member in our ranks or whether it may come from a local union or a subdistrict or from officials in the organization; and the operators who have signed a contract with our organization have also and likewise the proper channels in which and through which to take their grievances up to the head of our organization. And I want to say, again, and make it as strong as I know how, there never has yet come, to my knowledge, since I have been a member of the international board since 1905—and I don't know of any before that time from reading the records of the organization—when our international board have ever encouraged or sanctioned a violation of contract.

Now, in regard to this letter, I think, and I know Mr. Smith, I think he is a bright, honest, and good member of our union. He was at one time president of the Kentucky miners. This man may see or may think he sees a danger confronting the organization from even the individual violations of contracts, but to cite you an illustration, Mr. Weinstock, I have read in the public press of this country many times lately articles drawing the attention of the National Government of this country to the fact that New York is without protection in case it was invaded by one of the countries now at war, and San Francisco is in the same position. Any man in this country, whether he be a citizen of the humblest rank or whether he be in some official capacity, would have a perfect right, in my judgment, to offer an honest criticism of any weakness in our Government or point out any danger ahead. That is what Mr. Smith has done, and I appreciate his effort, and I think he is working along the right line. This organization does not want and does not believe in and does not foster and will not encourage the violation of contracts, and I want to say again, as in international representative, I have been sent to various States in this Union outside of my own district; for illustration, I have been sent to Wyoming to adjust grievances there between the miners and the operators. I have been sent to Montana on the same mission. I have gone to Washington—the State of Washington—on the same mission. And each and every time the record will show that where the men were wrong they either went back and resumed work at once or they were told their charter would be taken off the wall and away from them. That has happened a great many times in our organization, but I think you will agree with me that in an organization of something over 400,000 mine workers men from all walks of life, men of so many different nationalities—for illustration, in Colorado we had 32 different nationalities in the coal mines in Colorado, and I think you will agree with me that with that great conglomeration of different nationalities, if I may call it such, men who are brought to this country by the operators, men who have not had a chance to understand what unionism means, men who have not been members of organizations long enough to get the education that we are trying to give them, Mr. Weinstock, men who do not understand how necessary it is not to violate contracts—sometimes those men do make mistakes, and sometimes men who are sent into our union by the coal companies and are paid as spies come into our union and work on our union members, and they themselves bring about and encourage discontent and do what they can to stir up local strikes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask, Mr. Lawson, are you a member of the I. W. W.?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir; and I want to say this in connection with that: Our organization, the United Mine Workers of America, have no connection at all with the I. W. W.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are, of course, familiar with the doctrines of the I. W. W. more or less, as most laboring men are?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, I am somewhat, as an ordinary citizen would be, perhaps.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are, among other things, that they advocate and practice an utter disregard for contracts?

Mr. LAWSON. I only know what I see in the press about those things, Mr. Weinstock. I can not speak authoritatively on that question, because we have no connection with the I. W. W.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I can speak authoritatively on the question, because I have had occasion to investigate the I. W. W.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am thoroughly familiar with their literature and doctrines and preachments, and unless you may be prepared to dispute them—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). I would be glad to hear it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). That one of the officials—one of their chief tenets is that they will not respect contracts; that they feel themselves at liberty, whenever it suits their purpose, to break a contract at their will.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, that being the case, if you were an employer, Mr. Lawson, would you care to enter into an agreement with the I. W. W., knowing beforehand that it would not be respected?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, in the first place, as I have stated, I have no personal knowledge—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). But if the facts were as I stated them to you, would you care to enter into an agreement with them—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). Our organization does not have any dealings with the I. W. W., and in the third place, as limited as my knowledge is, I understand that they do not make contracts.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They do, but they break them at will. Now, if you were an employer—this is my question—

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us get it straight. If you were an employer and knew that the I. W. W.'s were contract breakers, that they did not make any secret of it, but shouted it from the housetops and stated it frankly and candidly and openly, would you enter into a contract with them?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, I would have to answer that by asking this very brief question, because I haven't knowledge, Mr. Weinstock, if you will excuse me, but do you know of the I. W. W.'s making contracts anywhere in which they keep them?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; I don't know whether they keep them. I do know that they break them at will, and that they themselves tell you so frankly, and make no bones about it.

Mr. LAWSON. I think like this, about any organization, just the same as I feel about the operators, if their word is not good I am chary about accepting their word after they break it once. I agree to that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very true. In other words, you, in common with the rest of us, feel that it is useless to waste time with a group that are unreliable and that will not make good on keeping faith?

Mr. LAWSON. I have always made it a rule, Mr. Weinstock, never to trust any man who lied to me.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. A very wise rule, Mr. Lawson. Now, just as I, for example, from my knowledge, look upon the I. W. W.'s, it is very evident that the operators of Colorado looked upon the United Mine Workers of America—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). Well—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Pardon me. As evidence that in their opinion that the United Mine Workers of America were either unwilling or unable to keep their contracts, they submitted to this commission the experience of Pennsylvania mine owners, who claimed that in a hundred cases the workers had deliberately broken their contracts and gone out on strike against their agreement. Now comes this corroborative testimony from within the ranks of the United Mine Workers of America, not expressing opinions, not saying what might happen, but saying what has and is happening. The language here is unmistakable. Mr. Smith says [reading]:

"Thousands of dollars are expended every year in an effort to organize the 250,000 nonunion miners in the United States, while hundreds of our members go on strike almost every day in absolute inexcusable violation of existing agreements."

Now, in the face of those facts can you blame employers if they should decline to do business with the United Mine Workers of America on the ground that however earnest and however zealous and however well meaning the officials may be they are unable to deliver the goods?

Mr. LAWSON. Let me go back just a little to make my answer, Mr. Weinstock; you draw the comparison between the I. W. W. and the coal miners' union. Of course, I can not speak for the I. W. W. organization, and I have so stated; but I can talk for the United Mine Workers of America. And I want to say if your investigations were not more thorough toward the I. W. W. than the investigation of the coal operators who have taken snap judgment and have condemned the entire organization because of what they claim is certain local violations of contracts, then I am afraid that you have not investigated it very thoroughly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But let me remind you, Mr. Lawson, that it is not necessary to investigate the I. W. W. on that for they admit it, they plead guilty.

Mr. LAWSON. We do not do that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But here are the evidences.

Mr. LAWSON. No; I beg your pardon; that is not evidence. That is a statement written in our official journal, or published in our official journal as a warning, and as a criticism just the same as you can hear in any church in this town on any Sunday that you want to go to church; the minister will get up and tell men and women that if they do not be good they will go to some place else. I do not think those are facts. That is a letter, and it states quite specifically, I think it is plain. It is a warning against violation of contract, and I think that ought to be used from my side of this argument, showing you that we do not believe in the violation of contract.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Please let me remind you again, Mr. Lawson; that it does not say, If you will violate the contracts in the future such and such will happen, but it says, "You have been and are violating contracts now every day."

Mr. LAWSON. Does it state where.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; it does not state where, but it makes it a common condition.

Mr. LAWSON. I want to repeat again for the benefit of the commission and of the record, my statement that I defy the coal operators, any or all of them in the United States, to point to a single instance where the international executive board has ever sanctioned or encouraged a violation of contract in this country or in Canada.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. This does not say so, nor did the letter or the resolutions passed by the employers of Pennsylvania say so; it did not charge the officials. It simply says—this indicates clearly, as did the resolutions passed by the employers, that the officers were unable to control the rank and file; that the officers were unable to compel the rank and file to make good.

Mr. LAWSON. On that point I want to direct your attention to one point: If you will investigate central Pennsylvania, where Mr. Gilday was president, you will find in a large measure, at least, that they did not have any check off in that part of the State, and because of that fact there are a great many men, some members perhaps of our union, who are not under the same discipline as are the miners where they have the check off. That is where the check off is an advantage to the operators, and they can not violate their contracts, either as a local or as individuals where they have the check off.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. O'Connell would like to ask a question or two.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Lawson, in Commissioner Weinstock's introduction of this subject he asked you to certify to the fact that the Miners' Journal was the official organ, and that its contents therefore were certified to because it was that organ.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is the sense of his proposition?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; if you will pardon the interruption, that was not exactly the thought I had in mind; I did not expect the Journal to certify to anything. My question was, would it knowingly and intentionally publish any misinformation, and the answer was no.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In other words, if it was published in this Journal it was a certification that established that.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is a signed article and not an editorial?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is a contributed article signed by a member of your organization?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And published in that open forum of your organization?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the editor of the Journal has no say in the matter at all, he must publish it; each member has a right to send in those communications for publication?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; and I am glad you brought that out.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that this article, simply by being published in your magazine, has no more weight as a truth than if it was published in any other publication issued and distributed publicly to the people?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The fact that it was published in your open forum does not make it any more a truth or a lie than if it was published anywhere else?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If, however, the editor had written this, or the international president of your organization had written it, and written it as coming from John P. White, president of the United Mine Workers of America, he would have been speaking as the spokesman of your organization?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that this article simply is entitled to no more credence as being true or untrue because of its being published in the Journal of your organization than if it was published in the Manufacturers' Journal, or the Journal of the I. W. W., if it happened to get one out?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir. May I comment on that point?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAWSON. Your statement is exactly correct, and I had that point in mind, but I overlooked it as we talked at some length on the question. In the forum, when our members send letters to it, if they sign their names to the communications, or whatever they may be, they are usually published perhaps without the editor giving it very much consideration, especially if it is along the line of criticism against the miners in the organization or against the policies of the organization. It is up to the editor to publish all those articles or as many of them as they can get in.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, Mr. Lawson, as to this effort to make of your organization a contract-breaking organization, or nonrespecting contract organization, in order that we may understand, your organization does not make, through its local union, or its membership, local contracts here and there in this coal field and that coal field and the other coal field?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Those contracts are made with the operators' association, covering the entire territory or coal field?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. A contract is made for two or three States, for instance?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. One contract covers that entire territory?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the individual member is not a signer of that contract?

Mr. LAWSON. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And in that territory there may be men who speak 15 or 20 different languages?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There are all nationalities employed in that coal field?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the fact that one individual out of several thousand, or 10,000, or, as in the State of Illinois, 80,000 to 100,000 miners are employed—the fact that at one tittle a man quits work in what may technically be called violation of contract—he stops work or refuses to do his work, and the rest of the men have to stop on that account—that is called by the operators a violation of contract, is it?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And with possibly from 80,000 to 100,000 miners in one State under contract, it is easily possible for 100 violations of contract, so far as the workers are concerned, to take place in a day?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And yet no great damage has been done?

Mr. LAWSON. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the great fundamental principle underlying the contract made between your organization and the operators has not been violated?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Your organization, as an organization—the international organization—your executive board, has not violated contracts that you have signed for your organization?

Mr. LAWSON. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is the individual here and there who takes upon himself to say, "I will not do this," or "I will not do that," and he stops work and that may result in others stopping work?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That, however, is only an incident to your general contract?

Mr. LAWSON. That is all.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever violated a contract with the Colorado coal operators?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have never had a chance, have you?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the northern fields, in the field of the present difficulty, where you have been charged with being contract breakers, have you ever broken contracts with them?

Mr. LAWSON. Not with the C. F. & I. or the Victor-American.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever had an opportunity to break a contract with them?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir; we never signed with them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, their charging you with being contract breakers is hearsay entirely?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They have never tested your honesty or integrity as to whether you would break a contract?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But they are taking the statement of some operator in some other territory that you are a thief?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just the same as trying to make a thief out of a man because some one in his family stole?

Mr. LAWSON. It is just along the lines you have stated, Mr. O'Connell. We can not expect the entire organization to be held responsible for a violation—that is, a technical violation of a contract by some individual member, or a dozen members, any more than we can expect the operator to be blamed as an operators' association if some individual operator should violate his contract.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As to the I. W. W., Mr. Weinstock says that the I. W. W. makes contracts and that it will break contracts. We have had before this commission the officers of two factions, one known as the Chicago faction and one known as the Detroit faction, having different methods and different theories; one practicing what they at all times preach—destruction—and stating that they do not make contracts with anybody, and the other the reverse; they make contracts and say they will break them at their will. Now, Mr. Weinstock asked you if you would, as an employer, make a contract with an organization that told you beforehand that they would not keep a contract. Would not the answer be largely based upon how badly you wanted men to work for you whether you would make a contract with them or not?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; I rather think it would.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If you wanted men, and had to have them, you would make a contract; and if you did not want—did not need—the men, you would dictate whether you would contract with them or not.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The whole proposition is based on whether you have the men or need them?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; I think it would very largely depend on that. There is one thing more, Mr. O'Connell, to which I want to draw attention in connection with this matter. The operators of our State who have never had any contracts with us are the people who are going about and shouting from the housetops, as Mr. Weinstock has said the I. W. W. do. Now, they may do that, I don't know, but I do know that the operators of Colorado are, and have been for a long time, shouting from the housetops that we, as the United Mine Workers, are contract breakers. I want to draw attention again to this other particular, and as Mr. Costigan well said yesterday, "Men ought to come into court with clean hands" when they come at all and especially when they bring a grievance.

I have in my hand a partial list of the labor and mining laws of our State, and I want to say that there are a dozen or more of those laws, and there are no better labor or mining laws in the United States than we have on the statute books of Colorado. And I want to make this statement before this commission, and I want to make it also as emphatic as I can, that certain operators, and I will select as example the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., have violated continuously and repeatedly for a great many years every single law of these dozen laws I hold in my hands up until about two years ago. Within that period of time they have posted notices at their mine, "We will live up to the checkweighman law"; "We will give miners the 8-hour day"; "We will pay twice a month," and "We will abolish the scrip." And they also have abolished paying company store orders for postal money orders. Now, if the operators were trying to contend, and they are, that the United Mine Workers are contract violators, why don't they themselves live up to the law of the State and then come in and say, "We will keep contracts"?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it not a fact, Mr. Lawson, according to your own statement, that the companies simply have seen salvation and have reformed?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You say that for the past two years they have observed the law.

Mr. LAWSON. No; I did not mean to say two years. I will tell you what they saw; they saw the handwriting on the wall of the United Mine Workers of America. That is what they saw.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask a question or two.

Commissioner BALLARD. I was just going to ask—apparently the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., who control that group of operators there are very determined not to treat with the United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. LAWSON. That is so.

Commissioner BALLARD. And also, coming back to that claim of contract breakers, can you suggest any reason for that feeling on the part of the operators? Has there been any quarrel or trouble, or what is it all about?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I can suggest a reason for it. It is not because of any quarrel or trouble between the United Mine Workers of America as an organization and the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.; it is because they can not keep their coal camps closed while dealing with the union; it is because they have to comply with the laws of the State, which means the checkweighman, which means that they can not have company stores where the people have to sneak their trunks out of camps and go to Trinidad or some other town and buy the necessities of life and then sneak them back again, because if they do not they will lose their jobs and go down the canyon; they can not have their own company doctors, which we call horse doctors, and they can not hire company marshals to intimidate the people in the camps. When they sign a contract with the union they are compelled, through the agreement, to stipulate what they shall pay for all kinds of work, whether it be piecework or daywork or yardage, or contract work, or so much a ton, and so forth. Those are the reasons they do not want the union; they know they have to pay for those things, and they know they have to pay every man alike for like service. They can not take some poor man that they bring in from southern Europe who has perhaps never seen a coal mine before and expose him to the dangers of coal mining, and keep that man in poverty or peonage, which are the same things in reality.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Commons would like to ask a question.

Commissioner COMMONS. What are the rules of your organization requiring discipline of a local union that goes out on an illegal strike?

Mr. LAWSON. I think I have here—

Commissioner COMMONS (interrupting). You do not need to read it, you can just state it.

Mr. LAWSON. A local union that goes on a strike in violation of its contract is ordered back to work at once.

Commissioner COMMONS. By whom?

Mr. LAWSON. First, by the district officials.

Commissioner COMMONS. And then if they do not go back to work, what?

Mr. LAWSON. Then by the international president, international executive board, or international convention; it would be in rotation; and if they refuse they violate their charter and are no longer a member of our organization.

Commissioner COMMONS. Who can take away the charter?

Mr. LAWSON. The international president, the international board, or the international convention.

Commissioner COMMONS. Can a district organizer do it?

Mr. LAWSON. No, sir; the district officers can not take away charters; but they can have it taken away by the international president, board, or convention.

Commissioner COMMONS. As I understand it, both Mr. O'Connell and you agree that there have been violation of agreements by local unions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. No; I did not speak of local unions; I spoke of individuals.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you had occasion, in the history of your organization, when individuals have gone out and the local union has gone out, to back them up, in violation of agreements?

Mr. LAWSON. I have known of several occasions where the local union has stopped work, yes, sir; and on each of those occasions an officer has been sent to that local union—to that community—and those men have been sent back to work at once, always with the understanding that if they did not return immediately to work they would be put out of the organization. As I stated before, I went to Wyoming, Montana, and Washington on cases similar to this where they had grievances that had not been settled.

Commissioner COMMONS. They had quit work anyhow?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; at several places.

Commissioner COMMONS. You might not call it a strike?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; there was a dispute as to whether the contract was being lived up to in each instance by the operators, and I want to say this much, that in each of them it was a question of both the local union and the operators violating the contract together—they both violated it before they got through with it.

Commissioner COMMONS. Has it ever been necessary for your international organization to revoke the charter of a local organization?

Mr. LAWSON. I think they have revoked the charter of a local organization in the Southwest; but I can not give the name of the local union. I think there have been a few, but not many. A threat to do so is generally sufficient.

Commissioner COMMONS. Your records would show to what extent you have revoked charters, would they not?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; if there have been any revoked.

Commissioner COMMONS. You think it has occurred, do you, once or twice?

Mr. LAWSON. It seems to me so, but I won't be sure. I remember several occasions where the board has taken action, where the president has taken action, and even the convention has taken action, notifying certain unions that if they did not comply with the terms of the contract and continue to comply with it, they would revoke their charters.

Commissioner COMMONS. What is the longest time any local union has been out on an illegal strike or quit work of this kind when an officer ordered them back?

Mr. LAWSON. I could not answer that just in the proper way, perhaps, because I do not know how long—not very long. It depends in this way, for illustration: If you were an operator and got into a quarrel with the men working in your mine, and it may be that you have violated the contract yourself, as I have said so many have done, and before you got through, instead of taking your grievance through its proper channel the men and you got into a fight and they stopped work, it may be some time before you take your case up to the international organization. Some of the operators do not want to do so, because they want to get into a fight with the men.

Commissioner COMMONS. I suppose this is the kind of case Mr. Weinstock speaks of in Pennsylvania, where they quit work and went back to work shortly afterwards when the officers came?

Mr. LAWSON. I don't know exactly, but I know in that part of Pennsylvania they have different conditions; they do not have the complete check off and the same discipline does not prevail there that prevails, for instance, in Iowa.

Chairman WALSH. At this point the hearing will stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. Please be in attendance so that you may be recalled, Mr. Lawson.

(Thereupon, at 4.45 o'clock p. m., Wednesday, February 3, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Thursday morning, February 4, 1915, at 10 o'clock.)

NEW YORK CITY, February 4, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. Please be in order. The commission will now resume.

Mr. Lawson, please resume the stand. Dr. Commons does not seem to be here, and Mr. Lennon would like to ask a few questions.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN B. LAWSON—Continued.

Mr. LAWSON. Mr. Chairman, before being asked any questions I would like to make a very brief statement.

Chairman WALSH. Very well.

Mr. LAWSON. My attention has been called to a statement issued through the press, supposed to be some of my testimony of a few days ago, to the effect that in 1903 I am supposed to have said that Mr. Rockefeller had made a statement that the miners and agitators would be run out of the State. I want to say that that is not a correct statement of my testimony, and I make the statement in this manner so that no injustice will be done Mr. Rockefeller or anyone else.

The statement I made was concerning the governor of Utah. The governor of Utah was reported through the press in either late November or early December of 1903 as having stated that if the miners of Utah went on strike they would be run out of the State of Utah.

My statement concerning Mr. Rockefeller was with reference to his testimony in Washington at the congressional hearing, on April 6, 1914, or just two weeks before the Ludlow affair.

And I would like also to supplement my answer to Mr. Weinstock concerning the purposes of our organization and to show why men do not desire to violate, or rather the organization does not desire to violate our contracts. The objects of our organization are to protect the lives and limbs and the health of men in and around the coal mines, to raise wages, to shorten the hours of labor, to improve the home life, and to make the home life more happy and comfortable; to demand that the child of every man shall have equal opportunity for education; to care for the sick, to bury the dead, to assist the widows and orphans, to raise the standards of citizenship and to secure industrial justice. I want to say that in attempting to raise the standards of citizenship there is no better way than I know of than through education, and to educate the men that when they make contracts with employers it is absolutely necessary for them to keep their contracts.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I be permitted just one word at this point?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I simply want to correct your point of view, Mr. Lawson, in relation to the questions that were put to you on the matter of contract breaking. It is not the contention of anybody that I have heard or anything I have read that the United Mine Workers of America start out deliberately and intentionally, like the I. W. W., to break contracts. It is conceded that the aim and hope and the desire of the United Mine Workers of America is to observe contracts.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But the facts that have been presented would indicate that in a goodly number of instances they have been unable to make good; they have not been able to deliver the goods.

Mr. LAWSON. Purely of a local character.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But widespread.

Mr. LAWSON. Over a territory embracing the United States and Canada.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You heard the statements as they were presented to you?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. Can you tell us, approximately, how many local unions there are in the United Mine Workers?

Mr. LAWSON. Something about 3,000, if my recollection is clear.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you know as to whether in these local unions the miners work in more than one mine belonging to one local union? Are there local unions containing workers from two, three, or four different mines?

Mr. LAWSON. Sometimes there are. It depends on the size of the mine and in what vicinity. I have known a good many cases where they are.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, that would mean possibly that in the country there were operated somewhere from 3,000 to 5,000 mines.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. In a general way?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I should think so; at least that many, and I think more.

Commissioner LENNON. You have been a member of the general board of the international for some time, have you not?

Mr. LAWSON. I was elected a member of the international executive board in 1905.

Commissioner LENNON. And it has been your duty, along with other members of the board, and the president, to go to places where difficulties arise and endeavor to settle them, is that true?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I have been sent by the international president quite a number of times to do that work.

Commissioner LENNON. In making those investigations and attempting a settlement, did you find in any cases that wherever there was violation of contract it was always the fault of the miners, or that sometimes the operators broke the contracts?

Mr. LAWSON. My experience has been in nearly every instance, I won't say every instance, but in nearly every instance where the contract had been broken by the miners, it was broken by both miners and operators about the same time; or it came up through their grievances that the miners had at the mine.

Commissioner LENNON. Did it not arise sometimes from an interpretation of an agreement where both sides got stubborn and both were responsible for the cessation of work?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; it nearly always came about because of misinterpretation, we may call it, of the agreement by one side or the other.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you believe that the record could be secured indicating the causes of these cessations of work, as to whether the responsibility lay with the United Mine Workers of America or the employers, or in such cases as might lie equally with both—could any approximate record be had of that?

Mr. LAWSON. I think from our international office we could get such a record.

Commissioner LENNON. Would you undertake, for the commission, to get a record of that kind for the Pennsylvania district, for Illinois and Iowa—say, those three States.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. You need not go any farther. That will be sufficient to properly show the general tendency.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; you have reference to district No. 2, which Mr. Gilday was president of?

Commissioner LENNON. Yes.

Mr. LAWSON. Districts 2, 12, and 13?

Commissioner LENNON. That is all of Illinois?

Mr. LAWSON. And Iowa.

Commissioner LENNON. I could testify a lot about Illinois, but that is not my province. Now, I would like to ask if you can give any testimony or whether you can cite this commission to where testimony can be had as to whether or not there was purposely firing on the tents in the tent colony by the guards or militia?

Mr. LAWSON. I think—

Commissioner LENNON. After the people had been driven out.

Mr. LAWSON. I think that a great deal of testimony could be gotten on that very subject, Mr. Lennon, and might from the reports of the three members, officers of the Colorado National Guard, who were sent by Gov. Ammons into the strike district at Ludlow to make an investigation on the part of the militia first. That is, speaking about Maj. Boughton, Capt. Danks, and Capt. van Cise.

Commissioner LENNON. Have you what they said on the subject?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; I have at least extracts from their report with me here.

Commissioner LENNON. Bearing on that question?

Mr. LAWSON. Bearing directly on that question.

Commissioner LENNON. Read it into the minutes if you have it.

Chairman WALSH. Let me see just a moment. There were what you call two military courts out there when the trouble arose, a military court was set up at Trinidad, of which Maj. Boughton was the judge advocate general?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that is correct.

Chairman WALSH. And they assumed to bring in persons whom they considered were impeding the operations of the militia, as they called it?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And did not undertake to try those people, but they simply held them, and it was out of that that grew the complaints that men were held as high as 15 days without trial, and so forth?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman; and in connection with that—

Chairman WALSH. I do not want to go into any detail, but I want to get clear now what you are going to read from.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. This is not a report from that body, is it?

Mr. LAWSON. No.

Chairman WALSH. But after the Ludlow disaster?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Maj. Boughton advised, as the evidence shows here that he gave—

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And had the governor to refrain from appointing the judge of the supreme court who had offered his services?

Mr. LAWSON. That is correct.

Chairman WALSH. And he suggested to Gen. Chase that they go and hold a military inquiry and that that military inquiry was held, a court was constituted, of which Maj. Boughton was again the judge advocate general and Messrs. van Cise and Danks, two of his subordinate officers, sat upon the board with him?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is that correct?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And then tried the question of the alleged killing of Tikas by Linderfelt, and all those matters?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that is, the military board did that.

Chairman WALSH. And what you are going to read from now, do I understand that to be a portion of the findings of the military commission headed by Maj. Boughton and called by Gen. Chase, of the State militia?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; the military commission appointed to investigate Ludlow.

Chairman WALSH. The Ludlow affair?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Confine yourself, then, to the extracts bearing upon this particular question.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; that is very brief, Mr. Chairman. It is from the brief submitted by our counsel, Mr. Edward P. Costigan, Mr. Brewster, and Mr. Hawkins, in that matter. It is very brief.

Chairman WALSH. Now, are you going to read a part of the brief, or an argument or a citation from the report itself?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; this is a citation from the report itself.

Chairman WALSH. A report made by Maj. Boughton and Capt. Danks and Capt. van Cise?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir. This is brief, and says in a few words [reading]:

"A commission of the militia, composed of Maj. Boughton and Capts. Danks and Van Cise, reported on investigation that—

"A troop of National Guards were enlisted about the middle of April among the superintendent and foremen, the clerical force, physicians, storekeepers, mine guards, and other residents of the coal camps. This unit of the National Guard was designated Troop A, but so recently was it recruited that at the time of the battle of Ludlow it had not yet selected its officers, nor was it supplied with uniforms, arms, or ammunition. When this company was called to reinforce the uniformed guardsmen at Ludlow, its members appearing in civilian clothes gave rise—perhaps excusably—to the belief of the strikers that they were armed mine guards, a class much hated by the colonists.”

Then it goes on to say:

“We find that the tents were not all of them destroyed by accidental fire. Men and soldiers swarmed into the colony and deliberately assisted the conflagration by spreading the fire from tent to tent. This, too, was accompanied by the usual loot.”

Chairman WALSH. What did that mean? What evidence was there of looting?

Mr. LAWSON. They took the property of the people of the tent colonies. It was a common occurrence, Mr. Chairman, earlier than this period; at times when I myself was in the tent colony, when the militia came to the tent colony on a pretended search, or a real search, for arms, they very often tore up the tents, broke open the trunks and everything; and it was a common occurrence and admitted and proven to be so that in many instances they took everything there they got their hands on—money or jewelry, for illustration.

Chairman WALSH. So when those officers say those things with reference to Ludlow—that the conflagration was accompanied by the usual looting—you take that to mean that they stole the property of the inhabitants?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; that they carried off everything that they could lay their hands on.

Chairman WALSH. Prof. Commons was interrupted in his examination of you last night, and I suppose he wishes to proceed now?

Commissioner COMMONS. I wish to see if we understand in regard to these statistics that you promised Mr. Lennon.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. In reference to them, could you include there in each of these cases, I think they are the cases of the shutdowns owing to local grievances—that is, what you were going to report on?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; the contention of Mr. Weinstock, I think, the other day, that he asked me at that time if I would produce the record on district No. 2 case in Pennsylvania where Mr. Gilday was formerly president.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now you were going to add to that Illinois and Iowa?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now, will you include in that this question, first, whether it was simply a few individuals that quit work, or whether it was the entire local union that quit?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. And will you also add the number of days they were out?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. Then add the action that was taken by the general organization—State organization—or if it went up to the international board, the action that the officers of the union took in order to get the men back to work?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now, might I ask what do you mean—what is your idea of what constitutes a violation of an agreement? Is it a part of the agreement—does a part of the agreement always consist in this that each side must continue at work until the grievance is settled? That is, there must be no lockout on the one side and no strike on the other until the grievance is settled. Is that part of the agreement itself?

Mr. LAWSON. That is usually in the agreement. You see each agreement is made by the different districts, and they are made by the districts or groups of districts, for illustration—

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, then, will you include that information, as to whether in each—what was the nature of the agreement on the question of stopping work? You get my point there, I think?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. Whether the agreement provided that there should be no cessation of work pending the settlement of the grievance?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. I infer from the nature of the agreements that every stoppage of work by an individual or by a local is a violation of the agreement?

Mr. LAWSON. Well, it depends some on the nature of the agreement entered into between the miners and the operators.

Commissioner COMMONS. How about Illinois?

Mr. LAWSON. I think the Illinois agreement has such a clause in its contract, but I am now speaking offhand. There are so many that I can not keep them all in my mind.

Commissioner COMMONS. I think it is a provision that there will be no stoppage of the work pending the settlement of the grievances?

Mr. LAWSON. We have in our contract in Colorado such a clause; if it is considered material I will read it into the record, but it is along the same line. It states how grievances will be taken up.

Commissioner COMMONS. I think that would be an essential thing in an agreement from the operators' standpoint, that what he is after in all these cases is to stop these short strikes and thus be able to fulfill his contract for delivery of coal. Would that not be essential to the operator?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes. There are several things that might be a cause for men to refuse to work, even with an agreement, that are not touched on in the agreement.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is what I want to get at also; I would like to know, from your standpoint, seeing that the big thing in these agreements is to prevent strikes.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. What is your justification for such strikes as have taken place in violation of agreement?

Mr. LAWSON. I can not tell you, of course, what the justification for strikes in violation of agreement would be, but there are one or two things that might occur that would bring about a strike notwithstanding an agreement. For illustration, there is a checkweighman on the tippie, and the scales have gone wrong, and the company refuses to fix the scale, and the men go to work this morning, for illustration, and the scales have not been fixed and they do not weigh correctly or exactly, and the men know they can not get their correct weights, and the checkweighman has no way of checking the proper weight. He might tell the men, "I can not guarantee you proper weights this morning because I have discovered the scales are not weighing correctly, and I have so reported, but they refuse to fix them." In my judgment where the wages of the men are put in that position, and they can not get their just weights, it might be that the men would refuse to go down in the mine, and say, "We will not send coal over the scale if they have been notified they are not correct and will not fix them."

And then again if a condition is discovered in the mine where the air is extremely bad and the health of the men is endangered by going in and the mine owners have been notified by the pit committee or pit boss, but pay no attention to it, as I have known of in many instances—under such circumstances the men may be justified in refusing to work under those conditions.

Then there are other conditions that the men might object to that might be extremely dangerous to life and limb, and an explosion might be imminent in a mine because of the nature of the different gases and the dust in the mine. Now, the company may have understood that and the men discovered this condition, and I want to say in connection with that that I have gone in mines and worked in mines when the men in the mine realized that there was a very great danger of an explosion at any time. Now, it probably sounds off color to say that I have worked under those conditions, but I have and other men have, because they did not have any other place to go, and if they made a complaint that they were not going to be able to stay there they would probably lose their jobs. But in union mines the workmen can not work under those conditions, because the pit boss would report to the men that it was discovered that the mine was dangerous, that there was fire in a certain portion and gas in another and there was danger of a gas explosion—because the State law applies to that—and the mine is saturated with moisture or adobe dust, and the mine is dangerous and the men know this circumstance, and like circumstances would in my mind be a justification for refusing to go into the mine, notwithstanding a contract which does not specify those exact things.

Commissioner COMMONS. In this report which you make state, in the case of each of these shutdowns, what the grievance was and whether it was covered by the agreement.

Mr. LAWSON. Very well.

Commissioner COMMONS. You have already got down the procedure as to whether it was taken up by the pit committee, and so on?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. What years do you want?

Commissioner LEXNON. I should say either 1912 and 1913 or 1913 and 1914; two years ought to be sufficient.

Commissioner COMMONS. It is understood then it is to be for 1913 and 1914, that they will be the years.

Now, could you, in making that report also report the same facts as to the anthracite coal fields?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. And in addition to that will you not only send a copy to us, but also send a copy to the operators, to the secretaries of the operators' associations?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; Mr. Commissioner, I would be glad to do that. In getting this record naturally I will be compelled to get it through the national secretary and his office, and I will request them to do this. I will tell them you have requested it.

Commissioner COMMONS. So that the operators concerned may see the report you send to us.

Mr. LAWSON. You want it made public, in other words?

Commissioner COMMONS. I want the operators to send us a report also.

Mr. LAWSON. You want the operators to send you a report?

Commissioner COMMONS. Yes; I want them to send us a report on the report you send and which will be sent to them.

Commissioner COMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I would have it noted in the minutes that our secretary be requested to ask the operators to send us in the report.

Chairman WALSH. This witness need not ask for any report from the operators' association.

Mr. LAWSON. I understand, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. Let the Director of Investigation and Research for the commission call upon the coal operators for the—now just put in the list, Mr. Commons.

Commissioner COMMONS. Notify the coal operators that Mr. Lawson through his executive secretary, is that it?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; the international secretary.

Commissioner COMMONS. International secretary will send to them a report of the following points: That this commission request them to examine that report and send in to the commission their comments on the report so submitted.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir. And will you kindly add: That a copy of the operators' report shall be sent to our international office?

Commissioner COMMONS. And that a copy of the operators report be furnished to whom?

Mr. LAWSON. International offices of the United Mine Workers of America.

Commissioner COMMONS. I think that is all.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to submit some questions to you which I will do categorically. I have been asked first [reading]: "If precisely the same condition in the mines—that is, physical dangers to the miners—such as you have indicated, and other matters, would not justify the operators and owners from stopping the operations and excluding the miners, notwithstanding the contract provided for no cessation of work during disputes?"

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is the first question. Here are a series of questions which I will ask [reading]: "Has any individual a right to invest his money in the securities of industrial corporations like the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., for instance?"

Mr. LAWSON. I suppose they have the right, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "If so, must the investor be a resident of the State in which the company is located?"

Mr. LAWSON. I do not think so.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "Must he live on the job, so to speak—that is, in the town or camp in which the company's work is located?"

Mr. LAWSON. I am not sure about that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I am afraid you do not understand the question. If a man invests in securities of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. he is required to live in the place where the mines are being operated? I mean by law or under the law.

Mr. LAWSON. No; not to my knowledge, I should say.

Chairman WALSH. He buys the securities in the open market like anyone else, any security, and, of course, he can reside wherever he pleases?

Mr. LAWSON. That is my understanding, but I do not want to quote the law. The law is such a peculiar thing.

Chairman WALSH. These questions have been brought to me, and they involve some legal questions. So kindly do your best to answer them categorically.

Mr. LAWSON. Of course—

Chairman WALSH. And if you do not understand them I will elucidate them as far as I can.

The next question is [reading]: "How can he reside on the job if a company has work in several towns or camps in more than one State?" What is your answer to that?

Mr. LAWSON. He can not reside on the job very long unless the company wants to let him stay, not in our part of the country particularly.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "If he has the right to invest in the securities of any industrial corporation which may be offered to him, and it is not compulsory that he live on the job, is it necessary that he take any action to control or influence the management of the corporation because of his investment?"

Mr. LAWSON. Well, I suppose if he is a stockholder or a holder of bonds he would be entitled to the same rights that other men have, but I do not think he should. I do not know how he would go about it to secure the desired end.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "What would be the effect upon the management of any industrial corporation having several thousand investors on its list of security holders if each one of the investors attempted to control or influence the management of the corporation?"

Mr. LAWSON. Well, I do not know what the influence would be, Mr. Chairman. I can not tell you that.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "How much new capital could industrial corporations hope to obtain the use of if the present attitude of labor is continued, and labor insists upon a voice in the management of the industry, which voice would naturally give labor the control of both the industry and of the funds of investors tied up in the securities of industrial corporations?"

Mr. LAWSON. Well, there seems to be several points in that question. But it seems to me that when the time comes when labor is more generally recognized and gets more of the things that they produce I imagine there will be a great deal more capital invested in many ways; there would not be so much of it tied up in a manner that it is tied up to-day and not being put in use. For illustration, in such manner as the foundation that we are discussing here has tied up the funds.

Chairman WALSH. So that your answer to that, then, is that you think new capital would go in? I do not know who sent in these questions, but I want them to be very fully answered by you, if you can. Of course if you do not know and you can not answer it, you may say so. I will read this over again, because it is not clear in my own mind whether you have fully answered it or not.

Mr. LAWSON. The question is not clear in my mind.

Chairman WALSH. I will read it over again: "How much new capital could industrial corporations hope to obtain the use of if the present attitude of labor is continued and labor insists upon a voice in the management of the industry, which voice would naturally give labor the control of both the industry and of the funds of investors tied up in the securities of industrial corporations?"

Mr. LAWSON. Well, I do not see that giving the labor a voice—giving them an equal voice in the sale of their labor—will make any particular difference so far as the investment of capital is concerned. In fact, I think it will help bring more capital on the market, because it will settle to a large degree this industrial unrest, and because of the fact that labor, and not capital, is the basis of all value, I think it would increase the very things that we hope to bring about instead of decreasing them. I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, that that is a proper answer, even.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that it is. Col. Weinstock?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The writer of the question assumes that a voice means control, and Mr. Lawson says that a voice does not necessarily mean control.

Chairman WALSH. I think that fully covers it.

Mr. LAWSON. It does not mean control.

Chairman WALSH. Maybe you had better explain. The writer of this question, Col. Weinstock, seems to assume that labor insisting upon a voice means that it insists upon a part in the management of the plant in other respects than related to labor conditions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The assumption in that question as I see it, Mr. Chairman, is that voice means control. As a matter of fact, voice does not necessarily mean control.

Chairman WALSH. With that view of what I think about it, and what Col. Weinstock sees, maybe you can make a further answer. And there is not any question, so far as the United Mine Workers of America—their organization—is concerned, that they do not try to control the coal-mining industry at all.

Mr. LAWSON. And they concede to the operator this one thing—we find it in article 5 in the copy of the agreement from district 15, Colorado—the right to hire and discharge, the management of the mine, and direction of the working force is vested exclusively in the operator, and the United Mine Workers of America shall not abridge this right. The intention of this provision in regard to the discharge of employees or the refusal of employment or applications because of personal prejudice in matters affecting the operator or the United Mine Workers of America. But the right to hire and discharge is vested exclusively in the operators. They do not ask to control the industry, Mr. Chairman, but they do ask the right to sell their labor collectively. They contend they are entitled to that right.

Chairman WALSH. The next question [reading]: "What would be the condition of labor to-day if people who have had funds for investment had not put some of their money into securities of industrial corporations without regard to the present-day attitude of labor?"

Mr. LAWSON. I do not believe there would be so many unemployed in the country if there was not so much money tied up and kept tied up in that way.

Chairman WALSH. Would not the present condition of unemployment be largely overcome if labor were to cease its attacks upon industry and the funds invested therein, and thereby offer the greatest possible assistance to industry and investors in an endeavor to restore prosperity?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir, Mr. Chairman; I expect there would probably be a great change come over this country and over the world if labor would cease its agitation. I think in a very few years there would not be any so-called unrest amongst the unemployed. They would be beyond that condition of creating unrest. There would not be anyone in this country who would dare open his mouth or say he was dissatisfied, any more than a coal miner can in one of the closed camps, of which the C. F. & I have 15 in Colorado—go in there and say, "I am dissatisfied; I have been robbed; or, have not been given my just weights and just wages or conditions"; and all the working people of the United States would be in that same identical condition. And that is why this unrest would be done away with.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say "closed camps." You don't mean union camps?

Mr. LAWSON. No; I mean closed against everybody by the company.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is what you mean by "closed camp"?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes; the closed camps of southern Colorado are called closed camps, because the company owns the ground, owns the homes, owns the stores, the post-office building, the saloons, the church if there be one, the school, and the recreation, and owns the camp marshals, and owns, in fact, everybody; and the officials of the town—I say they own them, for they control them. That is what I mean when I say a "closed camp."

Chairman WALSH. That is all. You will be excused now permanently.

Dr. Kirchwey will take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF DR. GEORGE W. KIRCHWEY.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly state your name, Doctor?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. George W. Kirchwey.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside, please.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. At 800 Riverside Drive, in this city.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession, please?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am a lawyer; a professor of law in Columbia University.

Chairman WALSH. You were formerly dean of the Columbia Law School, I think?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes, sir; for a good many years.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you, covering what period of years, Doctor?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. 1901 to 1911, approximately; let us say, 10 years.

Chairman WALSH. Ten years, about. In these various relations you have made a special study of constitutional and corporation law both as applying to business operations and eleemosynary and charitable and philanthropic institutions?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I have been called upon to make some study of those topics in the law; yes.

Chairman WALSH. As we understand, you have made a study for this commission of the present legal powers of the Rockefeller Foundation, have you not?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I have.

Chairman WALSH. At the same time you have examined the law which would govern any foundation similarly incorporated, have you not?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Inevitably.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask you now, Doctor, categorically, what is it, under its present charter, that the Rockefeller Foundation could not do? First, might it circulate a presidential message or a party platform or a criticism of a church or religious body?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am inclined to think, Mr. Chairman, that all those questions could be answered better together than separately.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be kind enough, Doctor, just to go through the list, if you have it there—

Dr. KIRCHWEY (interrupting). Yes, sir; I have.

Chairman WALSH. I suppose these questions you have seen?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; they were submitted to me last evening.

Chairman WALSH. I wish, then, that you would, in your own way, proceed and state what things the Rockefeller Foundation could or could not do under its present charter.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. By the present charter there is a very wide discretion vested in the trustees or directors, as well as a very extensive power vested in the corporation. It is, as you know, incorporated for the purpose of receiving and maintaining a fund or funds and applying the income and principal thereof to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world. And it is provided in the second section of the act that it may deal with and expend the income and principal of the corporation in such manner as in the judgment of the trustees will best promote its objects. That appears, upon the face of it, to vest pretty nearly absolute power without restriction of law in the corporation as administered by its trustees.

I am of opinion, however, that notwithstanding the wide discretion vested in the directors by the act incorporating the foundation, the foundation is restrained by general law from doing anything not comprehended within its expressed purpose. Any grant of power, however broad, is subject to this general principle affecting all corporations. A corporation as such, if we may assume a corporation to be incorporated without any specific granted power, as for example, if an act should be passed by the New York Legislature constituting this body a corporation, and saying nothing further, the corporation would have only two or three rights which inhere in the corporation by its very nature, the right to sue in its corporate name, the right to be sued as a corporation, and the right to have what is called perpetual succession. It would have no power to do anything else, not even to sneeze without special legislative permission. Any further power, in other words, must be derived from the acts creating it, from the expressed grant of authority contained in the act. What its directors think to be for the well-being of mankind, then, in the case of the Rockefeller Foundation, is not the test of its capacity. It can not, for example, do an act concededly immoral or illegal, as compounding a felony, or promoting immorality, or, shall I say, lending money at usurious rates of interest.

And, then, a corporation of this character is restricted by certain special laws. For example, a corporation not organized under the banking law or specially empowered to carry on a banking business is prohibited by law from carrying on a banking business. The constitution of the State forbids the legislature by special act to authorize any corporation to lay down railroad tracks. Therefore no right in the Rockefeller Foundation exists to lay down railroad tracks or could be inferred from the most general language of the act creating it. It is, in the same way, prohibited from exercising any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise. It is also prohibited in the same way by the same constitutional provision from receiving any grant or power to construct public bridges except under certain circumstances in certain places. The constitution also prohibits any grant of municipal aid to a corporation of this character. About all these things there is not and can not be any question, notwithstanding, that is to say, the liberal language of the act incorporating the Rockefeller Foundation. It is restricted by positive law in the matters and in the instances I have referred to.

As to the other acts which may be assumed to be exercised, the question is, Do they come within the authority conferred by the charter, or do they not? and the answer to this question rests, as I have said, not with the trustees of the corporation but with the courts. As to any act of the corporation, the question may be raised whether it is or is not guilty of having exercised a privilege or franchise not conferred upon it by law. The question may be raised by methods provided by statute, and the determination of the question rests, in the analysis, as I have said, with the courts.

Then, if I may turn back to the specific cases put in this question, Might the Rockefeller Foundation circulate a presidential message or party platform or a criticism of a church or religious body? There is nothing in the law that I have found prohibiting an individual or a corporation, or prohibiting a corporation of this character from doing that—from doing any of those things. The question is a question of judicial interpretation of the charter powers, and the question might present itself in this form: Is the act of circulating a presidential message or party platform or the criticism of a church or religious body an act promoting the well-being of mankind?

Chairman WALSH. Who would bring the lawsuit?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. The question may be raised in one of two several ways; ordinarily by a proceeding instituted by the attorney general by leave of the supreme court to which he has applied, the proceeding being for the dissolution of the corporation. Another proceeding which may be instituted under a variety of circumstances would be for a justice of the supreme court of the State to exercise his visitatorial power, which he may do on the application of a creditor or a member of the corporation, not of the general public. In the exercise of that visitatorial power a justice of the supreme court, or a person designated by him for the purpose, may make such an inquisition as this commission is making, may inquire into the proceedings, the state of the funds or finances of the Rockefeller Foundation; it may embody its findings in the form of an order or judgment, and that order or judgment becomes then the basis of further proceedings to be brought, as in the other case, by the attorney general.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed, if you please, Doctor.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. May I add that in either of these cases, whichever method of procedure is adopted, the corporation may be restrained by injunction pending the suit from the wrongful use or misuse of its powers.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed Doctor, through that list and state what these foundations might do prima facie under the powers given them by such a charter as the one you have under consideration.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I will reread the first question: "Might it circulate a presidential message or a party platform or a criticism of a church or religious body? Might it distribute editorials praising public officials or criticizing them? Might it confine its benevolent service to the organization of business enterprises? Might it conduct a propaganda against trade-unions? Or against workmen's compensation acts? Or against widows' pensions? Might it finance institutions opposed to trade-unions or circulate their literature? Might it furnish publicity agents to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? Might it hire strike breakers?"

My answer is that it might conceivably do any of these things, no one of these acts being specifically forbidden by law. I began by enumerating the things a corporation can not do; I omitted one. The Rockefeller Foundation can not establish a hospital or dispensary under the name of "Lucretia Mott"; that is one of the whimsical prohibitions sometimes found in the law; it is an absolute prohibition in the exercise of its powers.

No one of these things I have read, nine possible exercises of its activity—no one of these is actually prohibited by law. Each one of these raises the question as to whether the act performed is or is not in the interest of—is a promotion of the well-being of mankind; and it will, in any case, be for the court to determine whether it is so or not. To my mind some of them would be clearly sustained by the courts as a proper exercise of the powers conferred on it. I think we must assume that the circulation of a presidential message contributes to the well-being of mankind; politically, I think we are bound to assume that.

Chairman WALSH. Or a party platform?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; a party platform. I am not so sure about the criticism of a church or religious body. The court might divide on that, and it might think it was very undesirable that a private corporation should engage in religious propaganda.

Chairman WALSH. Courts might divide on any of these things?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; might divide on anything, I was going to say, except the circulation of a presidential message or a party platform, but they might divide on party lines possibly with respect to either one of these, in a given case.

Chairman WALSH. Now, using its funds for distribution of editorials praising public officials or criticizing them?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I see some objections to that myself. I am not sure that the court of appeals of this State would sustain me in a given case, however. There, again, it is a question for the discretion of the court.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed that the Rockefeller Foundation has instituted what they call an intensive investigation and an inquiry into the industrial relations of the United States and the world?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I have, indeed.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed that it has been testified by one of the trustees that funds could be used in this wise: That a statement made as to the proper conduct of an industry, the application of so-called democracy to industry, or of union principles or of nonunion principles could be circulated without stint—that is, that it was within their powers to do all of them, to circulate literature of that kind; that is, their conception of it?

Now, what do you think of that as a matter of law; could they do that? Or to put it this way—to put it in a concrete way—I will say this: For instance, that Mr. John R. Lawson, who has just been upon the witness stand here, for instance, makes a speech in the city of Denver in which he laid down what he understood to be the correct humane principle in the conduct of relations between the employer and employees, and that it could be assumed to be correct and a proper statement; that another person could make a statement, a contrast statement containing sophistries, false statement of basic economics, and such things as that, and then that this foundation as a foundation could conclude that the one which was truthful they should say nothing about and the sophistical one could be circulated to the extent that they desired it to be circulated, and all the funds necessary to be used from the income of the foundation should be used in that way. Now, I have stated the matter broadly. But the answer was that they believed that was strictly within their powers and rights.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am inclined to think that that was a correct answer. The power lodged in this corporation necessarily, I should say, carries with it the power to abuse and to mislead, as well as to lead aright, public opinion by any educational method.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and you may assume that perhaps they did not know it was sophistical.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am assuming, of course, that they are acting in good faith.

Chairman WALSH. I am assuming that; that they did not know they could do it.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. They could do that.

Chairman WALSH. And thus establish broadcast a system of false education, improper information?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I think there is no doubt that that is within their power, unless the matter circulated by them was so offensive to public opinion, so contrary to the trend of opinion or of morality in this country, that the courts would regard it as being contrary to the best interests of humanity, rather than a promotion of them.

There, again, we always come back to that question, as to the attitude of the judiciary, reflecting or not reflecting, as the case may be, the public opinion of the day.

Chairman WALSH. Under the present state of the law could the courts intervene if the matter published were not libelous?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. No; not directly.

Chairman WALSH. And they would have the right, under the general rule of free speech, to utter anything that they wished, being responsible only to those individuals who were damaged thereby?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. So, how would the public get at it if they did conclude to follow out a system of false education of the masses?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. In one of two ways: Either by the method I have suggested, of proceedings instituted for purposes of inquiry, and then the dissolution of the corporation; or by legislative action. I know of no other way.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you may run through those questions: "Might it conduct a propaganda against trade-unions?"

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Might I take the preceding one first, "C"?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. "Might it confine its benevolent service to the organization of business enterprises?"

That, I should say, comes very close to the danger line, and one is almost justified in saying that the organization of business enterprises for private profit, or merely for the profit of the corporation, is not a proper exercise of its functions, which, on the face of it, appear to be purely benevolent.

The organization is what in law is called a charitable trust, and I should say that if it goes outside the scope of a charity and engages in business that its activities would be likely to be condemned as not coming within the scope of the charter.

Chairman WALSH. The representative of the founder, himself one of the trustees, says he so interprets that they could build model tenements.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. That, I am inclined to think, they might do. Remember, I restricted my answer to the case of business enterprises whose primary object was profit. I do not believe they could engage in the manufacture of munitions of war for sale, for example, for profit. But I do not see why they could not spend their money in building model tenements, that being an accepted method of benevolence and of the amelioration of the condition of the congested masses of our society.

Chairman WALSH. Could the law then limit them renting the houses for the strict amount, or could they charge interest on the investment?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Oh, I suppose they could do the latter.

Chairman WALSH. And then put that into something else?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Doubtless.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. "Might it conduct a propaganda against trade-unions?"

Doubtless, if the directors honestly believed and the court of last resort before which the question comes also believes that it is in the interest of humanity that trade-unions should be put down, doubtless they might do so. Of course, the security that we have against any particular exercise of its activities is the state of public opinion, which is to a greater or less degree reflected in the attitude of the courts.

Chairman WALSH. And could we take the experience that this country has had with reference to righting other abuses as a sort of indication of the effort that would be required to be made and the length of time taken to correct any such abuses?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I think we might draw some reasonable inference not too definite in character. It takes a long time. At the same time there is this to be said: Let us assume that the Rockefeller Foundation devotes itself to a widespread, sweeping, direct attack on trade-unions. I take it that the trade-union principle has become so well established as a matter of economic policy in the United States, as well as in England and in Europe generally, that it is fair to assume that the court before which the question would come as to whether such was or was not a proper use of the corporation's funds would to-day—any court of appeals or supreme court in the land—find that it was an improper use. I should expect that, without finding it necessary as a preliminary to educate public opinion and through public opinion to educate the courts.

Chairman WALSH. But that would have to be a sweeping denunciation of a principle that you believe to be accepted as a correct one by mankind in general?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I will put another concrete case to you to see whether or not the courts would interfere, and also for you to say whether or not perhaps the same result, so far as misinformation and improper education would ensue, without judging at this time as to who was correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING, working for the Rockefeller Foundation alone, not for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., they being an entirely separate organization, except that certain directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. are also trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation, suggests a plan or scheme which is said by the controllers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to be collective bargaining. That is, that the workers have a certain representation in the mines under certain circumstances through which they may appeal to the owners, or the managers, and I will state it in its broad aspects. The men involved, we will say, if not all advocates of trade-union principles or of the present-day labor organizations as they are planned, do not so recognize it. Mr. John Mitchell—I will draw the parallel case—goes upon the witness stand and says that that is a sham and a fraud upon the workers; that it is not collective bargaining and it does not so work out. Do you believe that the plan of Mr. Mackenzie King, even assuming that it is what Mr. Mitchell says it is, could not be circulated by the funds of this foundation with which he is connected, to any extent, without the intervention of the courts? Would that question not be such a broad one and so capable of different construction that the courts would not interfere?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am quite clear that in such a case, there being room for difference of opinion, and there being actual difference of opinion among fair-minded, intelligent people, I am quite clear that is a case in which the courts would not feel justified in interfering—because, remember, that interference means dissolution of the corporation, which is a rather drastic remedy.

Chairman WALSH. I did not understand that, Doctor, as a matter of law, then, the interference would have to be; that is, if taken by the present legal means that you have referred to, would mean that they dissolved the corporation, and then the capital would return to the donor or the heirs?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. That is a delicate question, but I should be very much surprised if the deed of trust conveying Mr. Rockefeller's millions to this corporation had not provided for that. And if it has provided for it in legal form, then the matter is settled.

Chairman WALSH. But if it does not provide?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. If it is not provided for in any such way, why, then, I imagine the old rule of the common law would apply, that upon the dissolution of the corporation its real property—I mean the real property conveyed to it for the purposes of the trust—would revert to the donors. But I believe there was no real property so transferred.

Chairman WALSH. No. It seems to be all personal.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. And the personal property would be forfeited to the State. But I presume that the matter was not left in that predicament.

Chairman WALSH. No audible expression please, ladies and gentlemen. We must proceed without it. Now, just go on down the line with those questions.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Well, the next two or three questions might easily be grouped together: "Might it conduct a propaganda against workmen's compensation acts, or against widows' pensions?"

Well, the principle of the workmen's compensation act has become more firmly established than that of the widows' pension; yet there is still a great deal of doubt in the community as to the one of those that has been accepted—the workmen's compensation principle.

I find many very intelligent people, mostly employers and people closely connected with employers in a professional capacity, who are still hostile to the principles of the workmen's compensation acts. I should say that there was grave doubt as to whether the court would interfere with the Rockefeller Foundation by dissolution or otherwise if it undertook to use its funds in an educational campaign against workmen's compensation acts, even, or against widows' compensation.

The same thing might be said with reference to "G": "Might it finance institutions opposed to trade-unions or circulate their literature?"

Obviously, if it may conduct a campaign against trade-unions, and obviously not, if it can not. As I said before, I should say it depends entirely on whether it is a broad, sweeping attack on the trade-union principle, and perhaps a little bit upon the question of the particular court it came before, because judges differ also, as well as other men.

"Might it furnish publicity agents to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?"

I should say that was extremely doubtful because of the fact that it is promoting a specific business enterprise, and it would, I think, be very hard for it to persuade a respectable court that was not wholly under the influence, let us say, of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., that that was a proper use of the corporation's funds.

"Might it hire strike breakers?"

I should say in the present state of public and judicial opinion, yes. Perhaps 10 years from now, no. It depends upon the progress of public opinion in the meantime.

Chairman WALSH. Then the underlying idea that you have is that, as Judge Holmes expressed it, law is the final crystallization of what the people think?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. It is undoubtedly that, judge-made law.

Chairman WALSH. And a good deal would depend on the attitude that the judge took toward labor unions?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. A good deal would depend upon the attitude of the individual judge. An individual judge does not necessarily reflect public opinion. He may be in advance of public opinion, or he may be, as Mr. A. V. Dicey, of England, says, "two generations behind it." But Mr. Dicey was speaking, I hasten to say, of English judges when he said that.

Chairman WALSH. All of these things being true, Doctor, what would you think about the lawmaking body placing any restrictions upon a fund of that kind that might seem necessary to guard against a present-day abuse, or any abuses in the future which might come from lack of knowledge, from bias, one way or the other, or from design?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Mr. Chairman, if the supreme authority to frame such regulations could be committed to you and me, I should be strongly in favor of our undertaking the task. I am a little afraid of committing it, if I may say so without being guilty of high treason, to a legislative body. I am not sure that a legislative body has the insight into conditions. I am not sure that it has the prevision or foresight that would be needed to effect a radical reconstruction at any rate of such a character as this. I am not undertaking to say that some restriction may not be necessary. I only mean that I have not complete confidence in the agencies at hand for effecting those restrictions. It is, of course, clear, I suppose it is undisputed, that the legislature has very ample power in the way of modifying or altering, and complete power of repealing, the charter of such a corporation as this.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you that, Doctor: Under the present law a charter could be vacated, a corporation annulled, and the grant of the corporation annulled on the ground also that the privileges and franchises have been forfeited by failure to exercise its powers?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes. That is not a legislative annulment that is intended there. I take it to mean an annulment by judicial proceedings. It is a fact that a failure to exercise its powers is a ground for instituting proceedings for the dissolution of a corporation. The right to dissolve, however, is not absolute in such a case, but is largely a matter in the discretion of the court, to determine whether the suspension of its powers was justifiable or not under existing conditions.

Chairman WALSH. We have some questions to ask under "A," "B," and "C." Have you those questions there?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please take them up and answer them?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. The first: "Would failure to spend half of its income be failure to exercise its privileges?" "(B) Would failure to use 75 per cent of its income be failure to exercise its privileges?" And "(C) Would failure during a period of one year or two years constitute failure to exercise its privileges?"

The only one of those three questions with regard to which we have a specific provision of law, is the third. It is expressly provided by the general corporation law of this State that the failure of a corporation during a period of one year to exercise its privileges is a cause of forfeiture and proceedings may be instituted in the usual way by the attorney general in order to bring about such forfeiture. And in that case and, I believe, in that case only, if the attorney general fails to act for a period of two months after being requested to do so and having the case before him, a creditor or a member of the corporation may proceed to have it wound up. But not, again I say, any member of the general public, the attorney general being deemed to be the representative of the public for such purposes.

With regard to the other cases, I should say that unless the failure to spend 50 or 75 per cent of the income were continued for a considerable number of years, and even then, unless the court should regard the procedure as having some ulterior, secret, and improper motive—I do not see how the mere failure to spend half or three-quarters of the income could be regarded as a failure to exercise its powers, because there must, after all, be a very considerable discretion vested in the corporation to determine the rate at which its income shall be spent. It may, perhaps, properly save three-quarters of its income this year in order to have a very much greater amount to devote to some great purpose the next year.

Chairman WALSH. The present law, it seems, Doctor, does not require that the foundation shall publish the record of its transactions under those circumstances. How is the public to learn whether the foundation's conduct calls for the intervention of the attorney general, as you suggest in your previous answer?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Well, the corporation is liable to be attacked by legal proceedings, instituted, as I have pointed out, for the purpose of winding it up and putting it out of business, for any one of the following purposes and reasons: Offending against any provision of the act by or under which it was created, altered, or renewed, or any act amending the same; violating any provision of law whereby it has forfeited its charter or become liable to be dissolved for abuse of its power; forfeiting its privileges or franchises by failure to exercise its powers, or exercising a privilege or franchise not conferred by law. Perhaps it is not necessary to analyze those various grounds, for they run into one another.

Chairman WALSH. But how is the public going to get at it?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. In one or both of two ways; by laborious or cumbrous inquisition, to be conducted under the inquisitorial power of a justice of the supreme court, as pointed out by me before, which becomes a matter of public record.

Chairman WALSH. But the public would have to get the justice of the supreme court to consent to this in the first instance.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. The judge is required, if a case is made out, to institute such an inquisition on the demand of a creditor or member of the corporation, not of a member of the general public. This inquisition is, of course, a public matter.

Chairman WALSH. There would be no creditor of this corporation. That would apply, perhaps, only to business corporations?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. No; I suppose there would be no creditor of this corporation.

Chairman WALSH. It would have to be a member of the corporation?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How would the public get at it, then? Supposing that some individual was animated with a very deep idea that all was not proper; say, that he was a needleworker on the East Side or a miner in Colorado or a thinker or a writer or something of that sort, how would he have to go at it?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. He would apply to the attorney general to institute proceedings.

Chairman WALSH. Nothing could be done, in this inquisitorial matter, in that way?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. No; not unless he could get a member of the corporation to apply to the court for such an investigation.

Chairman WALSH. We will assume for the purposes of this question he could not; what would he do then?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. He could do nothing under existing circumstances except to secure the cooperation of the attorney general. It seems to me, if I may interject something which I think is relevant, Mr. Chairman, that the remedies open to the public are defective in one or two respects. The courts had no power to grant an injunction to restrain a corporation from an improper exercise of power, excepting in connection with proceedings instituted by the court, as I have pointed out before, on a motion of a member or creditor, or as an incident of proceedings instituted by the attorney general.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, this construction could not be placed upon that, could it, Doctor? That a person or class of persons that clearly needed the relief and that clearly came within the expressed policies under the by-laws of the organization, under no circumstances could be deemed a creditor?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Under no circumstances; no. Then another objection, it seems to me, to the present list of remedies is that the courts have no power to compel the attorney general to proceed against a corporation. The matter is left wholly to his discretion, and he exercises that discretion in instances that have come under my observation, very freely, sometimes, refusing to institute proceedings very wisely, I imagine. The only exception to that is where the corporation has for a year or more ceased to perform its functions. In that case a creditor or stockholder may institute proceedings for dissolution of a corporation, the attorney general having neglected to perform his duty. In all cases, however, it is the duty of the attorney general—not only his right but his duty—to institute proceedings in a proper case, and I suppose a gross violation of duty in that respect would render him liable to political penalties.

Chairman WALSH. Would there be any other approach except these you have mentioned on the part of the public to apply?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. There is no other approach by legal proceedings. What remains is to provide for publicity. I think that is of the first importance, that the public shall be informed and kept informed with regard to the doings and even the plans of corporations wielding such extensive power over the public.

Chairman WALSH. And that would depend entirely upon the integrity and freedom of the press? The people as a whole, perhaps, would have no other definite means of publicity.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. No; not under existing conditions.

Chairman WALSH. In your informal report to this commission, please—I believe you reported as to the provision of the constitution of New York with reference to the requirements for setting out in the titles of these bills the subjects of them. I wish you would state what the requirement of the constitution of New York is and whether or not it has been met in the instances of the Rockefeller and Carnegie Foundations. I believe the Carnegie, the Russell Sage, and the Rockefeller are all corporations of the State of New York.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. They are all corporations incorporated by special act of the Legislature of the State of New York.

Chairman WALSH. And I believe Mr. Greene stated yesterday that this bill was modeled after the bill of the other foundations.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. They are all almost identical in terms.

Chairman WALSH. Which one of the Carnegie institutions is so chartered?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. The Carnegie Corporation; the act is entitled, "An act to incorporate the Carnegie Corporation of New York." The act incorporating the Russell Sage Foundation is entitled "An act to incorporate the Russell Sage Foundation."

Chairman WALSH. What is the wording of the title of the act by which the Rockefeller Foundation is chartered, being chapter 488 of the New York statutes.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I have the act before me. It is entitled "An act to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation."

Chairman WALSH. Does the expression "An act to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation" define the subject of the act? Does the title fairly express the general purpose of the act under the constitution of New York?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Well, you have stated the provision of the constitution in your question. It expressly provides that no private or local bill which may be passed by the legislature of this State—each one of these corporations was created by such a private bill—shall embrace more than one subject, and that subject shall be expressed in the title.

My answer to your question can be only a matter of opinion, Mr. Chairman, as the question has not been so directly passed upon by the courts as to make it possible to give a dogmatic or even a very confident answer. I may say I have very grave doubts, however, as to the constitutionality of the acts incorporating these three great foundations.

Chairman WALSH. Please give the reasons for your opinion, stating as briefly as you possibly can, please, the decision upon which you base that opinion.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. No one decision covers it exactly, as I have said, or else I should be more confident.

Chairman WALSH. Is there something—

Dr. KIRCHWEY (interrupting). The general principle is that the title of a private bill or of a local bill must point out sufficiently to make it intelligible to the casual reader or to persons having dealings with the corporation created, the purposes of the corporation, the objects for which it is created. The case which I have in mind, and which comes nearest to involving this particular question is the case reported in 195 New York, at page 286, being the case of the Economic Power & Construction Co. v. The City of Buffalo. The Economic Power & Construction Co. was incorporated for the purpose of developing and distributing electric power to cities and villages of this State, and the court held that the act creating it was unconstitutional on the ground that the title of the act gave no notice whatever that within the act might be found a grant of the specific powers or franchises granted. There are numerous cases in this State in which the principle is discussed and certain discriminations made. I can cite those cases to you, but they are valuable mainly if not solely, because of the language employed by the courts in commenting upon the specific cases.

Chairman WALSH. If you will kindly just submit that into the record that will suffice, in so far as it supports your opinion, unless some of the commission would like to hear the cases cited. Would you, Dr. Commons?

Commissioner COMMONS. No.

Chairman WALSH. You may submit them into the record.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Very well.

Chairman WALSH. Please summarize the procedure by which the constitutionality of an act incorporating a private foundation might be tested, and indicate different steps that might be taken by other parties from which you can give this commission an estimate of the probable time that might be involved in securing a final decision.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. The question is a difficult one, because it is a little hard at first glance to see how a corporation of this kind can be haled into court for any reason excepting, as I pointed out, at the instance of the attorney general for a breach of its corporate franchise. It has, as you have pointed out, no creditors. If it were to issue bonds, then the question of the constitutionality or validity of the bonds could be raised, and then, indirectly in a suit by a private person, a bondholder, the question of the constitutionality of the act incorporating it could be tested. But I presume it is not going to do anything of that kind. It is simply going to go on with its educational, research, and other benevolent work. That does not, as you point out, create any rights. Nobody becomes a creditor by reason of his reasonable expectation of a benefit. And the result is that the question can be raised in only one way, and that a way, so far as I have been able to discover from my rather hasty examination of that question, which has not yet been attempted.

The attorney general may institute quo warranto proceedings to inquire by virtue of what authority these particular gentlemen, who are merely private citizens, are venturing to perform the functions of a corporation, when, in fact, they are not a corporation because of the invalidity of the act under which they are professing to act. I can think of no other way in which the result can be achieved, and so we come back to the same old situation, that the attorney general, as the legal agent and representative of the public, is the one person and the only person who can make the requisite inquiry and secure the application of the proper legal remedy.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything in the charter of the Rockefeller Foundation which would prevent its spending its money to defend the constitutionality of the act?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Nothing whatever.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything in the charter which would prevent the foundation spending money and hiring lecturers and circulating editorials, buying advertising space in the newspapers, or from instituting and conducting a lobby to prevent the repeal of the act or the amendment of its charter?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Nothing whatever, always conceding that those acts and efforts, like that and others that might be enumerated, are for the well-being of mankind; and I suppose the protection of a trust fund against an attack from outside, which is conceived to be an illegitimate attack, and to which defense is made in good faith—I suppose that might be regarded as coming within the general purposes of the corporation.

Chairman WALSH. Whatever you have stated with respect to the Rockefeller charter would apply to any charter of any institution along the same lines?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. In the same terms as those incorporated in similar form.

Chairman WALSH. That is, having a title simply, for instance, of the Rockefeller Trust or Foundation?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The charter of the Russell Sage Foundation has the title "An act to incorporate the Russell Sage Foundation." Does this title state the purpose of the act?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I can not see how it can be argued that it does, unless it should be said, and unless it might be held by the court that the term "foundation" has acquired a distinctive signification by reason of its recent use, and has come to mean a foundation for promoting the well-being of humanity. It seems to me it would be straining a very good old-fashioned word to a considerable degree to put that interpretation upon it. Unless, however, the phrase "the Rockefeller Foundation" or "the Sage Foundation" or "the Carnegie Foundation" is construed somehow or other to embody in it the subject matter, the purpose, to which the foundation is to be devoted, we should have no clearer indication of its purpose than we should have if—well, if the legislature should incorporate the George W. Kirchwey Foundation, for example, or the George W. Kirchwey Corporation.

Chairman WALSH. They would have to imply in that event how much money you had?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Why the legislature would have to furnish me with an endowment as well as to direct me how to employ it.

Chairman WALSH. The title of the act, it may be observed, of the Carnegie Foundation, however, reads as follows: "An act to incorporate Carnegie Corporation of New York."

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does that present a different legal proposition?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. That presents possibly an opportunity for a different interpretation. I should say that the term "corporation" did not even remotely point to a benevolent end, while the term "foundation" might conceivably be interpreted to carry with it the implication of a benevolent or charitable purpose.

Chairman WALSH. Prof. Commons has some questions he would like to ask you, Doctor.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you answered fully what powers the legislature has of its own initiative, and without giving any reasons, to amend these foundations?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I have not gone very fully into that. I could perhaps supplement what I have said by a few words more on that point.

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, will you please state—

Dr. KIRCHWEY (interrupting). As the result of the reaction against the decision in the famous Dartmouth College case the constitutions of all our States, I imagine, contain, as the constitution of New York does, provisions which are to the effect that every charter thereafter to be granted by the legislature shall be subject to amendment, suspension, or repeal by the legislature; and in most of our States probably, if not all of them, as in New York, in the general incorporation law there is an additional provision to the same effect. So that there isn't any question that this act, however broad and sweeping its terms, is subject to be altered, suspended, or repealed by legislative act, and that power may be exercised by the legislature at its own sweet will, whether the corporation is accused or suspected of wrongdoing, or because the legislature is tired of its well-doing—in either case.

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, suppose an individual wished to have it amended or dissolved, the usual way and natural way for him to do would be for him to go to the legislature. I take it, putting this with your other answers.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Well, that is an easy way to start, though it may be a difficult process to get the amendment through, of course. I have sometimes found it difficult, so I speak from experience.

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, that is the procedure?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. He would not attempt all this judicial procedure you have previously described at all, but would have to go to the legislature.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Why, the individual would have to go to the legislature unless he could persuade the attorney general to act by judicial means; and I imagine that the judicial process would be a more expeditious one than the legislative process. I should think so.

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, the legislative process probably would involve a considerable public opinion having already been expressed, and a certain number of the legislature having joined in that public opinion.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes. There is this difference. If the violation of its powers by the corporation is considerable, if it is plain, then the judicial process would be a comparatively simple one and fairly expeditious. Whereas, even in that case, it might take two or three legislative campaigns before the legislation could be secured altering or revoking the charter.

Commissioner COMMONS. I take it the legislature, according to what you say, could adopt any administrative scheme of supervision, publicity, or regulation of these foundations that it chose.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I should say yes to that. The only restriction which the courts have placed upon its power is this: It may wholly repeal the act creating a corporation like this. It may to any reasonable degree alter or amend the act.

Now, it would be unreasonable and improper for it, under the guise of alteration of its charter, to convert the corporation into something wholly different from what it is—for instance, to convert a philanthropic trust into a manufacturing or water-power enterprise; but short of that, it has the power, and such power is practically unrestricted, and there can be no question of the right to set up any advisory or administrative functions of its own with the aim of securing publicity and public control.

Commissioner COMMONS. Suppose these foundations had been created as a trust instead of a corporation, what would be the legal situation in regard to these questions that have been raised? Could a trust be dissolved by judicial process, by legislative enactment?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Dealing with a pure trust is in some ways easier than dealing with a charitable corporation, because it does not involve the formidable proceedings for its dissolution. A trustee of a trust for a definite beneficiary can always be controlled by a court of equity, and any beneficiary of such a trust may come into court and demand that the trustees account; in other words, the supervision by the court is more intimate, more close and more effective than in the case of an ordinary corporation—in the case of what we may call a corporate trust. Of course, in dealing with such a trust it makes no difference whether the trustee is a corporation or an individual.

Commissioner COMMONS. Could the Legislature of Pennsylvania modify the Girard Corporation or Trust in the way in which you have described, with reference to these foundations and on what ground? Or why could it not?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. If it could not it would be only on the ground that there is no reserved power in the courts to alter the legal rights created by the trust.

Commissioner COMMONS. Was that a trust?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am not familiar with it; I was under the impression it was; it is always known as the Girard Trust.

Commissioner COMMONS. Could the Legislature of Pennsylvania modify it?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am not familiar with the constitution of Pennsylvania, but if it be, as I assume it to be, a pure trust with definite beneficiaries and not a mere corporation, exercising functions like the charitable functions of our corporations here, unless there is some special provision in the Pennsylvania constitution, I do not see how the legislature could materially modify such a trust. The legislature can no more modify a trust that it can take away my property without due process of law and without making due compensation. In other words, a trust is protected as any other estate, real or personal, is protected by the constitutional sanctions which have been thrown around property.

Commissioner COMMONS. Suppose the public opinion of Pennsylvania had reached the stage where it was dissatisfied with certain features of the Girard Foundation, are you in a position to tell how the State of Pennsylvania, or the authorities affected, could proceed to modify that trust or that foundation, whatever it may be?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Of course, everything depends on what it is; if it is a corporation like these we are discussing here, then the method of dealing with it is the same as that I have described, and the legislature has practically unrestrained power in dealing with it; if it is a pure trust—an administrative trust with definite beneficiaries, neither more or less than that—I do not see how property can be taken away from the trustees or the use of it materially affected, even in deference to public opinion, unless, under the exercise of the police power some general regulation should be adopted by the legislature prohibiting the use of the trust funds for certain purposes deemed inimical to the public interest. I can not think of any other way of modifying the trust. May I, for example, put a case in order to get your idea clear?

Commissioner COMMONS. Yes, sir.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Suppose the Girard Trust, assuming it to be a simple trust and not a charitable corporation, to make the rough distinction which we have been making here—suppose it should, its founder having been hostile to evangelistic religion—suppose it should undertake an active propaganda for breaking down all the religions that flourish in Pennsylvania, and suppose that Billy Sunday should previously have converted the people of Pennsylvania to such a frame of mind that this would be regarded as conduct seriously detrimental to the public welfare; in that case I doubt not that the Legislature of Pennsylvania could pass an act prohibiting the dissemination of irreligious or antireligious literature, and if the judges of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania should also have become sufficiently religious in the meantime, why, such legislation might be sustained as being a proper exercise of the police power.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would that police power apply in the State of New York with these foundations?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. That could be invoked?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; and that was a point not brought out in the direct examination, that the power of the legislature is not limited to altering, repealing, or abolishing a specific charter; it may enact general laws in the exercise of the police power which would seriously restrict the privileges of corporations, always assuming that those acts are sustained by the courts as a proper exercise of the police power.

Commissioner COMMONS. One question on a little different matter. I think you said this Rockefeller Foundation could employ strike breakers. Do you mean to say that, and following that out—did you understand what you answered? Do you know what a strike breaker is?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I do; and I think I must withdraw my answer if I said that. What I had in my mind was the question whether the Rockefeller Foundation could promote the employment of strike breakers. In my opinion, it certainly could not maintain an employment agency for strike breakers and use them directly for commercial purposes in breaking up strikes, if that is the meaning of the question?

Commissioner COMMONS. In what way could it promote the use of strike breakers?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Why, I am assuming, in making that qualification, that the public is not yet unanimously or even so generally convinced of the wickedness of employing strike breakers that we may count on a definite public opinion or a definite judicial pronouncement against the practice.

Commissioner COMMONS. By "promotion" you simply mean it may advocate the employment of strike breakers?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; I presume it might in the present state of public opinion advocate the use and employment of strike breakers.

Commissioner COMMONS. And defend the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. when it so employed strike breakers?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is as far as you intend to go?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; that is as far as I intend to go, and if I went further in my previous answer I shall have to take a backward step.

Commissioner COMMONS. In the exercise of the police power, could the State control the publications of this association or foundation?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I should think not, as a general proposition. It might enact a general law prohibiting certain classes of publications, but it seems to me it would clearly be outside any proper exercise of the police power—and by "proper" I mean likely to be sustained by the courts as proper—to prohibit the publication, the general publication, of matter by a particular corporation.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon has a question which he would like to propound.

Commissioner LENNON. Professor, under the powers granted to this corporation in the first instance, the board of directors or trustees are the ones that have sole power to pass on the subject matter as to what is for the welfare of mankind?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. The power rests with them?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. What is your opinion as to whether or not the investment of such power in the hands of a few men is promotive of industrial or social unrest? Does the existence of such corporations, vesting such great power in the hands of a few men, promote industrial or social unrest, or otherwise?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am inclined to think, Mr. Commissioner, that concentration of enormous wealth in the hands of any individual or corporation is probably productive of more or less discontent and unrest. I should say that the situation was distinctly bettered by the transfer of that enormous wealth from an individual who is legally irresponsible to a corporation which is legally, to a considerable degree at least, responsible to the public. I should not think, in other words, that the possession of great wealth by the Carnegie—by the Rockefeller Foundation—I should not think that would be as apt to cause irritation and discontent and unrest as the possession and conspicuous use of that same wealth by Mr. Rockefeller himself.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, in your replies to the several questions indicating the power of these few individuals to pass upon that marvelous question as to what is for the welfare of mankind, which does not rest with individuals—no individual has any such power vested in him by the legislature—they may exercise such power, but they have no such power granted by law, now does the vesting of such power in the hands of a few not tend to social unrest? I do not wish to urge any further answer if you do not wish to make one.

Dr. KIRCHWEY. My own feeling is that it may possibly produce such an effect through emphasizing the fact that the power exists in a given case. Possibly the legislature may, by calling attention to the existence of the power, give rise to a certain amount of such unrest; but my own impression has been that the exercise of that power, which everybody knows is practically untrammelled, by a single individual—my observation has led me to believe that that is very much more irritating and likely to cause unrest.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to inquire.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On the whole, Doctor, do you regard a foundation such as the Rockefeller Foundation an advantage or disadvantage to society?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. You are asking me to pass upon a question which the commissioner who just questioned me said was a very difficult thing for any individual or group of individuals to pass on, namely, what do the best interests of humanity require? My own personal opinion is that it marks a distinct advance in the direction of social well-being to have great wealth transferred from irresponsible private hands and placed in the responsible hands of a group of persons who are incorporated and supervised by the State; and that for two reasons: First, because of the fact that corporations are supervised, and there is an opportunity to require of them a degree of publicity and conformity to public opinion, which one can not exact of a private owner; and second, because the administration of a private fortune is apt to be personal and selfish and for the benefit of the family of the owner and not apt to be devoted to the same extent to the public interest.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I infer, then, from what you say, Doctor, that if you had the power you would rather encourage than discourage foundations like the Rockefeller Foundation?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. May I answer your question in a slightly different form? I would encourage the transfer of private wealth to quasi-public institutions: Whether in the last analysis such institutions or foundations are in the public interest, is a question I do not want to go into. It may well be that the world—that humanity—would be better and more virtuous if there were no accumulations of great wealth anywhere in the hands of the State, of corporations, or of individuals; but these accumulations do exist, and as long as they exist it seems to me that it is better that they should be in the hands of corporations under a public responsibility and under public control than in the hands of private individuals.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, from what you know of economic conditions, Doctor, do you think that our present industrial and commercial progress could have been possible if fortunes, for example, had been limited by law to say $1,000,000?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I am not a professed economist, but only a lawyer. My friends who are economists are divided in opinion on that question. I have always entertained the belief that the period of industrial development through the employment of great accumulations of capital was an essential phase of the development of industrial society. Whether that same result could have been secured through a wider distribution of capital and its concentration in some other form under laws preventing individual control, I think is a question that is fairly debatable.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson has some questions to ask.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Doctor, on that last question and answer as to your belief in regard to the creation of foundations; do you believe that—and I am only asking for an expression of opinion—do you believe that the passing of all of these foundations into quasi-public control would be beneficial?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Do you mean actual public control?

Commissioner GARRETSON. I would say actual domination by representatives of the public?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. I shall have to confess, in order to answer the question, that I am quite out of sympathy with the prevailing tendency to concentrate the actual administration of and control of private affairs in governmental hands. I do not mean by that that I do not believe that rigid inspection and supervision by the State of our industrial and benevolent corporations may not be necessary. I do believe that thoroughly, because I believe no man nor any group of men is quite great enough, quite good enough, to be trusted with the well-nigh absolute power which these great corporations would wield were it not for State control.

On the other hand, I do not see anything in our political experience to justify us in feeling very sanguine as to the benefits of political control or administration of such matters. We shall, doubtless, have more and more of that, and I presume that, like everybody else, as I become more and more socialized, or shall I say socialistic—which is the danger that we all stand in now—that I shall become reconciled to, and perhaps welcome, various forms of municipal and State ownership. But it will be a long time, I think, before I take the view that great charitable trusts could more safely, more wisely, and more disinterestedly be administered through political agencies than through private agencies which are rigidly supervised by the State.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It was in defense to that very existing opinion I used the term "quasi control," instead of actual, and afterwards modified it. You do, then, think and believe in supervision and regulation?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Distinctly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. As apart and from the individualist untrammelled control, either individual or a group, as in this case?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. By all means. As I have stated, I do not believe the individual exists, or the group of individuals, who can safely be trusted with unlimited power.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, under the legal remedies which you have named, if a foundation like this can maintain domination over the members of the corporation—that is, the trustee under this act, I believe—and are able by any means, legitimate or otherwise, to secure nonaction from the attorney general, there is no legal remedy open?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. There is no remedy by legal process open. What remains is to secure, through public opinion, legislative action.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am using legal in the sense of court processes?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; you are quite right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, the only thing open is legislative action in one of two ways, either general or specific?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Generally, as applied not only to the foundation or corporation in question, but to all alike, corporations or foundations, the special could only be legitimately exercised in the way of limitation of the powers of the foundation along the lines of its original intention?

Dr. KIRCHWEY. Yes; quite right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you. You will be permanently excused. Antoni Wiater.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ANTONI WIATER.

Commissioner WALSH. Your name, I believe, is Antoni Wiater?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. A-n-t-o-n-i W-i-a-t-e-r?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live?

Mr. WIATER. Chrome.

Chairman WALSH. Chrome, N. J.?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is your age?

Mr. WIATER. Thirty-eight years.

Chairman WALSH. Please speak a little louder, so that this last gentleman can hear you.

Mr. WIATER. All right.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a native of this country?

Mr. WIATER. No; old country.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you born?

Mr. WIATER. Pole country.

Chairman WALSH. Poland?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived in the United States?

Mr. WIATER. Twenty-three years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Naturalized and a voter in this country?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are you married or single?

Mr. WIATER. Yes—married.

Chairman WALSH. How many children have you?

Mr. WIATER. Five.

Chairman WALSH. What are their names?

Mr. WIATER. Adam, Johnnie, Mary, and Andy.

Chairman WALSH. What are their ages?

Mr. WIATER. And Steve.

Chairman WALSH. And Steve?

Mr. WIATER. The last.

Chairman WALSH. How old are they?

Mr. WIATER. Thirteen, eleven, nine, six and a half, and fourteen months—the last.

Chairman WALSH. The last is 14 months old?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many of them go to school?

Mr. WIATER. Four.

Chairman WALSH. And what schools do those children go to?

Mr. WIATER. The public school.

Chairman WALSH. At Chrome?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived at that place?

Mr. WIATER. Twenty-three years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you working now?

Mr. WIATER. Worked before, not working now; strike now.

Chairman WALSH. You are on a strike now?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long did you work—what company were you working for before you went on a strike?

Mr. WIATER. The copper work there.

Chairman WALSH. Whereabouts?

Mr. WIATER. In Chrome.

Chairman WALSH. In Chrome?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. At what place were you working when you went on a strike?

Mr. WIATER. When I was to be working at the copper, I went away and just came back to the Liebig.

Chairman WALSH. The Liebig plant? What do they do?

Mr. WIATER. Fertilizer factory.

Chairman WALSH. Now, how long have you been back? You say you quit and came back?

Mr. WIATER. I came just before election day.

Chairman WALSH. That was last fall?

Mr. WIATER. Last fall.

Chairman WALSH. What did you do in the Liebig plant?

Mr. WIATER. I shovel and pick.

Chairman WALSH. Is that work hard?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What do you shovel?

Mr. WIATER. Stuff, phosphate, what they call them.

Chairman WALSH. What is that used for?

Mr. WIATER. That makes up, they mix up the acid and that together.

Chairman WALSH. Is that work hard?

Mr. WIATER. Work is hard.

Chairman WALSH. How many hours per day do you work?

Mr. WIATER. Ten hours.

Chairman WALSH. Is it dirty work?

Mr. WIATER. It is dirty work.

Chairman WALSH. Do you smell bad when you come home?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the work is of a very offensive nature?

Mr. WIATER. It is awful bad.

Chairman WALSH. And the place stinks?

Mr. WIATER. Stinks like anything.

Chairman WALSH. And the men who work there stink?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. If there is any audible expression we will have to adjourn until such time as it ceases.

Mr. WIATER. People come from the city and they can't go past the place.

Chairman WALSH. The people who come from New York and such places can't go past the works? Why not?

Mr. WIATER. They take a handkerchief and put on their nose and their mouth.

Chairman WALSH. It smells so offensive?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Last fall when you came back there what wages did you receive?

Mr. WIATER. One dollar and sixty cents.

Chairman WALSH. And what did you receive before when you were there?

Mr. WIATER. Two dollars.

Chairman WALSH. When did the $1.60 a day rate go into effect?

Mr. WIATER. Before about four months, I think.

Chairman WALSH. How much rent do you pay?

Mr. WIATER. Nine dollars and a half.

Chairman WALSH. Your wife is living?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you a receipt for your rent?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Hand it to the sergeant at arms.

Mr. WIATER. I didn't bring that receipt, I bring it and give it to the gentleman over in the office before, the rent and coal and wood.

Chairman WALSH. You pay $9.50 rent?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And who do you rent from?

Mr. WIATER. A fellow over there.

Chairman WALSH. Your landlord is a resident of Chrome?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And he has no connection with the company?

Mr. WIATER. I don't understand about what kind of company, what it is.

Chairman WALSH. You rent from whom; what is his name?

Mr. WIATER. Steinberg.

Chairman WALSH. Has he any connection so far as you know with the company you work for?

Mr. WIATER. I think he no.

Chairman WALSH. You think he what?

Mr. WIATER. I think he no.

Chairman WALSH. Does he work for the Liebig Co.?

Mr. WIATER. That fellow?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WIATER. No; he is a business man; got a grocery.

Chairman WALSH. He has nothing to do with the company you work for; you rent from him?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many rooms are there in your house?

Mr. WIATER. Three.

Chairman WALSH. And you pay $9.50 a month rent?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; $9.50.

Chairman WALSH. How much is your grocery bill?

Mr. WIATER. Thirty-five dollars.

Chairman WALSH. Have you got the bill for that?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Hand it to the sergeant at arms.
(Papers handed to the commissioner.)

You say you pay a grocery bill per month of $35?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is your wife a saving sort of woman?

Mr. WIATER. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does she run the house as cheap as she can?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; she washes some people's clothes.

Chairman WALSH. She goes out and does some washing herself?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is she a woman that is careful about spending her money?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, this says "J. Steinberg." That is your landlord, and he also runs the grocery store?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And in a month your bill is $35?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; that is what they say.

Chairman WALSH. What month is that?

Mr. WIATER. Last month.

Chairman WALSH. And how does it compare with other months before that?

Mr. WIATER. I don't pay the bill. I got no money, and he trusts me.

Chairman WALSH. I know, but before, when you did work, how much was the bill?

Mr. WIATER. Sometimes $35, sometimes $34, sometimes $33; something like that.

Chairman WALSH. It runs about that?

Mr. WIATER. It don't come every month the same.

Chairman WALSH. How much do you pay to your butcher per month?

Mr. WIATER. I got it here. Last month $10.17. Last month I don't pay and he don't trust me; he don't give me any more meat.

Chairman WALSH. What do you say—this month they don't give you any more meat?

Mr. WIATER. He don't give me any more. He stopped the meat now.

Chairman WALSH. While you were working you bought on credit and had it charged on the book?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is that right?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now that you are on a strike—

Mr. WIATER. He don't give me no more.

Chairman WALSH. He don't give you any more meat?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. Before that it was $10.17 that you paid; was that about what you paid each month?

Mr. WIATER. Each month; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And did you in your family, did you observe that you eat more meat?

Mr. WIATER. That I can buy no more; we can't buy no more; I can hardly pay; got no money—no more money.

Chairman WALSH. That is not what I mean. The point is that when you did have the money did you eat any more meat than the ordinary workingman over there?

Mr. WIATER. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. I guess you do not understand me. Please do not interrupt. What I am trying to say is, did you eat meat just about like every other man does in his family over there?

Mr. WIATER. No; I see people different altogether. I buy just 18, 18, 14 cents to the soup, a quarter pound only for work myself for dinner.

Chairman WALSH. You paid what for soup?

Mr. WIATER. Thirteen cents and fourteen cents they charge for soup.

Chairman WALSH. For soup meat?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; 1 pound.

Chairman WALSH. And what was it you took to work?

Mr. WIATER. A quarter of a pound.

Chairman WALSH. A quarter of a pound you took to work with you?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; dinner time.

Chairman WALSH. Was that everything that you had? That would show that you didn't use an extra large amount of meat.

Mr. WIATER. I had something else; sometimes my wife would fix—sometimes sauerkraut, sometimes potatoes, and send them by the boy; bring just a small dinner pail.

Chairman WALSH. The boy brought your dinner pail to you?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you buy more meat or less meat than the neighbors?

Mr. WIATER. I don't buy.

Chairman WALSH. Did you buy more or less before that time?

Mr. WIATER. Well, like it.

Chairman WALSH. Just like it?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How much did you pay to the baker?

Mr. WIATER. Eight dollars and thirty-one cents.

Chairman WALSH. Have you got the bill there?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What month was that?

Mr. WIATER. Last month.

Chairman WALSH. We must have perfect order, ladies and gentlemen.

Did you bring over a bill that you were asked by the investigator who called upon you, Mr. West, I believe it was?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; that is all the bill I had. I suppose that is a good bill.

Chairman WALSH. Did he ask you to bring over your baker's bill?

Mr. WIATER. I got it right there in the book. This is a good bill; this is paid; last month I pay.

Chairman WALSH. You paid last month?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; I paid right here in the book.

Chairman WALSH. Are you still running an account with the baker now?

Mr. WIATER. Eight dollars and thirty-one cents.

Chairman WALSH. Are you still getting bread on the book from the baker now?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. Why?

Mr. WIATER. No steal—what do you call?

Chairman WALSH. Do you still buy bread and have it put on the book? I said, "Do you continue"—I didn't say steal, I mean still. I said, "still," not "steal." Do you still buy bread and have it charged on the book?

Mr. WIATER. They charge me on the book every month, everything on the books.

Chairman WALSH. You still get credit, do you?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. They still give you credit?

Mr. WIATER. I don't understand you. I don't get any more; another fellow come from Elizabeth and he start the business in the butcher shop and he don't know me.

Chairman WALSH. The butcher does not know you like the baker?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. And he won't sell you meat?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. But you can still buy your bread on credit from the baker?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Because he knows you?

Mr. WIATER. He know me.

Chairman WALSH. What do you pay per month for coal?

Mr. WIATER. Two dollars and a half.

Chairman WALSH. That is in winter time?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; winter time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you got your bill for that here?

Mr. WIATER. I told him to bring that over.

Chairman WALSH. You know that is the amount you have to pay?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you use wood, too?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What do you use the wood for—$2.50 per month?

Mr. WIATER. Start them up and put the wood on first and after put coal.

Chairman WALSH. Have you your life insured for your family?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; I got him right here.

Chairman WALSH. Have you got the book there?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in perfect order. It is difficult to examine this gentleman; he does not understand the language. Please keep perfectly quiet.

How much are you insured for?

Mr. WIATER. The children?

Chairman WALSH. No; you.

Mr. WIATER. Myself? I got right here another bill. That is two lodges. This is my wife's, and this is mine.

Chairman WALSH. Are you insured in the lodge?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The Polish National Alliance?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How much are you insured for?

Mr. WIATER. For $1,000.

Chairman WALSH. For $1,000?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are your children insured?

Mr. WIATER. I got them here.

Chairman WALSH. Have you got your insurance paid up in the lodge?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; I got a book.

Chairman WALSH. That is the book?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That shows what your payments are?

Mr. WIATER. So much per month.

Chairman WALSH. And what are your children insured for?

Mr. WIATER. Ten cents per week.

Chairman WALSH. That is insurance enough to bury them if they die?

Mr. WIATER. I guess it is.

Chairman WALSH. How much do you get from that insurance in case the child dies?

Mr. WIATER. I do not know. In the book, it says.

Chairman WALSH. Don't you yourself know how much it is?

Mr. WIATER. I can't read nor spell it.

Chairman WALSH. How many children are insured—all of them?

Mr. WIATER. Four.

Chairman WALSH. Four of them—three in the Prudential Insurance Co., and the other in the Colon Insurance Co., you don't know the name?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; the collector come—he lives in Chrome.

Chairman WALSH. The collector lives in Chrome?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How much do you pay for insurance for yourself per month, yourself and children?

Mr. WIATER. It is $2 one insurance, and another $1; $2 and $4 for $1,000.

Chairman WALSH. How much is it? Do you know how much you pay per month for insurance for yourself?

Mr. WIATER. I don't know how much money; I don't count it.

Chairman WALSH. Don't you know how much it amounts to?

Mr. WIATER. No; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. You pay $2 a month?

Mr. WIATER. For one.

Chairman WALSH. For one?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; and another $1 for $600.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. West seems to have figured it up here, and I will see whether that recalls to you. He says for insurance about $4.60 a month for yourself and children. Do you know whether that is correct?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; $4.60.

Chairman WALSH. Is your wife insured, too?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will assume it is $4.60. It amounts to $4.60 according to this.

Mr. WIATER. More than that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you owe the grocery man?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How much do you owe him?

Mr. WIATER. Thirty-five dollars.

Chairman WALSH. And do you owe the butcher?

Mr. WIATER. The butcher, too.

Chairman WALSH. How much do you owe him?

Mr. WIATER. Ten dollars and some pennies. I got a bill in there.

Chairman WALSH. Does the grocer still give you credit?

Mr. WIATER. He give me credit, just because he know me ever since I am married, and I am 19 years married.

Chairman WALSH. You said the butcher won't trust you; won't give you credit because he lately came from Elizabeth and he does not know you?

Mr. WIATER. He came from Elizabeth.

Chairman WALSH. How do you get your meat now?

Mr. WIATER. I don't eat meat this time.

Chairman WALSH. What do you and the family eat?

Mr. WIATER. Eat bread and coffee.

Chairman WALSH. Just what you can get on credit?

Mr. WIATER. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. How much does your clothing cost you per month?

Mr. WIATER. My clothes cost, some shoes last $2.70; for the shoes a month and sometimes more.

Chairman WALSH. You pay $2.70 for the shoes. How much would you say your clothes altogether cost?

Mr. WIATER. I can't tell you just for sure because they sometimes last longer and sometimes wear out.

Chairman WALSH. How much do your wife's shoes cost?

Mr. WIATER. Two dollars and fifty cents.

Chairman WALSH. Two dollars and fifty cents?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And your children's shoes?

Mr. WIATER. One dollar and eighty cents.

Chairman WALSH. One dollar and eighty cents. And how long does a pair of shoes last for you?

Mr. WIATER. Last one month, a pair of shoes I use to work.

Chairman WALSH. Why don't your shoes last longer?

Mr. WIATER. The acid eats it up.

Chairman WALSH. The acid eats up the shoes?

Mr. WIATER. Yes. Sometimes two months and sometimes three months.

Chairman WALSH. And the children's shoes?

Mr. WIATER. Every month got to buy.

Chairman WALSH. Every month; they wear them out fast.

Mr. WIATER. Yes; because the children go to school, and they run out and the boys run out.

Chairman WALSH. The boys run around?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the children, how much do you pay for the children's clothes?

Mr. WIATER. I can't tell sure.

Chairman WALSH. Before you went on a strike did your children have plenty of warm clothes?

Mr. WIATER. No; just have; when I could work I couldn't make money enough for clothes. I can't make money, I no work before Christmas three days and before New Year's three days. I got no cent now.

Chairman WALSH. When you were making $1.60 a day, was that enough to buy warm clothes for the children?

Mr. WIATER. Nothing at all.

Chairman WALSH. Not enough? What were your wages before you went on a strike?

Mr. WIATER. One dollar and sixty cents.

Chairman WALSH. And how many days in the month did you work?

Mr. WIATER. Well, work every week six days.

Chairman WALSH. I see that this is marked here by Mr. West, 27 shifts at $1.60 a day. What do you mean by "shifts"?

Mr. WIATER. I don't know what you mean by "shift." I think about $30 a month, and I got to pay about $60 or $71 to the butcher and baker and more of them, making that I come back all the time because I can not pay just all my bills.

Chairman WALSH. That is, when you were working at $2 a day you couldn't make enough to support yourself and family?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a man of good habits?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you drink?

Mr. WIATER. No; don't drink at all.

Chairman WALSH. Do you chew?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. Smoke?

Mr. WIATER. I smoke a pipe.

Chairman WALSH. And your wife works hard?

Mr. WIATER. And my wife works hard.

Chairman WALSH. And keeps the family well kept and the house clean?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And cooks for you?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You say she always goes out and helps about washing?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. For whom does she wash?

Mr. WIATER. Some English people come and ask her and she goes out.

Chairman WALSH. And she goes out and washes for them?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. So when you got $2 a day, now, with your wife and five children that would be insufficient to live the way you do live over there and to buy one's clothing? I notice this is figured up, the total expenses for yourself and five children amounts to a little bit over $70.

Mr. WIATER. I know that is there.

Chairman WALSH. And if you got the $2 a day you would not still have enough for them to live on comfortably?

Mr. WIATER. Why, gentlemen, I tell you just now the truth. When I worked for $2 before, my wife you know when the peddlers come around and bring cabbage and potatoes and things in the wagon, and she can buy cheaper than at the grocery if she pay the cash money on the street.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; when she had the cash money she could buy things cheaper.

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. But you have been compelled, as I understand it, ever since you have been back there this last fall, to buy on credit?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you never have caught up?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you try to pay your debts as far as your money would go?

Mr. WIATER. I asked the fellow to give me a bill before I come over here, and he says all right, and he says I show you the bill, you show the gentlemen you are a good man. You say you go to the offices, and they ask you why you no pay your bill, and you say I am a good customer for you, because I am 19 years by you and toward July I get married and I buy groceries from him.

Chairman WALSH. The groceryman told you you could take the bill over and show it to us?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And show that you had been a customer for a long time?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; I live all the time at Chrome—

Chairman WALSH. You lived at Chrome, and he knew you 19 years?

Mr. WIATER. Twenty-three years.

Chairman WALSH. In ordinary times what do you do for amusement? Do you ever go to the theater or anything like that?

Mr. WIATER. No; we got no theater, only just the last year started.

Chairman WALSH. The children, do they go to picture shows?

Mr. WIATER. Don't have my children go.

Chairman WALSH. Why don't they go?

Mr. WIATER. I keep them home all the time and stay home and watch the book and read in the paper.

Chairman WALSH. You keep the children at home to read books and papers?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And would you let them go to picture shows and the like of that if you had the money?

Mr. WIATER. We got no money.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. You said you had been working in the copper works five years?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. Where was that?

Mr. WIATER. At Chrome.

Commissioner BALLARD. In the same place?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. What did you get at the copper place?

Mr. WIATER. I had 25 cents an hour.

Commissioner BALLARD. How long did you work there?

Mr. WIATER. Eight years.

Commissioner BALLARD. Is that where you got the money ahead before you worked for the fertilizer company?

Mr. WIATER. No; I had more working over there because I worked on Sunday and worked overtime and made a little more money. I made about $3.50 some days; I worked $15 or $16 a week doing copper work, because I worked every Sunday and overtime.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you struck there?

Mr. WIATER. No strike at all.

Commissioner BALLARD. You left there to come to this other place?

Mr. WIATER. They put me out from the work because it is all slack in the shop. They put 21 men out from the shop, and I got back to where I was working before 14 years, and I asked the man to give me a job, and he say, I can give you a job, but I give you only so much money, about $1.00. I say I am satisfied; I got to do something; I got to keep my family.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon. Be back here at 2 o'clock, Mr. Wiater, to take the stand.

(Thereupon, at 12.40 o'clock p. m., Thursday, February 4, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Chairman WALSH. The house will be in order; we will proceed now.

Mr. Wiater, please resume the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ANTONI WIATER—Continued.

Now, Mr. Wiater, at the noon recess I checked over these books and bills just a little and I am afraid, perhaps, that we do not understand each other. The book would indicate that your grocery bill, that is, for groceries alone, was in the neighborhood of about $10 a month, so I thought perhaps the $35 you stated included some of your debts, that is, included some back money you owed the grocery man. Do you understand?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, how is that?

Mr. WIATER. Gentlemen, the clerks that are in the office here told me to bring all the bills and I got them from the coal dealer, from the butcher, from the baker, and from the grocer.

Chairman WALSH. Assuming that your grocery bill includes some money you owed the grocer before and that would not fall in one month, and say your expenses figured up about $49 per month, and it did not allow for shoes or clothing or anything, so I would think from the way the book looks, and it is not very plain, that perhaps $35 would not be for one month's groceries alone, but would include something that you owed the grocery man before or since.

Mr. WIATER. There was nothing but only the last month. I owed the $35 because I know the fellow gave me the bill just on the last month.

Chairman WALSH. The grocery clerk gave you that bill?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You said you had to buy one pair of shoes a month at least—that they did not last a month.

Mr. WIATER. No; they don't last a month.

Chairman WALSH. How great a part of a month do they last? How long do they last—three weeks?

Mr. WIATER. Three weeks sometimes, and sometimes two weeks and a half, or something like that.

Chairman WALSH. We will say that your shoes cost $3.25 a month, and the children's shoes you say they were out in about a month, and there are four of them?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How much do you say you paid for the children's shoes?

Mr. WIATER. One dollar and eighty cents.

Chairman WALSH. And your wife, you say, wears a pair of shoes perhaps three months and pays $2.50 for them?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. So that costs 80 cents a month?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any way by which you can estimate the cost of your clothing and keeping up your house—buy new bedding and such as that and new kitchen stuff? First, I will ask you if you can tell what your clothes cost you a month?

Mr. WIATER. What do you mean? My clothes and the children's clothes, do you mean?

Chairman WALSH. For the whole family.

Mr. WIATER. I can't tell it because I don't get no bill. Sometimes I buy things one week and sometimes I buy things another week.

Chairman WALSH. Now assuming, and perhaps I should not, that your grocery bill proper is about $10 a month, we have $60 a month that you spend and you have bought no clothing; of course you have to buy warm under-clothing for the children?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And for your wife?

Mr. WIATER. I don't buy it because I don't have the money. If I don't have the money, how can I buy?

Chairman WALSH. When you do have money you buy it?

Mr. WIATER. How can I get money? From who I get the money?

Chairman WALSH. Well, I know, but you have some clothes; where do you get your clothes?

Mr. WIATER. Here is my clothes [indicating suit he is wearing]. Here is all my clothes in seven years; it is nine years since I get these clothes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you have the clothes you appear in here; are those your Sunday clothes?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you got more than one suit?

Mr. WIATER. No, sir. That is all I got. What I have got on here now, gentlemen. I am ashamed to go in the city because I ain't got good clothes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you say you have not been able to buy a suit of clothes for nine years?

Mr. WIATER. This is all the clothes I have had for nine years.

Chairman WALSH. How about the children, they have to be clothed?

Mr. WIATER. They have pants and sweater and undershirt and a jacket.

Chairman WALSH. When did your wife buy a dress last?

Mr. WIATER. She don't buy them; she sews herself on the machine.

Chairman WALSH. Well, she buys the goods and makes her clothes, does she?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does she have any dresses made?

Mr. WIATER. Not at all. She makes them ever since I was married.

Chairman WALSH. Then your wages are not sufficient with which to buy any clothing at all?

Mr. WIATER. I can't buy clothes.

Chairman WALSH. You can't even pay your bills, if I understand you, for what you have to eat?

Mr. WIATER. What?

Chairman WALSH. For your living you can not pay all the bills even when you are working?

Mr. WIATER. No; I can't.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock wants to ask you some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you owe anybody any money?

Mr. WIATER. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are you in debt?

Mr. WIATER. No, sir.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. You don't owe anybody anything?

Mr. WIATER. Just the baker and the grocer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How much do you owe the baker?

Mr. WIATER. Eight dollars and thirty-one cents.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How much do you owe the grocer?

Mr. WIATER. Thirty-five dollars.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you owe anybody else?

Mr. WIATER. That is all, and the butcher, too, I mean.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How much do you owe the butcher?

Mr. WIATER. I guess $10.17, or something like that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Ten dollars and seventeen cents.

Mr. WIATER. Something like that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So all your debts are $53?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you had $53 and could pay up the butcher, the baker, and the grocer, then you would not owe anybody anything?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You say you have been earning $1.60 a day?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And had been working 26 days a month?

Mr. WIATER. Not yet. Before Christmas I worked only three days, and before New Year's I worked three days.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. When you worked right along, you worked six days in the week for $1.60 a day?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That would be equal to $41.50 a month, and the chairman has figured out that it cost you about $60 a month to live without buying clothes. Now, there are seven in your family?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yourself and wife and five babies?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I suppose $10 a month for clothing would be very little for seven people?

Mr. WIATER. Very little.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That would make it $70 a month?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if it costs you $70 a month to live, and you have only been earning $41.50 a month, that would be $28.50 short every month; that would be at the rate of $325 a year. How do you explain that when you say you only owe $53?

Mr. WIATER. It don't come that way every month, $35; sometimes it is only $20 or $25, or $30.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What?

Mr. WIATER. The grocery bill; I don't pay $35 every month.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The chairman has only figured groceries at $10 a month and not $35, and after figuring groceries at $10 and those things, including your clothes, cost according to this statement about $70 a month to live, and you earn $41.50; that makes a shortage of $28.50 a month, which would be equal to nearly $340 a year, so you would be $340 worse off at the end of the year than you were at the beginning of the year, and if that was kept up for two or three years you would be in debt at the end of that time nearly a thousand dollars; yet you say that you are in debt only $53.

Mr. WIATER. I don't work for $1.60 all the time; I told you before dinner I work in the copper plant, and I get $3.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You made $3 a day there?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir; working Sundays and overtime.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How long have you been working for $1.60 a day?

Mr. WIATER. I started before election.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That would be about the month of November?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir; the other people gave me a job over there about three days before election.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. When you worked in the copper works you got $3 a day for six days in the week, and when you worked on Sunday you got overtime?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How much for overtime?

Mr. WIATER. Time and a half.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So on Sundays you would get $4.50?

Mr. WIATER. Just time and a half.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. When you worked in the copper works did you work overtime every Sunday?

Mr. WIATER. I worked every Sunday 8 hours; they only worked 8 hours; then I worked 10 hours a day, and that made overtime.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You worked every Sunday?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir; for three years. And on Easter and Christmas.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then in the copper works you worked for $3 a day for six days in the week and you got $4.50 every Sunday, and that made $22.50 a week?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That gave you about $90 a month, and a little over?

Mr. WIATER. About that. Sometimes I worked three hours overtime and sometimes I worked only two hours overtime.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then this bad condition has only been for the last two or three months, when you had no work in the copper works, and you had to go back to the pick and shovel?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How soon do you expect to go back in the copper works?

Mr. WIATER. The boss told me when they shift the copper and they get a little busy they take me back again.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then this pick and shovel job is only temporary and you are not going to work at it all the time?

Mr. WIATER. No, sir; I don't work steady at that.

Chairman WALSH. How much does your wife make taking in washing?

Mr. WIATER. Sometimes $1 and sometimes $1.50.

Chairman WALSH. For what time?

Mr. WIATER. A day.

Chairman WALSH. Does she contribute—does she use that money to live on?

Mr. WIATER. She buys something for the children.

Chairman WALSH. How many days a week does she wash?

Mr. WIATER. She don't wash every day; sometimes three days in the week, and sometimes two days in the week; and the rest of the time she cleans up the children's clothes.

Chairman WALSH. What she earns washing goes toward keeping up your house—that is, she buys things for the children, as clothes and such like?

Mr. WIATER. She buys what she wants for the children.

Chairman WALSH. But it goes into the house?

Mr. WIATER. It goes into the house.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the common laborers in that Liebig plant only get $1.60 a day, do they?

Mr. WIATER. Not all of them; some work in the machine shop at $2.50 a day.

Chairman WALSH. I say the common laborers. Those that work with pick and shovel, they get $1.60 a day?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And assume that they all try as hard as you do to get along, they are just as bad off as you are; that is, the common laborers that have no chance to go back to the copper works; there are many that can not go to the copper works, of those common laborers?

Mr. WIATER. Not everybody can go to the copper works.

Chairman WALSH. You worked there before?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Are there a whole lot of men in the Liebig Co. that work like you are now working all the time, common laborers, with pick and shovel?

Mr. WIATER. I never seen many of them working in the copper works; most of them are Americans that get the job there; I am a Polack.

Chairman WALSH. Who owns the copper works?

Mr. WIATER. I can't spell them.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a union there?

Mr. WIATER. No union; they work eight and nine hours a shift.

Chairman WALSH. Is it Guggenheim's plant?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. Then when you made $3 a day that was $3 for eight hours work?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Then you worked overtime, sometimes two and sometimes three hours a day?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you say you worked every Sunday for three years?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; and Christmas, too.

Chairman WALSH. What time did you go to church, or what time did you have with your family?

Mr. WIATER. There are two of us that work 24 hours; we have 24-hour shifts, and we change every two weeks.

Chairman WALSH. You work 24 hours continuously?

Mr. WIATER. I work right along continuously.

Chairman WALSH. How often did you say you changed shifts?

Mr. WIATER. Once every two weeks.

Chairman WALSH. You worked 24 hours continuously?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long was that?

Mr. WIATER. The last three years.

Chairman WALSH. How much did you get for your 24 hours' work, $6?

Mr. WIATER. No; they put me on a shift.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If it was time and a half, you got $9, didn't you?

Mr. WIATER. No; it was a shift.

Chairman WALSH. You say you worked in the copper works on holidays?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. On Christmas and the Fourth of July?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And New Year's?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And Thanksgiving?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; Thanksgiving.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell wants to ask you some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are you a member of a union of any kind?

Mr. WIATER. There ain't no union down there; we have only one shop belonging to the union and that is the wheelers and the people are machinists; there is only one in Chrome.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you belong to a union?

Mr. WIATER. Not now.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you ever belong to a union?

Mr. WIATER. I did in the old country.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What kind of a union was that?

Mr. WIATER. I forget about it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you ever learn a trade?

Mr. WIATER. I was a pipe fitter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you ever work at it in this country?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; and in the copper works.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Copper-pipe fitting?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You are a coppersmith, then? Do you do copper work, work on copper pipes?

Mr. WIATER. I can't explain what the copper is.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you learn that in the old country?

Mr. WIATER. I did a little over there and in this country, too.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there any union at all in this plant where you are working?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In this place where you are working now?

Mr. WIATER. They have started one.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that is where the strike occurred?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you belong to the union then?

Mr. WIATER. No; because I ain't got a dollar to pay.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You didn't join because you didn't have a dollar?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Wouldn't they take you in without the dollar?

Mr. WIATER. They didn't take me because I ain't got no money to pay.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You wanted to join?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; I wanted to join. It is a good thing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think it is better to belong to the union?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; because it is good for all the people. When they had the strike they put me on the committee, and they sent me to the office of the Armour plant and they sent me and another two fellows, and I go over there and talk a little bit. I explained in English that I want the superintendent, and the superintendent came outside of the gate, and told him what I can about the strike, and I ask him if he like the union, and he told me, he said, "I like the union." And I told the superintendent that we want more than $1.00 a day, and he said "I can't pay any more than $1.00 a day," and I said "Why?" And he said that they were having the war over in Belgium and they couldn't ship copper to Belgium because there was a war in Europe; and he said "When we are busy, we raise your wages." He said "If you like to work for $1.00 you can work; and if you don't, we can't raise it any more."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who said that?

Mr. WIATER. The superintendent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They did pay $2 at one time?

Mr. WIATER. Before the strike; and they cut wages to $1.00—40 cents.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did they promise to give you $2 again sometime?

Mr. WIATER. He said they can't now, because it is too slack.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And before you struck you had a committee go up there to see if you couldn't get the $2 wage back?

Mr. WIATER. I went and asked him and he said "Why do you go on a strike," and I said "Why don't you put up the wages; you cut the boys 40 cents"; and he don't say nothing, and we go out on a strike.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did the boss say anything to you about not joining the union?

Mr. WIATER. He said they like the union, because if the company had trouble they could settle it, and it was good for the working people, too.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who was the boss?

Mr. WIATER. Phillips.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was he manager or superintendent?

Mr. WIATER. The superintendent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The head boss?

Mr. WIATER. The head boss; yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He told you he liked the union?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did he want to make any arrangement with your committee to treat with you as union men or recognize you as union men?

Mr. WIATER. The fellows from New York came to start the union—the Italians and one Hungarian.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you think he likes the union now?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think the boss likes the union now?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; he told me at the office; at the gate.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you talked with him since you have been out on strike?

Mr. WIATER. Yes; I talked to him about three weeks after the strike was on.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you talked with him lately, in the last week or so?

Mr. WIATER. I talked with him one time.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you seen him or has your committee gone to him and tried to get back to work, or make a settlement of your trouble?

Mr. WIATER. The committee was over there last week. And he said he would give 20 cents an hour or $2 for 10 hours. He said he take the men back to work.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You are talking now about the Armour plant, are you?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am talking about the chemical plant.

Mr. WIATER. I don't know about that; that is too far away.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was it the Armour plant or the chemical plant where the boss said he liked you? Which manager was it that said he liked the union?

Mr. WIATER. The Armour plant.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to talk about the chemical plant.

Mr. WIATER. I don't know nothing about the chemical plant.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where were you working when the strike occurred?

Mr. WIATER. I worked for the Liebig plant.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is near the Armour plant?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where are you working now?

Mr. WIATER. Nowhere.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where was the last place you worked?

Mr. WIATER. At the Liebig plant.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You did not work in the chemical plant at all?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Oh, you were in this strike over there? You went on strike?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then you must have been working for the chemical company?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There has been no strike at Armour's?

Mr. WIATER. The chemical plant is outside of town, and the strikers don't go over there.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You are working for the Liebig Co.?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is a fertilizing company?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is one of the plants that went out on strike?

Mr. WIATER. Williams & Clyde and the Liebigs and the chemical and the Armour plant and Newark—the Newark people was just the same company.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was it the manager of the fertilizer company told you he liked the union?

Mr. WIATER. Didn't I tell you before Phillips, the superintendent of the Armour plant, told me he liked the union.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You were on a committee to go to the Armour plant?

Mr. WIATER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Up to three months ago you were working in the copper plant?

Mr. WIATER. No; three months.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Three months?

Mr. WIATER. Before election I start to work at Liebig.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How long did you work in the copper plant?

Mr. WIATER. Eight years.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you made $3 a day there?

Mr. WIATER. Three sometimes and sometimes more, I make.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you worked every day in the week—seven days in the week?

Mr. WIATER. Seven days and sometimes more.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Sundays you got $4.50?

Mr. WIATER. Time and a half.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Thirty days a month. $3 a day is $90, and $1.50 extra for four Sundays made $6. You say that your wife did washing two or three days in the week, and she got $1.50 a day when she washed?

Mr. WIATER. She never washed when I make a little more money—she got to wash now.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. When you were working in the copper she did not have to wash?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you earned $90 a month, and the chairman figured out that it cost you to live, including clothing, $70 a month?

Chairman WALSH. I didn't figure that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Somebody figured it $70 a month.

Chairman WALSH. You added a certain amount for clothing yourself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you made it $50?

Chairman WALSH. Ladies and gentlemen, I do not want to be dictatorial or anything of the sort, but I notice this afternoon many new people here and a disposition to give audible expression to your feelings. If it continues we will be compelled to adjourn and clear the hall and only allow a number to come in afterwards that can be controlled. I am going to ask you to cooperate with us, and if we are to have a fair understanding of this testimony we must have perfect order and no expression whatsoever. Something may be said that for the moment will appear very popular to the audience, and then shortly thereafter something may be said that you will want to give disapproval to, and you can see the necessity for cooperation and for the maintenance of the most perfect order.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You had arrived at $60?

Chairman WALSH. Without any clothing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And I added $10 a month, making the $70.

Well, now, that would leave you a balance of $26 a month that you could save, if those figures are right. How comes it that you could not buy a suit of clothes in seven years when you had $26 a month over—a surplus?

Mr. WIATER. I sure I got just money to buy clothes, but I see folks over here in New York, I never see such a thing where I come from; clothes all the different here and no care for their clothes over here in New York like there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you wanted to buy a suit of clothes you had money to buy them, didn't you?

Mr. WIATER. I had; when I worked in the copper I saved a little money.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Say you would rather save your money, then, than buy clothes with it.

Mr. WIATER. Certainly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you could have bought clothes if you had wanted to buy them?

Mr. WIATER. I just need some; never get no money; just before this last month I got no money; I didn't work, and that fellow will throw me out on the street; I have a little money, and I pay my bills, and this time I got no money, and the fellow stop my meat, and I get credit from my grocery man.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You took $26 a month and saved it up?

Mr. WIATER. I save sometimes a couple or a few dollars.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were thrown out of work you would have this money in a bank to take care of you.

Mr. WIATER. I don't have no bank; keep home money; a few dollars.

Chairman WALSH. When his wife was confined he had doctor bills; how did he pay them?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The theory was he could not buy a suit of clothes on account that he had no money, and it developed he saved money in place of buying clothes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell suggests that I ask, so that I will not have to go over it and he may not have to go over it, whether or not he paid for doctor and things like that?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No objection to that.

Chairman WALSH. I do not want to carry it any further. But when you made these better wages in the copper company were any of your family ever sick, and did you have to pay any doctor bills?

Mr. WIATER. Certainly I have to pay doctor bills.

Chairman WALSH. Have you lost any children?

Mr. WIATER. I lost two children.

Chairman WALSH. You lost two children, and, of course, you had to pay the funeral expenses?

Mr. WIATER. I know before about 18 years now.

Chairman WALSH. It is suggested probably they were insured. Were those children insured?

Mr. WIATER. One 11 months and one 6 weeks I lost.

Chairman WALSH. When your wife was confined, having these children, you had to pay for doctors?

Mr. WIATER. Certainly, I had to pay $10.

Chairman WALSH. When you were making $90 a month, did you have any fun; did you go to the theater or to picture shows?

Mr. WIATER. We got none over there.

Chairman WALSH. How much, when you were getting these better wages, were you able to save?

Mr. WIATER. I don't understand what you mean.

Chairman WALSH. How much did you save—you say you saved some?

Mr. WIATER. Sometimes $2 or $3, or maybe $5 a week.

Chairman WALSH. I will see if I can straighten this out with you. The Liebig plant and the Williams & Clyde plant both belong to the American Agricultural & Chemical Co., do they not, or do you know that?

Mr. WIATER. I don't understand about that. I heard a gentleman say the Williams & Clyde and the Liebig had the Armour plant and the Newark; I don't know what the company is, all fertilizer factories, I heard, belonged to the same company, the trust company; that is all I know, because the fellows did talk over there by the meeting.

Chairman WALSH. How much money did you have saved up when you lost your job?

Mr. WIATER. Thirty-five dollars.

Chairman WALSH. You had that much on hand?

Mr. WIATER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And did not owe anybody anything?

Mr. WIATER. No.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Witness excused.

Mr. Hepburn.

TESTIMONY OF MR. A. BARTON HEPBURN.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. HEPBURN. A. Barton Hepburn—A. B. Hepburn.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Hepburn?

Mr. HEPBURN. 205 West Fifty-seventh Street.

Chairman WALSH. New York City?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, please?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am a dealer in credit—a banker.

Chairman WALSH. You are the chairman of the board of directors, I think, of the Chase National Bank, of New York City?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You are a director in the American Car & Foundry Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And a director in the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And a director in the F. W. Woolworth Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And in the Remington Typewriter Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. In the Sears-Roebuck Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And also a member of the board of trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am.

Chairman WALSH. When did you become a director in the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. It was soon after the panic of 1907.

Chairman WALSH. Did your bank have something to do with the reorganization of the company?

Mr. HEPBURN. It was not reorganized. Everybody had difficulty during the stringency that existed, and this company was undercapitalized, and they asked me to go on the board to aid them in increasing their capitalization. I told them I could do it just as well as a banker; I knew nothing of their business and could not afford to give attention to their business. They said they did not want that, but they did want some one in the board who could discuss the questions with the board as a whole; and I went in the board for that reason.

Chairman WALSH. How many directors are there of the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, it is a large board—some twenty-odd; I don't remember. Chairman WALSH. Is there an executive committee in the board?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a member of the executive committee?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. Who are the members of the executive committee?

Mr. HEPBURN. The president of the company, Peter B. Bradley, and the chairman of the board, Robert B. Bradley, Mr. Preston, Mr. Gifford, and Keno, I think.

Chairman WALSH. How many are there, Mr. Hepburn?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I don't know; I am not positive.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever personally inspected the plants of the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When did you first hear there was a strike at that plant?

Mr. HEPBURN. When the papers published the fact.

Chairman WALSH. Was that prior to the difficulty that took place over there?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did you learn what the demands of the strikers were?

Mr. HEPBURN. I called up the office and asked them about the strike and what occasioned it and what was involved. They told me they were striking for more pay and less hours, but that the matter was not difficult—the gist of the statement was that they had very many applications for employment, the difficulty was with the common laborers, and that they thought or hoped that when the strikers realized that there were so many people who wanted their places at the prices they were paying that they would resume work. They said they did not regard the situation as serious. The next thing I saw the account of the catastrophe over there.

Chairman WALSH. Did they say how much the men were being paid?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What did they say they were being paid?

Mr. HEPBURN. One dollar and sixty cents.

Chairman WALSH. One dollar and sixty cents per day; and did they say what hours they worked?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; I understood nine hours.

Chairman WALSH. Well, who did you talk to over the phone, Mr. Hepburn?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Gifford.

Chairman WALSH. Who is Mr. Gifford?

Mr. HEPBURN. I believe—he is the vice president of the company and also a lawyer by profession, and their attorney, and actively connected with the management of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Does he live in New Jersey?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; he lives in New York. I can not give you his address—James M. Gifford.

Chairman WALSH. Did you or did you not ask him how many hours they were working?

Mr. HEPBURN. In this conversation?

Chairman WALSH. In this conversation.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, my recollection is they stated nine hours.

Chairman WALSH. Have you given the substance of the conversation that you had with him?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. You saw in the papers that there was a strike in the plant, and you were a director in the plant and called him up and asked him about the strike?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And he told you the strike was for more pay and shorter hours of work?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And he told you the pay the common laborers were getting was $1.60 per day and the number of hours was nine?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is my recollection; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And that the strike was only among the common labor—no skilled laborers involved; and that he thought, on account of the very great number of men that would come to take the strikers' places, it would be of very short duration? Do you know whether any of the men on strike had had homes there and lived there for any considerable time?

Mr. HEPBURN. I know nothing about it whatever.

Chairman WALSH. How large a place is Chrome?

Mr. HEPBURN. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Were you ever in Chrome?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of a plant has the American Agricultural Chemical Co. in Chrome?

Mr. HEPBURN. I don't know. It has plants all over the country, from Maine to Texas, more or less.

Chairman WALSH. What is the company capitalized for?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, they have a bonded indebtedness, I think, of about $15,000,000.

Chairman WALSH. And do you know what the total amount of their capital stock is?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is a large amount. They have an authorized preferred and common stock of $50,000,000 each, and I think there are about $27,000,000 of preferred stock issued, and I should think about $10,000,000 less of the common.

Chairman WALSH. And the bonded indebtedness is $15,000,000?

Mr. HEPBURN. About that.

Chairman WALSH. Does this one company operate all the plants, or are some of the others operated by subsidiary companies?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, the company was made up originally by putting together a large number of companies, and they have gone right on, those separate companies, with their local management in practically the same way. I am speaking now generally. I know nothing whatever about the manufacturing plants—never have given any attention to it, further than such as might be reported to the board. The board only meets four times a year. The members of this board representing the different plants are widely separated and meet only four times a year. The executive committee is given power—very large powers—and they are in, I should think, practically continuous session.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make any attempt to find out whether the demands of the men that had been in the employment of that company were based upon justice or not?

Mr. HEPBURN. I made that inquiry after the shooting there. Then I tried to get some further information; but I found the officers were very much excited and very much surprised and were in possession of no information, and the matter ended there.

Chairman WALSH. What attempt did you make to find out, Mr. Hepburn, after the shooting occurred?

Mr. HEPBURN. What—after?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Did you call some one over the telephone, or correspond—

Mr. HEPBURN (interrupting). Oh, yes; and I saw Mr. Gifford and talked with him about it.

Chairman WALSH. Where?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think he came into the bank. I saw him uptown.

Chairman WALSH. Whereabouts uptown?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, at—we came from the same college, and I saw him at an alumni dinner held at Delmonico's.

Chairman WALSH. When was that after the shooting?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it was the 22d or 23d of January.

Chairman WALSH. How much time had elapsed between the time that you heard in this first conversation that there was a strike on and the time you say you were advised by some one connected with the company or it came to your knowledge that a shooting had taken place over there?

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, I think it was a couple of days; very soon; very little difference.

Chairman WALSH. Has the strike ever been discussed in the meeting of the board of directors?

Mr. HEPBURN. There has been no meeting of the board of directors. It meets only four times a year.

Chairman WALSH. When was the last meeting of the board of directors of the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I don't know. I was not present at the last meeting. I should think it was some four or five weeks ago, more or less.

Chairman WALSH. When was the last meeting prior to that one?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not give you the date, but they hold them four times a year.

Chairman WALSH. Were you at the meeting prior to the last one, four or five weeks ago?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; in the fall; early in the fall.

Chairman WALSH. What reports do the directors of that company receive from the management of these various plants?

Mr. HEPBURN. As I told you before, I am on the finance committee, and in going through the general business of the company, the reports of the general condition—finances of the company, and so forth. They then have reports from the managers of each of these factories, and it takes a very long time, and I do not attend them; I do not stay to them.

Chairman WALSH. But you would have an opportunity? It is your privilege, if not your duty, to stay throughout?

Mr. HEPBURN. I could stay there; yes.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you have? Are you a stockholder in the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent?

Mr. HEPBURN. One hundred shares.

Chairman WALSH. What is the value?

Mr. HEPBURN. Ten thousand dollars par value.

Chairman WALSH. Do you control any other shares in it?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you, either as director or as stockholder, possess concerning the labor conditions in the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. None, except we have the information that is reported.

Chairman WALSH. Is the report in writing?

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, the reports are made in writing at the general meeting—especially the annual meeting—at the dividend meetings—they have four meetings a year.

Chairman WALSH. Do you receive any reports from the corporations which give you any information regarding labor conditions?

Mr. HEPBURN. I don't think so. The executive committee may have, but I—

Chairman WALSH. You never saw any?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I have never seen any.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever visited the plants to ascertain?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, to what extent are directors and stockholders responsible for labor conditions in their plants?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think they are decidedly responsible—wholly responsible. I think the board, as a whole, is responsible for labor conditions and all other conditions.

Chairman WALSH. What scope of authority do you give your executives with reference to the establishment and maintenance of labor conditions?

Mr. HEPBURN. The executive committee is given—the salaries of the general officers of the company, I think, are fixed by the board, and all subordinates and all employees are employed by and their compensation fixed by the executive committee. And that is the only arrangement that bears upon that question as to the fixing of labor conditions—as to the compensation. What were the other parts of your question?

Chairman WALSH. Well, it was the scope of the authority that you give to the executive officials to make labor conditions?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, they have full authority—the same authority that the board, as a whole, possesses.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand you to say that the directors of corporations are responsible for the labor conditions in them fully?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, they are, to an extent. They are responsible for making labor conditions proper.

Chairman WALSH. Did you hear the testimony of this man who was on the witness stand—Mr. Wiater—this morning?

Mr. HEPBURN. I heard him, but I did not understand very much of it.

Chairman WALSH. I will try and interpret part of it. That he is a man of, we will assume it is true for the purpose of this question, of fine personal habits; he does not drink; he does not carouse in any way; he does not chew tobacco; and he smokes a pipe; he has five children and he gets $1.60 a day, using the pick and shovel, and that he works 10 hours a day, not 9; that simply paying for the actual food and wants that it costs him $10 a month more—that is, not counting clothing—to live than he would have received if he worked every day. Do you think such a condition ought to be allowed to exist?

Mr. HEPBURN. It seems to me a very low compensation and the conditions as you describe them were most unsatisfactory.

Chairman WALSH. Were most unsatisfactory?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you feel a full responsibility for it as a director of the company?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I do not. I feel I have discharged my duties in the selection of the officers and the selection of the committees and given them that authority and responsibility.

Chairman WALSH. Then, that is, do you tell them not to pay the men but $1.00 a day, whether they could live on it or not?

Mr. HEPBURN. Tell them nothing.

Chairman WALSH. You mean when you fix the compensation of the men you appointed?

Mr. HEPBURN. When we select the officers and the committees we assign them this task of looking after all these plants all over the country, for the labor conditions are very different in different places. In Florida, where the phosphate beds are and where help is essentially colored, and in Massachusetts, where the help is of an entirely different character, there is no uniformity of conditions, and those have to be considered by the people locally in charge, under the supervision of the executive committee and the officers, who receive a salary and who are supposed to look after those things.

Chairman WALSH. Has a director, or has the board of directors as a whole, ever given these executives any instructions as to what labor conditions should be maintained?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think so.

Chairman WALSH. Would you feel that you did your full duty if a vast number of men worked in your industries and were not making living wages?

Mr. HEPBURN. On that subject I would not feel myself competent to instruct anybody. I have never been brought in contact with the employment of people in a large way. In different sections of the country; personally, I would not be competent. These other men are supposed to be. Most of the members of this board are practical manufacturers and marketers of fertilizer. That was their business.

Chairman WALSH. I know, but a man simply a marketer or a manufacturer of fertilizer, would he have any broad knowledge over you as to what a living wage was for a man?

Mr. HEPBURN. He ought to have in these different localities.

Chairman WALSH. Are you not on some of these foundations that undertake to ascertain what widows' pensions should be and what should be given for the support of the family and such matters as that to educate them?

Mr. HEPBURN. We have those general subjects under consideration; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you are on the directorate of this foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. Of that foundation; yes.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of fact, are not labor conditions the only matters under the control of executive officials which are not subject to a close audit and check of some kind?

Mr. HEPBURN. Labor conditions?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; the conditions of the men that work in your factories, are they not the only—is not that the only thing that you do not check up?

Mr. HEPBURN. Labor is fundamental to the success of any enterprise, and as a matter of justice and also of intelligent selfishness it ought to be properly managed and properly paid and properly cared for in order that they might realize the best results.

Chairman WALSH. It weakens the State terribly, if they are not?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. There is an economic basis—you have learned this from your philanthropic activities, have you not—that there is an economic basis for all of the ills of mankind, disease, immorality, crime, and everything else that threatens the State, is there not?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Going back to the question as I asked it, do you not as a director in this corporation or in the other industrial corporations that you are connected with, require statements as follows: A balance sheet of profit and loss account showing in detail the disposition of all financial matters?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. Cost production sheet showing comparative cost at different plants in different years?

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, that would involve the item of labor as well; yes.

Chairman WALSH. But you have one that shows the cost of production?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Showing the comparative costs at different plants and in different years?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you require a periodical inspection of machinery in the plants, do you not?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know. I presume so. I am not a machinist.

Chairman WALSH. But you require periodical inspections of material, do you not?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know just what you mean by that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, all the material, for instance, that the company manufactures, the manufacturing material, the raw material, so that you are informed in a broad way just what material is on hand all of the time?

Mr. HEPBURN. They have chemists to do that, and make reports.

Chairman WALSH. But they have to make reports to you as directors; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. HEPBURN. They make reports to the executive committee. I do not think they have ever made report to the board in this corporation.

Chairman WALSH. May they not have made a report at some of these meetings when you retired and before the meeting was over?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; they may have.

Chairman WALSH. And they require in all these corporations periodical inspection or an inventory of all the physical assets and material assets, do they not?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; should.

Chairman WALSH. According to your own standards, what would you consider to be proper living conditions as regards the following points: The proper length of workday for labor with pick and shovel?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I do not know. I can not answer that question. It depends upon the kind of work, I should think. I am not a student on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. What should be a yearly income for an unskilled workman with a wife and three children?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, would you differentiate between—

Chairman WALSH. Well, say in the State of New Jersey?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, would you differentiate between a man with a wife and three children and any other man?

Chairman WALSH. I would.

Mr. HEPBURN. As to the wages paid, working alongside of each other?

Chairman WALSH. I am asking you. If I was hiring, do you mean—if I was running the plant I do not believe, if you ask me the question and you wished my answer, I do not believe I would. But I am asking—

Mr. HEPBURN. I wanted to know to understand your question. I did not mean to examine you. Pardon me.

Chairman WALSH. I was asking you now to get at, if possible—for the commission to get at your standpoint. What do you think should be the yearly income for unskilled workmen?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would answer that question with great pleasure if I could, but I have never studied this question. I have not studied this subject, and I never was brought in contact with the employment of labor in a large way. These boards that I am on I have been on simply because these corporations have to use their own credit—they have to extend credit—and a man who is a dealer in credit may be useful to them in that way. That marks the limitation of my duties in every one of the boards I am on—the service I can render in respect to credit and finance.

Chairman WALSH. But when you went on you expected to assume the responsibility that went with such membership, did you not?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the public naturally would assume that that would be the case?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any information as to what should be the yearly income for unskilled workmen; for instance, a man and his wife?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have not. I haven't any knowledge upon which to base an opinion.

Chairman WALSH. What should be the compensation for an industrial accident involving, first, the loss of an arm?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, well, I can't answer that.

Chairman WALSH. And, second, the loss of both eyes?

Mr. HEPBURN. It ought to be ample.

Chairman WALSH. And, third, the loss of life—to the survivor? What compensation should be made to the survivor—the dependent?

Mr. HEPBURN. Those are matters of legislation in various States. They are matters that are fixed in the practices of different countries like Germany, for instance. I do not recall what their requirements are, but I am a great admirer of the German system in doing things. I should presume they had it about right. I can not help you any, if you need information on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. According to your own standards, what should be the age and conditions under which children should be employed in any industry?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, the conditions ought to be favorable and the age ought to be sufficiently advanced so that the employment could not in any wise interfere with their proper growth and development.

Chairman WALSH. How many years would you say—what age?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I do not know. I do not know how to answer that, either. There are families in this town who depend more or less upon their children in selling papers on the street. I was for 15 years treasurer of the Children's Aid Society, and we had thirty-odd schools here. The school body was made up mainly of children who could not get into the public schools. The public schools lock the doors at 5 minutes before 9, and the children could not get there because they were employed in helping support the family; they helped make their living by selling papers and otherwise. That may be wrong. Those children ought to be in the public schools, but if they were deprived of such work if would still further deprive their families of support. It is a question that will be extremely difficult to regulate by a general postulate, and I think that every case or class would have to be judged by itself.

Chairman WALSH. If you were convinced that labor conditions in any of the corporations in which you are interested were such that the workmen were unable to support their families without putting their wives and younger children to work, what action as a director would you take?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I would try to improve the condition.

Chairman WALSH. Just restate. What would you do as a director?

Mr. HEPBURN. What would I do as a director?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should call upon the committee, the people in charge of the matter, for a report of conditions first.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think you better do that in this case and in this particular happening here.

Chairman WALSH. We are proceeding—we will fumble along in our own way about this; but if you will kindly—

Mr. HEPBURN. I mean by that, that you will get some people here who can give positive explicit answers, which I can not.

Chairman WALSH. I would like, if you will permit me, not to state what the present intention of the committee is—not that we have anything to withhold that we do not want to give out, but because they have announced publicly that until after the State authorities get through with the criminal investigation that is being made nothing will be done. So in the meantime, if you will just say what you would do as a director—I am not confining it to this corporation, because I see you are on a number of them—but if you were convinced that labor conditions in any of the corporations were such that the workmen were unable to support their families without putting their wives and younger children to work, what would you do? I believe you said first you would call upon the executive officials to ascertain what truth there was in the charges. What next?

Mr. HEPBURN. Ascertain the facts, ascertain the possible remedies, and if we could not continue the business without such conditions, I think it would be better to abandon the business.

Chairman WALSH. Were you ever present at a meeting of the directors, of any of the corporations of which you are a director, at which labor policies to be pursued by the corporation, either during strikes or during normal times, were discussed?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I do not remember of any strike in any of the corporations that I was ever connected with that I can recall now, except this one. I do not believe the subject ever was discussed.

Chairman WALSH. You are a director in that plant or were in 1912?

Mr. HEPBURN. What plant?

Chairman WALSH. The American Agricultural Chemical Co., of Chrome, N. J.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know there was a strike there in 1912 in which one man was killed and two were seriously wounded?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. You did not read that in the newspapers?

Mr. HEPBURN. At what time did it occur?

Chairman WALSH. At what time?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I did not know it.

Chairman WALSH. To refresh your memory, in the month of June, 1912.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think I was in this country then. I was just about returning from Africa at that time.

Chairman WALSH. How long had you been in Africa?

Mr. HEPBURN. Four months.

Chairman WALSH. Before you went to Africa in 1912—

Mr. HEPBURN. I was abroad four months I mean.

Chairman WALSH. Abroad in 1912. Did you know the working hours in the fertilizer plant of the American Agricultural Chemical Co., in Chrome, N. J., were 12 hours?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I did not know.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know that prior to June, 1912, that the work day in the plant at Chrome, the fertilizer plant of your company at Chrome, N. J., was 12 hours, and the wages $1.80 for 12 hours, and that the men went on a strike and out of that strike they shortened hours, reduced the hours to 10 hours per day, and raised their wages to $2 per day, and that during the strike there was one man killed and two wounded?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. And did you ever hear that was true, that this man was killed and these others wounded by the fire of special deputy sheriffs or guards of your company?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. In which corporations in which you are interested, Mr. Hepburn, are the employees organized into labor unions?

Mr. HEPBURN. I couldn't say.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed the effect of such organization upon the men and the owners of the industries?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have never had any opportunity.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever studied the question which seems to be discussed a great deal, and the gentlemen have expressed their views, as Mr. Kirchwey this morning did?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; I heard the close of his testimony. No; I never have. Of course, I have read upon the subject, but I have not formulated any theories. There are so many men who are students of those things, men of ability and character and force studying it, that I much prefer to take their views. I haven't any views on the subject to present.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward the organization of employees for their own protection and the advancement of their own interests?

Mr. HEPBURN. Perfectly proper.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what information or experience is this attitude based that it is perfectly proper for them to organize?

Mr. HEPBURN. Common justice.

Chairman WALSH. Common justice. What is your attitude toward permitting union organizers who are not employed by your corporation to address employees and others, and to carry on their work without interference?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, under what circumstances? While they were at work?

Chairman WALSH. Outside of the plants when their hours of labor are over?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is certainly no objection to doing it at a proper time, under proper circumstances. I can conceive that it might be done at improper times. I believe in free speech, and free action so far as it may be had.

Chairman WALSH. As a result of your observation and experience, Mr. Hepburn, do you believe that industrial discontent in America is increasing or decreasing?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think it is increasing—has been for the last 15 years, say.

Chairman WALSH. Why do you think this is so, Mr. Hepburn? Why is it so in your opinion?

Mr. HEPBURN. You mean what has produced it?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; what has produced it?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, there is the extension of liberty of action, and the development of individuality and the sense of individuality which has taken place in politics and in business the world over; and people have come to assert themselves. The doctrine of hereditary government, which everybody accepted a few years ago, is being discounted and done away with in almost all nations, and we have gone back to the foundations, and I think the increased wages, the increased wealth—I use that dangerous term wealth—the increased means of subsistence, of living and enjoyment which people have attained; the farmers, for instance, with their enormous crops, and other branches of industry. They have come to have more and to want more, and the increased efficiency of machinery, which provides so many things so cheaply and brings them within the range of ordinary workmen—things which were luxuries to people of ordinary wealth or affluence 25 years ago. The fact that so many of these things are attainable, and the natural desire to have more which is born of the proper ambition of everyone, have begotten a spirit of restlessness—that is, I don't quite like the word "restlessness," but a spirit of self-assertion, a spirit of ambition, a spirit of acquisition, whatever it may be, which makes each individual and each class of individuals desirous of participating in a greater degree in the good things of the world, if I may be understood by that expression. I think that fairly covers what I have to say.

Chairman WALSH. What would be your opinion or what is your opinion regarding the social desirability of heavily endowed foundations with self-perpetuating boards of trustees as a method of dealing with social ills?

Mr. HEPBURN. My judgment is that it would be very effective and very helpful as an element in the general make-up of the affairs and influence of the Government and people.

Chairman WALSH. When did you become a member of the governing board of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, May or June of last year.

Chairman WALSH. 1914?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who was it invited you to become a member?

Mr. HEPBURN. The letter was addressed to me by the president of the board, in behalf of the board.

Chairman WALSH. Who was that?

Mr. HEPBURN. John D. Rockefeller, jr.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what considerations, Mr. Hepburn, led you to accept the invitation?

Mr. HEPBURN. A belief that the funds with which the foundation was endowed could be productive of very great and lasting benefit to mankind, and a desire to contribute what I could by participating in the labors which were incident to the administration of the fund.

Chairman WALSH. Had you read the charter of the foundation before you became a member?

Mr. HEPBURN. It was incorporated in the letter.

Chairman WALSH. And were the constitution and by-laws likewise submitted to you?

Mr. HEPBURN. I don't think so—not at that time.

Chairman WALSH. The law creating the body was incorporated in the letter?

Mr. HEPBURN. Was quoted.

Chairman WALSH. Was quoted in the letter?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Please state briefly the purpose of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that was very well stated by Mr. Greene; much better than I could state it.

Chairman WALSH. Well, to be perfectly frank, the commission desires to gather your own conception of it. You are a trustee and charged with administering a very large amount of funds per year and taking care of the capital, and we would like to get your conception of it. What is the purpose of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. The purpose was to be of benefit to mankind along the lines which individuals could not pursue because of the expense involved, and which the Government would not pursue because it seemed to be against governmental policy. I refer to the amount expended in medical research and in the studying of disease, and various other matters which our Government has not undertaken and which I believe to be very essential to the welfare of mankind. And then the educational question—the question of education in its higher sense, and especially along lines of research, differentiating somewhat from what the General Education Board would do or contribute to. And then any other question that might come up. They have sent $1,000,000 for the relief of the Belgians over there who have suffered in this war; and they would have equal right to use the funds for anything else that made for the benefit of mankind. In the case of any enormous calamity, which I regard this war to be, and consequent suffering on the part of people entirely innocent of any part in bringing about the suffering, and various other matters that we may conceive of now, and those which the changing conditions of the future may present and which we can not foresee now. I think it is extremely important to have a large fund of that kind under the control of good men who can meet the varying conditions of life as they present themselves with our advancing civilization, and contribute to the welfare of mankind as may seem best and wisest under the circumstances of each age, each era, or each year.

Chairman WALSH. Up until a very short time ago I believe the offices or headquarters of the Rockefeller Foundation have been at 26 Broadway, New York City?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many meetings have you attended since May, 1914?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, let me see—four, I think.

Chairman WALSH. How long were you there each time?

Mr. HEPBURN. The meetings generally begin at 10 o'clock and last all day. They are very hard-working meetings, I assure you of that.

Chairman WALSH. Remain there all day meeting together?

Mr. HEPBURN. Except to go out to lunch.

Chairman WALSH. Except when you go out to lunch?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, between times, between these four meetings at which you have been there, how do you keep in touch with the board's work?

Mr. HEPBURN. Only by consultation and conference at times and perhaps not at all. The executive committee is in charge, and their reports are made to the general board, and they proceed under the general directions of the board.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of fact, the executive committee, between the meetings, conduct the operations and report to you at the meetings?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is right.

Chairman WALSH. And any conversation you would have might be a casual one—to meet somebody or something of that kind?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; and I might be specially consulted.

Chairman WALSH. And you have been at four meetings?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have been at all the meetings since I have been a member.

Chairman WALSH. When did you first hear the executive committee had made an arrangement with Mr. Mackenzie King to conduct an investigation into industrial relations of the country?

Mr. HEPBURN. The question of making an arrangement with him was brought forward for discussion in the board before it was made, and canvassed pro and con, and information sought in regard to Mr. King by different people—different members of the board.

Chairman WALSH. That meeting was on August 13, I believe?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not tell you the date.

Chairman WALSH. What is that?

Mr. HEPBURN. I presume so; I can not tell you the date.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know prior to that meeting that Mr. Mackenzie King had held a meeting with Mr. J. F. Welborn, the president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Mr. Jerome D. Greene, and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., at Tarrytown?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know at that time that Mr. Mackenzie King had made any study of the conditions or given any advice with respect to the troubles existing in the mines of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in Colorado?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Was anything said about it in the meeting of the board of directors at the time the question of employing Mr. King was up for discussion?

Mr. HEPBURN. I don't think the Colorado strike was ever mentioned at any meeting of the board at which I have been present.

Chairman WALSH. May you not be mistaken about that, Mr. Hepburn. I see the meeting that my attention has been called to was a meeting of the executive committee on August 13. Were you on the executive committee?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Isn't it a fact that no meeting of this board was held between May 27 and November 5—no; October. Isn't it a fact that you were not present at any meeting of this board between May 27, 1914, and October 21, 1914?

Mr. HEPBURN. Quite likely. There was a long interval there.

Chairman WALSH. Do you say, Mr. Hepburn, that Mr. Mackenzie King was under discussion as early as May 27, 1914?

Mr. HEPBURN. I would not undertake to fix any dates of the meetings. I haven't them in mind. But the question of employing Mr. Mackenzie King was under discussion, and the matter was canvassed pro and con, and information as to his past work, so far as known, was disclosed—at that time he had not been employed; no arrangement had been made. What I mean to say is that this discussion was preliminary to the arrangement made with him, and might have been in May or might have been—

Chairman WALSH. Was the arrangement made at a board meeting?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, no; it was made by—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Sir?

Mr. HEPBURN. No. It was made by the executive committee—or made by the officers under the general approval of the board. Everybody seemed to think he was the most desirable man to secure.

Chairman WALSH. Who finally hired Mr. Mackenzie King? Who finally employed him?

Mr. HEPBURN. That I could not answer. I do not know who made the arrangement with him.

Chairman WALSH. You do not know who made the arrangement with him?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Or you do not know what instructions were given him?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. And you have never learned yet?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. And you simply know in a general way that he is to inquire into industrial relations?

Mr. HEPBURN. There were no directions given him—absolutely none. He was employed because of his success in dealing with labor problems in Canada, and because it was thought that if he made a survey of the labor situation he would present to the foundation a report which would be helpful in enabling them to determine what to do.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever talk to him?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mackenzie King?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have, recently.

Chairman WALSH. Since this hearing has been on?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. About the subject of the hearing?

Mr. HEPBURN. No. Well, I won't say that. We sat together here. We have been paying a good deal of attention to you during the past three or four weeks. I have sat here with this group and we have passed casual remarks, I suppose, about what was going on.

Chairman WALSH. You met him here as an auditor in this hearing?

Mr. HEPBURN. I was introduced to him in your presence.

Chairman WALSH. I had forgotten that. Did you see the answers which the foundation submitted to this commission before they were sent to the commission?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you see the publicity matter which appeared regarding the foundation during last autumn, as shown in the exhibits, and the answers to this commission before it was given to the press?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. What have you to do with the financing of the foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. Nothing. Let me understand just what you mean by that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I am going to ask you the questions specifically as they are printed here. Is your advice sought about the placing or selling or transferring of the securities of the foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. It never has been. I don't think there have been any sold.

Chairman WALSH. What part of the total securities held by the foundation are the securities of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. I could not answer.

Chairman WALSH. What part of the total securities held by the foundation are the securities of the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. I don't know that they form any part.

Chairman WALSH. What part of the securities are the securities of the Standard Oil or the subsidiary oil companies?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is quite an amount of them.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read in the public press the suggestion that some of the securities were the securities of the American Agricultural Chemical Co.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I have had the list, and some may have been in there; but it was quite an extensive list, and I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever hear the suggestion before it was made in the question I have asked you that some of the securities in the Rockefeller Foundation were the securities of the American Agricultural Chemical Co., of Chrome, N. J.?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. Have any of the securities lost in book value since they were given to the foundation, do you know?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I could not answer that. That would have to be answered by a comparison of market values with dates.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider it important that you, as a trustee, should know that?

Mr. HEPBURN. No. We own the securities, and the fluctuations in the value are not at all material.

Chairman WALSH. Well, if you felt that the securities were decreasing or continuing to decrease—say, for instance, the pipe-line securities—would you recommend selling them?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I should.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that the foundation is free to sell securities at any time?

Mr. HEPBURN. Perfectly so. They have that power.

Chairman WALSH. If securities were to be sold, how are they sold under your scheme of organization?

Mr. HEPBURN. If they were to be sold, they would follow the usual course of marketing securities, I presume; they are listed.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any policy on the part of the foundation as to the details of selling securities?

Mr. HEPBURN. They have never, so far as I know, contemplated selling securities; the question has not been discussed.

Chairman WALSH. The truth of the matter is—I will ask you if the truth of the matter is not that those securities, so far as their sale is concerned, are controlled by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; I understand it is absolutely within the control of the trustees of the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Have you not delegated that power to the finance committee under the by-laws—the trustees as a whole?

Mr. HEPBURN. To the finance committee?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not answer.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever read the by-laws?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the constitution?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you if it is not a fact that the finance committee, consisting of Mr. Rockefeller's son; Mr. Starr J. Murphy, of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff; and Mr. Jerome D. Greene, as the secretary, and formerly a member of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff, may sell any part of the bonds or shares or notes or other forms of investment held by the foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. You mean that the executive committee may?

Chairman WALSH. The finance committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very likely they have that power. It would be necessary to give them that power in the by-laws for this reason: If they were to sell them the sale would have to be accompanied by a certified copy of a resolution of authority, and that authority is commonly placed in the by-laws of various corporations, even though its use may not be at all contemplated at the time; but that is a usual precaution.

Chairman WALSH. This property is all exempt from taxation?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever figured what the tax would be upon that property, the income tax, or any tax that might be assessed against it?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be approximately $300,000?

Mr. HEPBURN. I could not say.

Chairman WALSH. If it was, would not the Government, the people, as represented by their Government, have a direct money interest to that extent in the foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. They have a direct money interest now to an extent greater than whatever that might be because of what the foundation is doing for the public.

Chairman WALSH. I am just assuming for the sake of this question that that is what the tax would be, because I have not been able to have that figured as yet. Is it not a fact that if the Government was exempting taxation upon its property to the extent of $300,000 a year that the public ought to have at least one direct representative in the board of trustees?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not prepared to say that. The theory upon which all property of that character is exempt from taxation is that it is doing a public service, and the public good it might do would be impaired to the extent of the taxation.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask if you are familiar with this provision in the by-law of the Rockefeller Foundation [reading]:

"The finance committee shall have power to make investments and to change the same and may from time to time sell part of the bonds, shares, or notes or other forms of investment held by the corporation, or any rights or privileges that may accrue thereon. In making investments or changes of investments all of the members of this committee shall be consulted when that is reasonably practical, but the committee shall be deemed to be in continuous session, and may act without formal notice of meeting, and the joint action of any two members shall be valid and binding."

Did you know that was a provision of the by-laws?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have read them.

Chairman WALSH. Then the two members might be Mr. Greene and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., or Mr. Murphy and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr. Now, is it probable that a personal employee of the founder would not be greatly influenced by any suggestion coming from his cotrustee, who was a son of the founder—coming down to the question of what perhaps would be the real power of disposition?

Mr. HEPBURN. So far as the members of that board are concerned, I do not think that any would be influenced against their better judgment.

Chairman WALSH. Might that be true if the membership were changed and men of less resolute characters substituted for those now on the board?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think that Mr. Rockefeller is the last man in the world that would seek to do anything that was not eminently in the interest of the purposes of the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr.

Chairman WALSH. Or Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am speaking of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr.; I do not know Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., so well.

Chairman WALSH. When did you see Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., last?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have seen Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., but once, and that was 20 years ago—15 or 20 years ago.

Chairman WALSH. And so far as his purposes or conduct in connection with the foundation is concerned, you know it only through hearsay?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Which of the banks with which you are concerned hold deposits from the foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. None.

Chairman WALSH. In what banks do they carry cash?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know; I simply know they do not carry them in mine. I wish they did. They have moved into the same building that we occupy, and perhaps they will later.

Chairman WALSH. It would be considered a good account by bankers, would it?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think so; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever made an analysis of what you could do under this foundation, under the authority of this foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. Only as we have considered the various propositions that have come before us, and a great many have been submitted. We considered what we might do as to those. You mean as to the range of possibility?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Chairman WALSH. You simply know your powers are very wide and your discretion as to what are the best interests of mankind—that they are broad and unlimited?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And, of course, there might be a difference of opinion as to what was for the best interest of mankind?

Mr. HEPBURN. Conceivably, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the safeguards, if they might be called such, in the act passed by the House of Representatives in January, 1913, which the secretary of the foundation said in a statement to the Senate that he cordially approved of?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; I am not familiar with it at all.

Chairman WALSH. You have not read those?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you heard of that since this commission started this investigation?

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think there should be any provision limiting the accumulation upon this foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. The accumulation of funds?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think so, Mr. Chairman; you can not have anything in this world better than men. There is no system or law or statute or purpose which at some time and some point does not depend for its proper execution on men, and you can not have anything better than men.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe in the system of what we might call interlocking directorates in these charitable foundations—the same persons serving upon several of these boards?

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, yes; that seems to me indispensable. Many of the trustees give their services gratuitously, and with others their service is continuous and they receive salaries, and naturally their work is interlocking; that is, all in the same general purpose.

Chairman WALSH. Would you agree with President Elliot in his statement that perhaps there are not enough able and willing men to give their time to supply these foundations without overlapping some?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; and these men working along together I think work more effectively.

Chairman WALSH. What is the particular qualification would you say that should go to make up a trustee for a foundation of this kind, a wide social vision and knowledge of conditions in industry and in business, philanthropy, or what?

Mr. HEPBURN. All of those. They should be made up just as you make up a board of directors, of men possessing different qualifications, men whose judgment would be good in regard to one branch of work, and other men whose judgment would be good in other branches, so that they would make up a harmonious and symmetrical whole.

Chairman WALSH. Assuming that for some reason the present trustees should be no longer upon the board, through death or resignation or some other cause, and if the next board of trustees desired to exercise undue influence upon editorial opinion, upon universities and colleges, upon labor leaders, upon legislatures and leaders of thought—are they in a position, by the placing or withholding of money, to exercise such influence?

Mr. HEPBURN. With the publicity going on in this world, I do not believe they would be. I think that any attempt of that kind would be soon discovered and they would be so thoroughly discredited that it would react. It is not probable, but, of course, all things are possible.

Chairman WALSH. Might such influence be exercised by executive officers, or executive committees without the fact being known to the trustees or to the public?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is not at all probable. All things are possible, but I do not think that is a probable danger. It does not seem to me it is.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson has a question or two to ask you. Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Hepburn, in answer to a question I understood you to say that you considered foundations of this character very helpful as a means of settling social ills. Do you regard the regulation or the settling of social ills as a governmental function or not?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; it is a governmental function. But as good citizens we should help the Government in every way we can.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is an obligation that lies upon every citizen whether he be native born or a person who has acquired naturalization.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If it is good, proper, and helpful for the Government to delegate one of its functions to a private agency, why should it not contract out its other functions to private agencies, as, for instance, France has farmed out taxation under the Crown.

Mr. HEPBURN. Taxation has been farmed out in a number of countries and it worked badly. The Government does farm out its functions. It has a governmental duty to provide highways and transportation and it farms that out.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Who has it farmed it out to?

Mr. HEPBURN. To the railroads.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Highways?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; railroad highways.

Mr. GARRETSON. You mean in that sense?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And is there not a strong tendency to resume that function at the present time?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think there is.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has not the farming out of that branch to private agencies brought conviction that the governmental agency should be performed by a private agency?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not get the gist of your question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has not the farming out of that branch—transportation, distribution—brought convincing evidence that the function is properly performable by a private agency in all directions?

Mr. HEPBURN. It has not been properly performed in all respects by private agencies. Everybody knows that. But many believe, and I am one, that it is better performed in this way, under supervision, than it would be if the Government were to take them over.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would you go so far as to hold that the Government should delegate the educational powers to a private agency entirely—that is, the "entirely" applies to educational agencies.

Mr. HEPBURN. No, sir; I certainly would not. You mean the public schools—the educational system?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I certainly would not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. As well as the higher system?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, the distinction is this: It is the duty of the Government to educate its citizens or to provide them with the facilities for education up to a certain point, and they do that in the public schools. But the progress of every country calls for higher education, and the Government does very little for higher education in this country, and colleges prosper mainly by reason of endowments contributed by men of very large means.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Which has set the pace in the last 20 years in the higher education, the State universities or private institutions?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is a debatable question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The fact that it is debatable will make it perfectly evident that the State-controlled institutions have at least made it neck and neck.

Mr. HEPBURN. Perhaps so; we have some very excellent State-controlled institutions, I concede you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What was the former capital of the American Chemical Association? It has more name than that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not tell you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You stated it was undercapitalized when you were invited into the board.

Mr. HEPBURN. I meant this, that there is no industry that has grown so rapidly as the manufacture of fertilizer. Scientific and intensive farming has gotten to be almost a fad and the demand for their product was such that they needed more capital in their business—that is what I meant.

Commissioner GARRETSON. When you were invited into the board to aid in that phase of it, didn't you know the amount of what the then capitalization was as contrasted with what it is now?

Mr. HEPBURN. They had about $18,000,000 of preferred stock and about $18,000,000 of common stock.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. And they authorized an issue of $12,000,000 of bonds.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You are not classing that as capitalization—the bonds?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Working capital?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Go ahead.

Mr. HEPBURN. And a part of those were sold; I don't remember whether it was eight or ten millions that was sold to Lee Higginson & Co., and Clark, Dodge & Co.; and very soon they needed more capital and about two or two and one-half years ago they sold ten millions of preferred stock to Lee Higginson & Co., and that made the preferred stock about twenty-seven millions or twenty-eight millions, and the common stock about ten millions less. They had some serial notes at the time these bonds were authorized—some debentures or serial notes running for periods of years, so I think the bond issue—those serial notes or debentures—amount to about sixteen millions and about twenty-seven millions of preferred stock and ten millions less of common.

Commissioner GARRETSON. This bond sale was really a refunding of floating notes to a large degree?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was all of the preferred stock sold at par value or better?

Mr. HEPBURN. The last ten million was sold at exactly par, and it was a very good sale, too; it is 90 now.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about the first sale?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know about the first sale. Do you mean at the time that the company was organized?

Commissioner GARRETSON. No; if there were two sales. You mentioned the last sale.

Mr. HEPBURN. There was only one sale of stock that I know about.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about the common stock; what price did it sell at? Was there an addition to the common stock?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What interest does the preferred stock bear?

Mr. HEPBURN. Six per cent.

Mr. GARRETSON. It is paid before the common stock or anything?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. No addition after a certain rate?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Nothing cumulative about it?

Mr. HEPBURN. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has that interest always been paid on the preferred stock?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In advance of the common?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What is the rate on the common?

Mr. HEPBURN. Four per cent.

Commissioner GARRETSON. No failure of payment?

Mr. HEPBURN. It has been paid for about two years only. About two years ago they began to pay a quarterly dividend of 1 per cent on the common, and they have maintained it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How much of the surplus has the company accumulated during the period?

Mr. HEPBURN. Surplus?

Mr. GARRETSON. Yes; undivided profits?

Mr. HEPBURN. I should think it would be five or six or seven millions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Had there been any addition to that surplus in 1912 or 1913 or 1914?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; I think so; each year in a very modest amount.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the conversation which you held over the phone with Mr. Gifford—Vice President Gifford—and a director he made it plain to you, as I gather from your testimony, what was just a confirmation of the preceding witness's statement, that the cut in wages was because there were plenty of men available?

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not know there had been a cut of wages until it was disclosed here.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then I will phrase it differently. The refusal to return to the old standard of wages, $2 a day, you say that he simply said they were paying $1.60?

Mr. HEPBURN. That they wanted $2.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And could get plenty of men?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Therefore that the real thing was not the inability of the company to pay, because there was not sufficient margin between the cost of production and the selling price to justify a return to the old rate, but because the necessities of men let the company have the ability to get them regardless of the justness of the wage?

Mr. HEPBURN. He did not put it that way.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Oh! I have no doubt he did not. But that was the real information furnished you, that on account of the great supply of men who were applying for positions—

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). That the company could operate at a $1.60 rate, whether it was just or not?

Mr. HEPBURN. He expressed—

Commissioner GARRETSON. And that did not enter in there?

Mr. HEPBURN. There was no discussion of it at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is what I mean; it did not enter into the discussion?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It was testified here, Mr. Hepburn, that you were added to the number of trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation on account of wide experience and knowledge that you possess, that it was felt that you would add strength to that board. On the basis of your knowledge and experience, actual contact and experience with the questions here of industrial life, have you the actual experience?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have never been brought in contact—I have never been a large employer of labor, except perhaps indirectly, as a member in these different boards.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, if you get as much information about the substratum of the corporation as you have on the chemical board, for instance, is that an available experience as to how the submerged half live?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will concede I am not qualified without any further discussion if you choose.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, now, the question here is with a board of trustees constituted as that one is, and how is a board of trustees to administer a great foundation like this equipped to determine what will promote the well-being of mankind the world over?

Mr. HEPBURN. By their investigations and by their employing men of expert ability. That is one thing we hope to reach by the employment of Mackenzie King and others. If you have got any good men, we will be very glad to see them. It is by a matter of investigation on the part of people that are more competent than I, at least; I won't speak for the rest of the board.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The question I want to get at, if you have to have recourse to practical, upright—of course, I assume that is one of your qualifications for a man in that position that you put those investigators in, whose services you expect to avail yourself of—if such practical, upright men are available, why not put men of that kind in partial control of the foundation?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, it is not necessary to put them in control of the foundations in order to have the advantage of their judgment and experience.

Commissioner GARRETSON. No; but it takes one link out of a roundabout road, does it not?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not see any objection to a good, competent, practical man being a member of the foundation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That was one of the phases that appealed to me; why go around when you might just as well go through?

Mr. HEPBURN. This—pardon me, I do not want to interrupt you, but most men serve without pay.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That was all.

Mr. HEPBURN. But it is quite a labor, the administration of this foundation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I should judge.

Mr. HEPBURN. And it is difficult to get the right kind of men, and you have got to have them available at one point in order to be able to do business; you could not distribute a board all over the country. It would be in the same condition that the American Agricultural Chemical Co. is; we have our plants all over the country which I have not visited and can not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You spoke of the question of the obligation of the delegation of power, and you made a rather broad statement in regard to the responsibility of directors in general. Then you spoke of the delegation of certain powers to the executive committee. I am referring to the chemical company now.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you a believer that moral responsibility can be delegated?

Mr. HEPBURN. No. But I—moral responsibility—no. But men that are doing things in a large way have to act through people whom they employ. I sign a report of the condition of my bank, which goes to Washington, five times a year, based upon confidence in the figures of the bookkeeper who gives me those statements. I do not keep the books.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But who is held responsible for it, though?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am. I have performed a duty by employing men whom I feel confident are honest and competent.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is it. You can not delegate responsibility there, although you have delegated the duty.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have performed a duty by employing men who I feel confident are honest and competent.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But the responsibility is yours?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; that is right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Both legally and morally?

Mr. HEPBURN. I agree to that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, if the man to whom you have delegated the responsibility for performing a duty along the line that you have yourself stated to be correct, that is justice, common justice, if they fail to perform that duty, the moral responsibility for their failure does rest greatly upon the directors by whom the power was delegated?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Good; that is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you very much.
Morris Hillquit.

TESTIMONY OF MR. MORRIS HILLQUIT.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Morris Hillquit.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. HILLQUIT. 246 West One hundred and thirty-ninth Street, city of New York.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Lawyer.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a student of social conditions?

Mr. HILLQUIT. To some extent.

Chairman WALSH. As a student of social conditions and as a lawyer, have you formed any opinions with regard to the social desirability of large foundations such as the Sage Foundation, the Carnegie Foundation, and the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I have, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. You have been called upon by this commission to state them. Will you kindly state your conclusions in your own way?

Mr. HILLQUIT. With pleasure. I think, Mr. Chairman, the large foundations such as you mention, like the Rockefeller Foundation, or the Russell Sage Foundation, or the Carnegie Corporation, represent a very significant phase in modern development, and probably one that has not as yet been fully appreciated by the people of the United States. I believe it is a highly significant development. I should say in brief that they represent in the domain of philanthropy just what trusts represent in the industrial field.

To make my comparison somewhat clearer: Industrial development has proceeded from individual ownership and operation to corporate management, and then finally the corporate management has extended more and more to the formation of trusts, and I think we can observe a similar development in the line of philanthropy—that is, our philanthropic efforts begin with the individual almsgiving. Now, that continues until about the 70s of the last century. Then, and practically synchronous with the formation of corporate organizations, begins the formation of charity organization societies—that is, organizations formed for the purpose of systematic business and introducing scientific methods, methods of sifting every application for relief and a general desire to rather repair the needy, to repair their industrial fitness, than to help present needs.

And, finally, just about as the trusts make their first appearance and after they have developed to some extent, this giant philanthropy of modern days, the foundations, make their first appearance.

Historically, I think Mr. Andrew Carnegie was the pioneer in this line of modern foundations. His first institute in Pittsburgh was followed by the Carnegie Institute in Washington; the latter had an endowment fund and still has of about $22,000,000 and is engaged in almost every conceivable branch of scientific research and sociological investigation.

Then, the next few years witnessed the birth of the Carnegie Institute for Advancement of Teaching, with an endowment of about $15,000,000. That is to provide pensions for college professors, and then a hero fund with an endowment of $30,000,000 to reward deeds of courage and bravery.

Then comes the Carnegie Peace Fund, with an endowment of $10,000,000, to promote peace and amity among nations.

Then the library fund of about $17,000,000 to enable cities and towns to erect library buildings.

Finally the Carnegie Corporation of New York was organized with a capital of $125,000,000. That is a sort of holding company for all of Mr. Carnegie's benefactions. It is specified in the certificate of incorporation, or rather the act of incorporation of the Carnegie Corporation, that it is to continue the existing Carnegie benefactions along various lines.

Closely on the heels of Mr. Andrew Carnegie followed Mr. Rockefeller, first, endowing on a munificent scale the Chicago University, then following this up with the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, both of which were merged in 1903 in the General Foundation Board, which represents expenditures and capital amounting to about $73,000,000.

Finally, a little more than a year ago, the Rockefeller Foundation was organized in New York with a capital of $100,000,000; I believe, as I shall endeavor to show later, that this is the perfect type of what we may call philanthropic trusts, a prototype which will either be followed generally hereafter or the development of which will be curbed within a short time.

The Russell Sage Foundation is a somewhat similar, and again a somewhat dissimilar enterprise. It is organized purely for sociological research, and it has a capital of $10,000,000. It differs from the others in that it is not created by a person actively engaged in business, but is created by the widow of Mr.

Russell Sage, who has no active business interests in connection with that institution.

The movement of philanthropic consolidation, we may call it, bears a very close analogy to the movement of industrial consolidation. And this is a point worth noticing, that just as the first two American trusts were the Oil Trust and the Steel Trust, so the two great first American Foundations are the Rockefeller Foundation so closely allied with oil, and the Carnegie Corporation, so firmly founded on steel.

And it is not merely this one parallelism or resemblance. There is a more substantial parallel between the two developments. In the first place, these foundations are the creations of great capitalistic interests, and the expenditures which the capitalists gain, the methods which they have evolved in their business they transfer ready-made to the benefactions and find pretty ready application in them.

Now, furthermore, I maintain that the general trend of industrial development necessarily reflects itself upon the philanthropy of a given time. For instance, it is not an accident that the early philanthropies are represented by individual almsgiving. That is, they are mostly cases where the individual benefactor knows the individual person to be relieved and directly gives whatever aid or succor he can. And later on in the form of charity organization societies aid assumes a more general and better organized and less personal character, and finally in the foundation it there assumes a purely impersonal character. One of the reasons for it seems to me to be the following: Generally in the middle of the last century poverty was not general because unemployment is not; unemployment is a passing condition and poverty as a result of it may be expected to be permanently relieved by securing employment for the needy workers. Then as our industries assume more and more the corporate form, accompanied by large industrial consolidations, as the factory system arises and improved machinery is introduced, followed by division of labor, and as the productivity of labor grows, the labor time remains the same, the labor population increases, unemployment becomes more and more a permanent institution. It is no more sufficient to help the unemployed, the poor worker, over a certain short period. It is necessary to maintain and organize permanent machinery for his relief. Hence the charity organization society.

But then finally we reach a stage where unemployment attains the dignity of a permanent social institution where it can not be relieved by methods of philanthropy in any way. For instance, at the present it is estimated that here at this time, the number of unemployed workers is between three and four millions. In normal times it is figured that at least six million workers are unemployed at least part of the time; and in best times a million and a half to two million are unemployed at one time.

Now, that combined with low wages which the workers receive during the period of employment naturally creates a condition of general and extended poverty and misery, so that the estimates of the number of poor in this country vary according to different standards from two to three millions up to ten millions.

It seems to me it is perfectly apparent that under such conditions even tremendous amounts of money available for philanthropic purposes can not shelter, feed, and clothe all of the needy workers of this country. And therefore philanthropy has abandoned the task altogether.

It is a noteworthy characteristic of these modern foundations that they are not and do not pretend to be charitable institutions. They do not attempt to relieve distress of men by way of old-fashioned charities. Taking as an example Mr. Carnegie's benefactions; they are said to amount to about $300,000,000 or more. Of all of these various funds which go to make up this huge amount only one item may possibly be regarded as aiming to relieve the distress of workers; that is an item of $4,000,000 representing a fund for the relief of injured workers, or of the dependents of workers killed in Pittsburgh, in connection with the works of the United States Steel Corporation. This endowment of $4,000,000 is part of a larger sum of $12,000,000 maintained by the Steel Corporation for the purpose of establishing a general pension fund for its employees. And it is not always easy to say whether an endowment of this kind may be considered in the nature of charitable relief, or rather in the nature of a business investment. But even if it should be considered in the nature of charitable relief, it is $4,000,000, and is the only item on the entire list of Mr. Carnegie's benefactions.

The next item which overshadows it somewhat is the item of $5,000,000 for church organs; then $30,000,000 for the hero fund. All the rest, or most of the rest, is for educational purposes, or for social-welfare work.

Now, if you take Mr. Rockefeller's benefactions you will find that only very recently, and under certain pressure of public opinion, it has devoted $45,000, that is less than 1 per cent of its annual income, to what is commonly termed charity. That is donated to three institutions in the city of New York and in the borough of Brooklyn engaged in charitable work.

One million dollars, or thereabouts, was expended for the relief of the Belgian war sufferers, and that was done under very extraordinary circumstances, and I understand has been discontinued now.

The Russell Sage Foundation has never undertaken to spend any of its funds on charitable relief at all. It devotes its entire resources and income to the investigations of social conditions and the publication of its results.

So that we find that as far as actual charity in the relief of needy fellow men is concerned the modern foundations have departed from the established old-fashioned charity systems.

Then it seems to me there is another feature in which the foundations differ very radically from the old-fashioned charitable societies. The old proverb was, "Charity begins at home." These foundations, it seems to me, often get away with their philanthropies as far as possible from home; at least where they attempt philanthropic work. I mentioned before that the only substantial item of charitable relief expended by the Rockefeller Foundation went to Belgium, and I want to say here it was a good deed. I have no criticism to make of it. I should be the last person in the world to criticize the act, from a narrow nationalistic or pseudo-patriotic point of view. On the contrary, I rejoice always in the growth of the spirit of international brotherhood of men. But I can not help noticing this fact, that, while these ships were being loaded with wheat and corn and other food supplies for the relief of the Belgian war sufferers, there were probably, here in the city of New York and within less than 1 mile from 26 Broadway, tens of thousands of American workers who were suffering for lack of food just as much, perhaps even more, than these Belgian war sufferers. Our bread lines extended, especially during the cold December and January nights, from day to day, and there were in these lines hundreds of men who had given useful service to society in this community, who had given the better part of their lives to useful work, perhaps some of them, perhaps many of them, engaged in some of the divers industries in which Mr. Rockefeller is interested, perhaps having helped to augment his fortune and to enable him to create his foundation. And I say it is rather one-sided not to think of these men right around here.

Now take the other activities—for instance, one which the Rockefeller Foundation has so far undertaken and which does smack of philanthropy, the International Health Commission. This, it appears from the testimony before you, has directed its main work to the eradication of the hookworm in the British West Indies, in Central America, in Egypt, in Ceylon, and in the Malay States, and in the Philippines, and also to the promotion of medical knowledge and public health in China. And, again, I say, in common with all broad-minded American citizens, that I have no criticism to make of this form of relief. I should rather see any Malayan free from the hookworm than suffering from the hookworm, but here there are in this country unnumbered workmen and workwomen dying annually from tuberculosis. It is a disease that is preventable and curable by proper sanitary conditions, wholesome food, fresh air, and some period of rest, all of which can be procured with, comparatively speaking, small investment of funds. Thousands of these victims of the white plague could be saved right here in the United States by judicious application of money.

In the same way I must think of the 500,000 or more of American workmen annually killed, injured, seriously maimed, in the mines, mills, factories, and on the railroads of this country; in other words, just by the corporations in which the funds of the foundations have been largely invested and from which its founder has very largely derived his fortune. Now, the greater part of these accidents are likewise preventable by the application of proper safeguards, by the establishment of proper rules. And it seems to me that a foundation as powerful as the Rockefeller Foundation, or as powerful as the Carnegie Corporation, and having the connections and influence with the industrial world that the founders of these foundations have, could very well decrease the number of these fatalities to a very large extent; and I repeat, it seems to me out of proportion somewhat to devote these tremendous funds accumulated after all by the work of American workers exclusively, as was the case here, to the eradication of the hookworm disease in foreign countries, while entirely neglecting the suffering at home.

Chairman WALSH. This is a convenient moment, and we will adjourn and you may resume in the morning, please.

We will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock in the morning.

(Thereupon, at 4.30 o'clock p. m., Thursday, February 4, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock in the morning of Friday, February 5, 1915, at the same place.)

NEW YORK CITY, February 5, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Ballard, Weinstein, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Hillquit.

The house will please be in perfect order and we will proceed.

Mr. Hillquit, please continue where you left off.

Mr. HILLQUIT. At the conclusion of my testimony yesterday, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Greene, of the Rockefeller Foundation, called my attention to the fact that the work of curing or eradicating the hookworm disease has not been confined by the Rockefeller benefaction to foreign countries alone, but that about 500 cases also had been treated in this country. I cheerfully make this correction. I understand also that the work of hookworm eradication in this country was undertaken long before the Rockefeller Foundation came into existence.

Commissioner LENNOR. Was it 500 or 500,000?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Five hundred was my impression.

Commissioner LENNOR. All right.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Now I do not know whether the Rockefeller Foundation or the International Health Commission are continuing this work in this country. From the published statements of the foundation it would not appear that they do. At any rate the point is of no importance. I have no fault to find with a work, a good work, being done in foreign countries. All I meant to bring out by this point was the decidedly international character of some of the modern philanthropic work, particularly that represented by the large foundations.

I might call attention to the fact that even in the work of social research—that is, investigating social conditions in the United States—the Rockefeller Foundation has engaged a resident of a foreign country, and I might perhaps add also that even in the treatment of birds a certain partiality is shown to the traveling variety, to the migratory birds in preference to the domestic American birds.

In Mr. Carnegie's benefactions we find likewise a large tendency toward international work. For instance, the foreign hero fund, which represents an endowment of more than $5,000,000, and the Peace Palace in the Hague, which I understand is now pretty well deserted, and the various philanthropies in Scotland.

Now, what I claim is that this is not an accident, but that there is a certain well-defined method and a certain purpose, unconscious perhaps, in this international character of capitalistic benefactions.

To my mind these philanthropies are very closely akin to the foreign missionary work done among the heathens of uncultured and undeveloped countries and the basis of both is business; they are both business enterprises.

The American industries to-day have reached an international stage, particularly the large and trustified industries. They find an insufficient market in this country and are bound to create foreign markets. They can not increase those markets in the advanced countries where the conditions are similar to ours, and they must bring in undeveloped territory where the conditions are backward, and for that purpose they are under the necessity of having the population in those countries use the articles of our manufacture, and the population of those undeveloped countries must also in turn render some equivalent to us in the way of some useful work or the production of some useful commodities.

Hence our modern capitalists, the capitalists engaged in international world-wide business, send missionaries to the foreign countries to emancipate the heathen, to get him to the ways of our civilization, including the wearing of civilized clothes, preferably of American manufacture, and also to increase the productivity, the economic efficiency, of those very same heathen. And it seems to me these efforts, say, for instance, the eradication of the hookworm disease, are in that line.

In other words, we have reached this stage that the welfare of the American worker is no more as important to the American capitalist as is the well-being and economic efficiency of the worker or of the population in foreign undeveloped countries, for we can not sell more commodities to our own population, which is deprived of the means to purchase, so we must undertake to sell them or exchange them for other commodities in the foreign countries.

Now, that this was the actual object of these great foundations we learned from the testimony of Mr. Rockefeller, jr., right here before this commission. "It must be mentioned," he says in reply to one of the questions put to him in the questionnaire, "that the ravages of the hookworm disease have a most important effect upon the economic efficiency of the infected persons."

Here is the main point. It is not a question of improving the well-being of mankind generally. It is not a question of making better men, better women, more useful citizens of them. It is a question of improving their economic efficiency. Hence this particular work of eradicating the hookworm disease, to some extent here, and more largely in foreign countries.

What I maintain, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is that the foundations, such as the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Corporation are not philanthropies at all. It is a mistake to designate them as such. What they are actually is sort of supplements, appendices to the business enterprises of certain large capitalists. Just as we find that the large factories, for instance, maintain laboratories for scientific research with a view of improving their methods of work, just so these large business interests have now reached the point where they institute sort of sociological laboratories for researches and investigations, with the same object, and that is to help their business.

For instance, Mr. Rockefeller, again, testifying before this commission characterized the spirit of modern benevolence admirably when he said—and I want to call the attention of the commission to this part particularly—he said: "We have not drawn a sharp line between business and philanthropic enterprises."

Now this might have been a sort of unconscious admission, but it is pregnant with meaning, if you consider it properly—no sharp line drawn between business and philanthropic enterprises. One is considered a part of the day's work just as well as the other, and the details of Mr. Rockefeller's testimony before this commission bear out the statement fully. There it appears that the offices at No. 26 Broadway are the headquarters of Mr. Rockefeller's individual fortune and business enterprises, of the various corporations in which he takes a leading part, and of various benefactions in which he is interested. There Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., as representative of his father, meets with his personal staff of two or three men. Now they are constituted informally as individual capitalists and his advisers; now, as the controlling members of the board of directors of the industrial corporation; now, again, as the finance committee, or the executive committee, or a quorum of the executive committee, of a large so-called philanthropic foundation. They discuss matters relating to the one or the other as they come up. There is a logical smooth transition from the one to the other. They are all blended in one. And these three persons do not even take the time to change their mood or mode of approach from one of these pursuits to the other.

And we find that this character of modern foundations is fully expressed in all of their activities. In the few activities that may be considered in the nature of philanthropic work, we find them engaged principally in two lines—educational and social welfare.

Under the first, the educational, we may take the foundation of Mr. Rockefeller, including the Chicago University, and also a great many of Mr. Carnegie's benefactions. Under the head of social reform work, or social welfare work, we must class such institutions as the Russell Sage Foundation, the Carnegie Peace Endowment and Hero Funds, and finally the Rockefeller Foundation, which has recently announced its intention to institute a thoroughgoing research into social conditions.

As to the social effects of these foundations and this activity, this may be said of them:

That they have all the advantages and all the disadvantages of large modern trusts. They have the advantages of concentrated capital and of great means. They have the disadvantages of individual, irresponsible management. And this is to be noted in connection with educational work primarily. It is limited entirely to so-called higher education, and so does not extend any part of its activity to the common schools or primary education. Why? Because the actual object of this educational work is not philanthropic; is not to in any way elevate the general intellectual condition of the people, or of the working people; but it is to train a sufficient and efficient corps of workers, of helpers, of assistants, in the great industrial establishments. And that is why the educational work is limited very largely to universities and colleges.

Now if our universities and colleges had been merely institutions for abstract learning, such, say, as natural sciences or mathematics, there might have been no social danger in that. But the fact is that in modern times our institutions of learning are forced more and more to take up and to occupy themselves with the vital social affairs of the country. In other words, such sciences as economics or politics or sociology come to the fore all the time, and these are not exact sciences; these are not sciences which anyone, no matter what his personal views may be, may take up and render impartial, efficient services. In all of these sciences the views of the men who teach them are of importance, and they can not be impartial. They are live problems, they are live topics; they are based on social struggles, on conflicting interests, and no matter how unbiased a man may be he must have certain views on the subject. What I claim is that when a teacher of these subjects feels that he owes his entire existence to an endowment of a private individual, or of certain interests, industrial interests, he can not be unbiased in his teaching. He may want to be, but if he feels all along that his own salary, the salary of the college president, the entire existence of the college or university depends upon certain endowments coming from certain well-defined economic interests, if he should ever impartially arrive at conclusions hostile to these interests, it will require more than the ordinary courage to announce such conclusions. Generally he will feel under restraint, and it is not necessary at all that such endowments be given with any conditions attached to them. There may be no condition of any kind. And there is, first of all, in the normal human being the sense of gratitude and recognition, which is hampering in this case. And furthermore there is always this additional consideration, that the institution that once has had to apply to a foundation of this kind may have to do so again. That in order to do so it may keep or must keep in good and proper standing toward the endowers, toward the men or the interests which have furnished the means for the existence of the institution.

Mr. Rockefeller has admitted here that there is a possible danger with reference to the influence of such endowments on higher education. I quote his words, and he added, "If the giver retains any kind of control I think it is unwise," but, as I mentioned before, the giver always retains at least moral control.

Now, President Eliot, as I understood it, has testified before this commission that he knows of a number of cases in which colleges have been influenced by such gifts, or, rather, by the foundation or institutions which have endowed them, but the influence, in his opinion, has been wholly for good. For whose good? Has it been for good in the view of the giver or in the view of the recipient? What is good and what is not good is always a debatable question and depends on the views of one person or another. Now, whether it has been good or not is a debatable question; but the fact that it has influenced, admittedly influenced, the administration and teachings of such colleges shows in itself a very unhealthy condition.

After all, the education of our studying youths, the education of the young men who will have our destinies in their hands in the future, is one of the most sacred functions of Government, and when these functions are allowed to be exercised for good or otherwise, by such agencies and interests, then I claim the future of this country is in danger.

Perhaps a more subtle influence is exercised by another method of so-called philanthropies, as applied to colleges, and that is Mr. Carnegie's pension system. The average college professor is a very much underpaid man; as a rule he can not lay aside, he can not save up anything toward a rainy day; he always must have in mind the approaching period of his life when he will be unable to continue his academic work; he must think of old age; he must think of his family. The Government does not come to his relief; the college does not come to his relief because it has no funds for that purpose. Mr. Carnegie here plays the rôle of kind Providence, and the man, knowing that his future and that of his children, perhaps, depend upon these benefactions, can not, even if he would want to, be entirely unhampered and entirely free in his judgment.

I may mention here an instance of actual fact, which will throw some light on the subject. Mr. Carnegie, it is well known, is, among other things, interested in the peace movement. His peace fund recently decided to publish a very interesting work on the attitude of the labor movement toward militarism and the Army. This was to be a work of international scope and it was intrusted to a very well-known German scholar, a man of progressive ideas. This editor assigned the portion of the work dealing with conditions in America to another scholar, a scholar who was a social investigator in the United States. Now, considering the attitude of the working class toward militarism and toward the Army, he had to take into account the rôle the militia played in labor disputes. The work would not have been complete or unbiased otherwise, and it so happens that this is a very interesting, very important, part for American labor, and it also happens that one of the most striking instances of the interference of the militia in labor disputes occurred in Homestead, in which Mr. Carnegie himself was very largely interested.

Now, here was the dilemma. The book was written with Mr. Carnegie's money, and in order to be true it had to contain an indictment of Mr. Carnegie's business methods. The man was conscientious, and wrote on the subject in a very mild way and matter-of-fact tone. But when it came to the editor in chief he looked it over and frowned and called on this author and went over the subject with him and said, "After all, how do you expect us to publish an indictment of Mr. Carnegie with Mr. Carnegie's money?" "Well, what can we do; we can not omit this chapter, it is very important"; and they discussed it for some time and made some compromise, and as far as I know the book has not been published yet. This is one of the influences which the donor, the generous giver, must have upon impartial scientific investigation.

Then if you take another branch of this activity, the libraries endowed by Mr. Carnegie, there are 2,300 of them in the United States, representing an investment of about $17,000,000. Now, libraries, after all, are practically the only source, or the main source, of information for the adult workers or members of the community generally. What we get from the books, what we get from past investigations, from the best thought of our fellowmen, is contained in these libraries, and while it may be true that Mr. Carnegie does not make up the catalogues of those libraries, still we can hardly expect that a work which may be perfectly truthful and important, but which may oppose Mr. Carnegie's business interests in a very pronounced way, will find its place among such books. In other words, there is a certain restriction even to the intellectual food given to our population through these libraries.

And thus we find that the great corporations of this country, those that have sprung up within the last 10 or 20 years, have not only succeeded in robbing the people of this country of their economic independence but they are making an assault against the intellectual independence of the people of the United States, and I say that these foundations are the chief instruments of such assault.

But even very much more fatal than the influence on the educational work is the influence of such foundations on the work of social reform, on the social welfare work of the country, for after all, if this Nation has any one particular task which is more important than another it is the improvement of the condition of its people, the physical, moral, and intellectual strengthening and the independence of each and every member of the community, and this work should go on unhampered, uninfluenced, and unbiased. It should devolve on the people themselves, and not be left to any biased instrument, and the social foundations which have been formed recently do introduce that element of bias into such work.

Now, let us take this Rockefeller Foundation at present. It is supposed to make an unbiased inquiry into the relations of capital and labor. Let us assume the unbiased investigator who is engaged by Mr. Rockefeller, through his foundation, comes to the conclusion that one of the main evils of modern society is the enormous accumulation of wealth in the hands of individuals. Let us assume he comes to the conclusion that these large accumulations must result in a corresponding decrease in the earnings of the large masses of the people. Let us assume that he sees in Mr. Rockefeller a type of this unhealthy social development, and let us assume that his conclusions, and his bona fide conclusions, are in truth an absolute condemnation of Mr. Rockefeller's business methods and of Mr. Rockefeller's great and immense fortune. Would such an investigator, paid from this very fortune—paid by Mr. Rockefeller— would he be likely to publish the results of his investigations if they are apt to strike directly against his patron? Of course not. He would have to compromise with truth as he sees it.

The Rockefeller Foundation, it seems to me, is one of the most typical instances of the great danger which lurks in the institutions or enterprises of this kind. We heard through this commission and from the mouth of Mr. Rockefeller the story of this foundation, and it appears that the elder Mr. Rockefeller—in the testimony of his son—had some such plan under consideration for several years. The disturbances in Colorado impressed Mr. Rockefeller, jr., with the great need and public importance of finding effective means of preventing such conflicts and caused him to urge a far-reaching study of industrial relations. Now, it would seem to the ordinary mortal that if Mr. Rockefeller's attention were called to the industrial ills by this particular situation in Colorado, in view of the fact that he was so strongly interested in it, in view of the fact that the Colorado conflict presented very definite and concrete issues to be solved, that the first thing he would do would be to investigate those particular grievances of the workers in Colorado in order to see whether or not they could be adjusted. But no. Mr. Rockefeller did not reason that way. He says that in view of the passion aroused in Colorado and the many divergent interests—the many divergent interests being practically the different interests between him and other stockholders and owners of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and the 15,000 men—these different or many divergent interests involved here, "the foundation itself should not interfere in that situation, but that it was of the utmost consequence that the root cause of that and similar disturbances should be ascertained and, if possible, removed not only in Colorado, but elsewhere."

And so Mr. John D. Rockefeller, as the employer of labor, had neither interest nor function, as he claims, to investigate the conditions in Colorado and to redress the grievances of the workers.

Mr. Rockefeller, jr., as a member and prime mover of the foundation, felt that he should not at all interfere with these disturbances which happened to be in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in Colorado, but should go out and make a general search for the root causes. And that was all the easier, because in Mr. Rockefeller's own estimation it would take several generations to discover that elusive root cause of all trouble.

His exact statement is that he does "not suppose that coming generations will solve that problem which the past generations have not succeeded in solving." So that Mr. Rockefeller, as representative of the foundation, puts off for several generations the discovery of the root causes of industrial discontent.

The workers in Colorado in the meanwhile suffer to-day. They require some sort of relief to-day, relief from oppression, relief from underpay, relief from overwork, from all maltreatments of every kind. And Mr. Rockefeller answers: "Why, within a few generations we may come back to you with a discovery of the root causes of all social unrest and maladjustment not only in Colorado, but all through the world."

Now, this puts the point definitely upon the objects of these foundations. It is not to grant relief. It is to switch the issue into a general abstract prolonged study with somewhat debatable uncertain conclusions. If Mr. Rockefeller actually had the welfare of mankind, the well being of mankind in mind, as the charter of his foundation calls for, why, it seems to me the easiest thing to do would have been to go over to Colorado and to see to it that his corporation enforced the laws of the State and improved somewhat the conditions of labor; to satisfy his workers who do produce large profits for him, and the root causes would take care of themselves.

And the peculiar point in connection with the embarking into social research by the Rockefeller Foundation is this: That it has come at the peculiar time and under circumstances calculated to throw some suspicion upon the motives of the founders. Bearing in mind that while Mr. Rockefeller, jr., was impressed with the necessity of the thorough research into social relations, and while he was in search for the root causes of it, a Commission on Industrial Relations was then in existence, created by authority of the Government of the United States and given ample powers to investigate, with the right to subpoena witnesses, with the right and powers which a private institution never can possess, and that that commission was actively engaged just at that time in such inquiry, in such investigation; that such investigation, among other things, also extended to the trouble in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.; in other words, Mr. Rockefeller's concern. And that just at that time Mr. Rockefeller was not satisfied to wait for the conclusions of this commission for its results, for its report, which, perhaps, might throw some very interesting light on the root causes; that just at that time and just after his own company had been investigated by this commission, he announced to the world that now he would go on his own hook and reinvestigate the entire thing upon an entirely new basis and upon his individual initiative. To the unblinded mind it seems like an attempt to hurl the weight of his hundred millions of dollars against the modest allowance of the United States Government; to throw the power of his private wealth, his great accumulated wealth, against the collective powers of the people of the United States. And, to my mind, the announcement by the foundation of its intention to go into a field of research paralleling that of the commission appointed by the United States was a direct challenge to the Government of the United States and to the people of the United States.

Then, also, there is another interesting point in connection with this new research by the Rockefeller Foundation. Mr. Rockefeller, Jr., does not propose to follow any definite lines of investigation. What he has done was to engage Mr. Mackenzie King and to leave the methods and work to him exclusively. He says, "We have proceeded in this same way, as we have in the case of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. In one case we engaged Dr. Flexner and left it to him to work out the details; in the other case we engaged Mr. Mackenzie King and left it to him to work out the details."

But this comparison is only apparently and superficially true. It is not true in fact. When you undertake medical research the personal convictions and views and attitude of the man who undertakes that work plays very little part. It is a definite concrete science. The methods to be applied are technical methods worked out by scientific investigators. When you undertake social inquiry, on the other hand, you are not dealing with concrete matters of this kind. You are dealing here with social relations. You are dealing with struggles between different classes, different interests. You must have a view, and your views must lean toward one side or the other. There is no such thing as absolute scientific impartiality in cases of this kind. And the man selected for the purpose of handling that research work must have a definite view and a definite attitude for social problems. Unless he has, unless he had done some work before he would not be selected for the position. In other words, Mr. Rockefeller would not select a man who had not expressed himself before on the subject, one way or another. In order that he may have qualifications for the position he must have done some work in this line before.

Now, what was known of Mr. Mackenzie King to Mr. Rockefeller before this appointment—before he was intrusted with the task of discovering the root causes of all social evils? Two things: Mr. King had been minister of labor in Canada and as such he had fathered and gotten through and administered a law which penalized the workers and the labor organizations for going on strike before submitting their disputes to arbitration and mediation. In other words, a law which, in the opinion of the labor unions, tends to paralyze their aggressive activity and to wrench from them the only instrument they have for self-protection.

Now, imagine a similar law existing in Colorado, for instance. With the Government, from the governor to the sheriff, bailiff, and marshal in every camp, in the hands of the mining companies absolutely controlled by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.; imagine that in this particular strike notice would have to be given first to those representatives of the Government, so thoroughly influenced by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. What would be the result? Why, a very simple thing. Investigation would be dragged on for a few months, and in the meanwhile strike breakers supplied and the strike made absolutely impossible.

What else was known of Mr. King? There, it seems to me, was a very interesting chapter contained in the correspondence between Mr. King and Mr. Rockefeller, Jr., particularly the letter of Mr. King addressed to Mr. Rockefeller read here. It appears that prior to his appointment Mr. King was consulted by Mr. Rockefeller about the concrete situation in Colorado, and it just so happened that Mr. Rockefeller, Jr., trustee and president of the foundation, for a moment mixed up his part with that of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., the director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and consulted Mr. King practically in the latter capacity. Mr. King's answer is illuminating. He says, in substance: "Do not worry very much over this demand of the union for recognition. Better times are coming. This war will send thousands and tens of thousands of workers into the Colorado field to compete with your workers, who will oversupply the market and depress the wages to such an extent that the workers will be glad to get any kind of a job on any kind of terms and not talk about union recognition." Now, I am giving you the substance of it in my own words, and not in as polished and diplomatic language as Mr. King gave it to Mr. Rockefeller, but the substance is absolutely the same.

And a significant fact is his saying that under such circumstances the workers would not care for the "shadow of union recognition," but would have to concentrate all their efforts to maintaining standards, "thus creating a possible avenue of approach toward restoring normal conditions in Colorado." Normal conditions in Colorado, in the view of Mr. King, are conditions of an oversupply of labor, of fierce competition between workers for a job, and of a condition in which the workers will have to surrender to their employers upon any and all terms. Those are normal conditions.

These views of Mr. King are very definitely expressed, and they were known to Mr. Rockefeller, perfectly well known, before his engagement; and now, I will ask you, why does Mr. King need a full catalogue of references? Why does Mr. King need several generations of work to evolve a plan for reaching the root causes of the social evils? It seems to me he has already evolved it and his evolution or solution of these difficulties, as he sees it, has been the main reason for his appointment to this important position by the Rockefeller Foundation.

Another point of interest is this: In the advance information a little booklet issued by the Rockefeller Foundation, and also repeated, I believe, in the answers to the questions printed for this commission, the foundation states this:

"The Rockefeller Foundation is, moreover, a large owner of corporate securities, and in that capacity is itself directly concerned in maintaining harmonious relations between the companies in which it is interested and their employees."

Now, mark you, the Rockefeller Foundation, which is going out to make an impartial investigation of social conditions, and once and for all do away with social strife, is itself a large owner in some of the largest corporations whose securities it holds and is interested in the solution of social problems—interested, as frankly stated, as owner and as employer. And there is where the bias of this enterprise is clearly demonstrated. Again it is the blending of business and philanthropy. Again it is a biased investigation from the point of view of the owner. Assume the United States Government undertakes an investigation of social conditions. Assume that it would say that it is largely interested on the part of the employers. What would the people of this country say to an investigation of this kind, if any kind of a movement is inaugurated for the study of social discontent or social strife, or for the evolution of social remedies—what would the public say if such an investigation were made up wholly of employers or wholly of workers? Still Mr. Rockefeller believes that it is a point in favor of the foundation; that it is also a large employer and interested directly financially in the results of such investigation.

My answer, then, to the first question as to the social desirability of these foundations is briefly that I believe the influence is pernicious in every way; that it militates against democracy in every field of human endeavor, industrial, political, intellectual. I think particularly the Rockefeller Foundation, as far as it engages in social research work, is disingenuous, and is opposed to true social enlightenment and progress.

Now, then, I am asked, as a second question, if these are my conclusions, what remedy or what measure do I propose as against them. I will say, first, that the reason why these great foundations have been able to spring up and, no doubt will increase and multiply in the future if allowed an unchecked development, is, that the Government has unfortunately neglected the most legitimate fields of endeavor which it should occupy and fully fill.

Nothing is more peculiarly a field for governmental activity than social education and betterment. A true democracy, one depending upon self-reliance of its citizens—of the members of the community—must be more jealous of these governmental functions and of their proper exercise than of such prerogative, for instance, as the coining of money. I hold that all institutions for higher learning, just as well as our elementary schools, should be owned, managed, and conducted by the State or the National Government, should not be dependent on individual benefactions, and should be conducted democratically and with a view to the development of the full and untrammelled academic freedom. I hold further that an institution like this commission—this Commission on Industrial Relations—or any commission similar to this, but with larger powers and larger appropriations should be made a permanent institution, and would be a very valuable adjunct to the Government of this country. A commission always at hand, always ready to go from place to place all through the country, and to take up the problems as they arise from time to time; a commission which would have the right, if possible, to make some immediate adjustments where it finds the law violated or moral principles trampled upon; a commission with power to recommend legislation and executive action whenever required; a commission of this kind in permanent session would certainly contribute a large deal toward the solution, if not of the main problems confronting the public to-day, then, at least, of such problems as spring up from day to day. I believe further that a commission of this kind, if in permanent existence, would avoid such outrages as may have occurred in Colorado or in New Jersey here, for instance, recently; that they would not occur at all; because the employers would be more careful. They would know that in case they exceeded the bounds of propriety and lawfulness and exceed them very flagrantly, the commission would be there immediately, and that the entire situation would be made public, every fact would be fully investigated and looked into; and, as I say, they would be more careful.

Now, this is another measure which I advocate. I should advise that the powers and the functions of the foundations should be strictly limited. Take for instance the Rockefeller Foundation, and I always refer to that because, to my mind, it is the most typical instance of these modern foundations. It is incorporated by special act of the legislature for the purpose of "receiving and maintaining a fund or funds and applying the income and principal thereof to the promotion of the well-being of mankind throughout the world," and it may use, according to its act of incorporation "such means to that end which from time to time as shall seem expedient to its members or trustees." It may "invest and reinvest the principal and deal with the principal and expend the income and principal of the corporation in such manner as in the judgment of the trustees will best promote the object."

Now, then, bearing in mind, first of all, that the objects of the corporation are absolutely unlimited, the words "well-being of mankind" in themselves mean nothing, but if read in conjunction with the other parts they mean, "well-being of mankind" such as in the judgment of the board of trustees they may consider to be such well-being, and it means that the foundation is practically given absolute unlimited and unrestricted functions and powers.

Now, it is a corporation without membership, it consists simply of trustees or directors without a constituency; there is no election by anybody. The members or trustees are designated by the charter, and the charter does not even specify the number of such directors. That is left to the by-laws, which may be changed from time to time. The by-laws may increase or decrease the number of such directors or trustees. There is nothing in this law, I hold, which would prevent the foundation from reducing the number of its members or trustees to three, Mr. Rockefeller, perhaps, Mr. Greene, and Mr. Lee; they may constitute the entire foundation. There is nothing in the act to prevent it. Now, then, they may use this vast fund of $100,000,000 for any purpose. They may exercise this tremendous power for good or evil as they choose, but my point is that whether it should be for good or evil the public can not determine, the Government can not determine. The views of the men who constitute this corporation may alone determine what shall be for the well-being of mankind.

Let us assume that we are facing a national election; let us assume that we are facing an election of more than usual importance, and such an election is not at all impossible. Say, that in 1916, or perhaps 1920, the people of this country will face vital issues going to the very root of their existence and democratic institutions. It may be the question of the public ownership of railways and it may be the larger question of industrial democracy against industrial feudalism; it may be a question of the entire life and mode of existence of this country. It is possible that in an election of this kind the Rockefeller Foundation alone would be perfectly capable of swinging it one way or the other as it chose. It would not have to subsidize political parties, but by subsidizing a large portion of the American press, by buying in newspapers and flooding the country with literature, it would be enabled to swing a national election; less than a hundred million dollars has been known to do that in the past, and at a crucial point the Rockefeller Foundation may step in and decide the fate of this country.

Now, furthermore, there is one point which I want to make as emphatic as I can, and that is I claim that the Rockefeller Foundation is in no sense a philanthropic or charitable enterprise at all, that it masquerades as such, and that it is time for the people of the United States to throw off that mask. Why? What is the Rockefeller Foundation? It is a slice of the Rockefeller fortune, a segment of it, $100,000,000 of the same stocks and bonds of which the rest of his fortune consists, segregated and set apart and named the Rockefeller Foundation instead of John D. Rockefeller, jr.

Now, bear this in mind, that Mr. Rockefeller is supposed to own, according to popular opinion, something like $1,000,000,000. For immediate personal purposes he does not need his billion dollars, as both he and his son are popularly supposed to be frugal and modest men, so that they could well get along with the income on one or two million dollars, which is but one-tenth or one-fifth of 1 per cent of the amount. The rest represents industrial power, political power, general power—the power to handle these funds and to invest and re-invest them in support of one movement or another; that is what constitutes the essence of these great swollen fortunes.

Now, Mr. Rockefeller does not part with this power in creating the Rockefeller Foundation, for all these hundreds of millions remain in bonds and stocks in which he can deal or can change, he can sell or replace, just in the same way as the stock and bonds remaining in the other compartments of his safe. And when the time should ever come that he would have to resort to this particular $100,000,000 for personal purposes, for household expenses, for instance, why I hold that under its present act of incorporation there is nothing to prevent him from doing so.

I hold that this $100,000,000 that Mr. Rockefeller does not need for actual purposes of consumption, and which he retains for general business purposes, that that may accumulate year after year, and I am speaking of the charter, or may increase year after year free from taxation, and when the time comes and the board of trustees has been reduced to John D. Rockefeller, jr., and his personal staff, they may be returned to Mr. Rockefeller and his heirs, in some indirect way, under some guise of being for the well-being of mankind.

I repeat that there is no membership in that corporation, there is no public control of the corporation, no Government control, and for this reason I believe this should be done: I would suggest that what is required at the present time while this foundation is in existence is a law amending its charter so as to restrict its functions in some particulars.

For instance, it should be subject to supervision by the State, as insurance companies or banking corporations or fraternal and benevolent societies. The State should have powers of visitation, should see to it that its income is properly expended, and principally that it be all expended annually and not allowed to accumulate. The foundation should have a certain minimum number of members fixed by law, members as distinguished from trustees, members who should elect the trustees and to whom the trustees should be accountable. It should file annual accounts of all of its doings, its income, expenses, and the application of its funds. And, above all, it should not be exempt from taxation.

The chairman raised the question yesterday while I happened to listen to Mr. Hepburn's testimony, I believe, whether it is not a fact that the taxes which this particular slice of Mr. Rockefeller's fortune saves would amount to about $300,000. It would under the income-tax law. But I want to call your attention that it is not the question of the income alone, but also of the principal.

The Rockefeller Foundation is a New York corporation, a domestic corporation. Its property is personal property of a domestic corporation. Our present tax rate is about 2 per cent, a little less than that, say 1.90. Upon this basis I hold that this $100,000,000 would be liable to a tax of well-nigh $2,000,000 annually, a property tax as distinguished from the income tax. The income tax would be about $300,000. But against which the tax on the personal property, the property tax would be offset. The total in taxes, I hold, on this fortune is over $2,000,000 annually. And when the time comes when the present founder, the chief founder should pass away, it will save an inheritance tax of many, many millions again.

Now, what does that mean? That means the following: A tax, after all, is imposed for necessary governmental work and functions. It amounts to a certain sum, which is required for the maintenance of the government of the State of New York, the city of New York, and of the Federal Government. If the taxes fall below that amount, they have to be made up by the rest of the taxpayers. If $2,000,000 are taken out of the taxable property of the State of New York, the people of the State of New York will have to make up these $2,000,000, and every one of the citizens contributes something to it.

I hold that indirectly the Rockefeller Foundation receives from the people of the State of New York, through the Government, something like $2,000,000 a year in which the people as such have absolutely no say of any kind. There is absolutely no good reason in the world why a private philanthropy should be exempt from taxation, because it allows the private endower to fix the nature of the so-called philanthropy, and it makes the public contribute to it, and contribute to it heavily. This is my answer to the second question. And the other questions I will go over more rapidly.

The next question which you have asked me was—(Chairman WALSH. Let us have perfect order, please, ladies and gentlemen.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Has the growth of large corporations improved the physical conditions under which the workmen are employed?

My answer to that is that on the whole they have not. There has been some improvement in some industries. Large corporations are based on large plants, and large plants have better facilities for sanitary conditions, for instance, and some of them have actually introduced better sanitary conditions than prevailed under the reign of small industries. But I find as a general rule that work in large corporations, in large plants, is more intense, more consuming than in small plants under the reign of small corporations and small managements. The average industrial life of the worker has perceptibly decreased since the introduction or development of trusts.

The next question is, Have the large corporations increased wages as rapidly as the prices of commodities increased, or shortened working hours as rapidly as the development of the industry would warrant?

My answer to that is, that as a rule they have not. The best available figures show an increase of 25 per cent approximately of the cost of living, that is, the most necessary articles to be consumed by working people's families. In some trades, particularly those that have well-organized labor unions, wages might have risen in proportion; that is, say, 25 per cent more. But in a majority of the trades wages have remained stationary or they have fallen back, and similarly as to the hours of labor. The increased productivity of each of these large corporations with their improved machinery, their division of labor, their improved methods have served not to shorten the hours of labor, not to relieve the work of the laborer, but to throw a number of workers out of employment. We have to-day a standing army of unemployed larger than ever in the history of the past. That is caused by the fact that the hours of labor have not been shortened; that the workers have been allowed to work as long as in the past, and the increased productivity has simply created a surplus population.

We have to-day in the United States several million men able to work, capable physically, mentally, and in every other respect, and eager to work, but whom our industrial machinery has discarded, thrown out, and made permanently useless. An artificial surplus population has been created.

Another very interesting observation that may be made in connection with the testimony on that point given by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., is the method of distributing wealth between employers and employees as exemplified by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. Now, here are the figures, as I gather, from Mr. Rockefeller's testimony. In the course of the 12 years during which he has been connected with Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Mr. Rockefeller has received as profits in the shape of interest on bonds and dividends on stock, amounting to over $9,200,000. Mr. Rockefeller's interest represented 40 per cent of the total, both in stocks and in bonds. Consequently if he receives $9,200,000 and that represented 40 per cent, the other bondholders and stockholders must have received the remaining 60 per cent, one and one-half times as much as Mr. Rockefeller, and all of them together a total of $23,000,000. The company has also accumulated a reserve fund, undivided profits as security fund for the payment of bonds, and dividends, and preferred stock, amounting to about $5,800,000. The company property has appreciated—increased—in value during that period $19,300,000 approximately.

Now, this increase in value, Mr. Rockefeller seemed to be unable to interpret properly. But we all know what it means. It means that the property represents an additional value, an additional investment, if you want, of $19,000,000. These $19,000,000 are profits, just as clear profit as those distributed. In fact the directors might have, or the stockholders might have distributed among themselves and then reinvested $19,000,000 for the purposes of enhancing the future earnings of the company. They are investing new money in the same or other enterprises all the time anyhow. Thus we find the total profits of the stockholders and bondholders of the company during the 12 years of Mr. Rockefeller's connection with it, to amount something like $48,000,000. During the same period of time the workers are said to have received $92,000,000. When we say $92,000,000, that means the pay roll. That includes no doubt management, salaries of officials, and the actual wages of the laborers, of the workers, must have been considerably less. Doubtless it amounted to no more than $80,000,000. And thus you will find that the proportions of the division of the earnings between capital and labor was about 35 to 65, or perhaps 40 to 60.

Now, take another aspect of the case. Here was an investment of $60,000,000. Mr. Rockefeller testified that the capital stock which represents a nominal value of something like $34,000,000, I believe, actually stood at $15,000,000 in cash. He had paid $6,000,000 for 40 per cent, that is $15,000,000 for the total. The bonds amounted to $45,000,000, making a total of $60,000,000 invested in that industry. As against this, there are 15,000 workmen. So what you have there, if you speak of the relation of capital and labor, is one worker on one side to $4,000 represented by stocks and bonds, on the other side, to balance that—an investment of $4,000 for every worker employed. This block of stocks and bonds representing $4,000 receives 40 cents for every 60 cents paid to the worker. And if you want to equalize this share, you would have to put the worker on the one side and $6,000 on the other side. If you have that, both of them draw from the industry an equal amount. That is, in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., which is concededly one of the least profitable investments of Mr. Rockefeller or any other capitalist. It is in its pioneer days. It has not developed its full earning powers, and it is safe to assume that in the normal average industries the share would be about 50 and 50, and it would require about $5,000 in capital, stock, and bonds to equal and parallel the income of one workingman. And there you have it. Here you have pitted against each other the worker who gives his entire life, his energy, his work, his toil to the production of some useful commodity. And here you have, on the other side, the dead accumulation of $5,000; each of them drawing equally upon the industry, the dead $5,000 clips off one-half of the products of the worker.

And more than that. There is this distinction, that the worker draws his share only so long as he remains active in the industry, only so long as he can actually produce. When he becomes old and feeble he is discarded. When he dies of course he drops out. His industrial life may be 20 years or 25 years or 30 years, according to the industry. But the accumulated capital, the $5,000 in stock and bonds remains eternal. It is an investment forever and ever, and it is matched not against an individual worker but against an entire generation of workers, one following the other, in eternity.

Upon this calculation, take Mr. Harry K. Thaw. If he is deemed worth a million dollars, he may not do a stroke of work and probably does not, but his worth is equal to that of 200 generations of workingmen actively engaged in the industry, working day after day and year after year all through their lives.

If the figures of Mr. Rockefeller's worth are approximately correct, although Mr. John D. Rockefeller has withdrawn from industrial activity 15 or 20 years ago, his money to-day matches, neutralizes, and equalizes the life efforts of 200,000 workingmen in the United States.

Now, that, it seems to me, appears clearly from the figures of Mr. Rockefeller himself, or from an analysis of them.

But I hold, of course, that the large corporations tend to perpetuate that absolutely abnormal, impossible condition.

Your next question is: Does the corporate type of organization tend to produce a higher grade of workmen or citizens?

My answer is, it does not. On the contrary, it has a degrading and demoralizing effect on American citizenship. You have before you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the commission, two different types of employers testifying, the "good" ones and the "bad" ones—the benevolent despot and the malevolent despot—and in both cases they have been despots; they have been demoralizing and degrading the workers.

Take the case of the employer who provides the playgrounds and baseball field and the pension funds and all sorts of welfare work, and even pays them voluntarily a decent wage. He means well. But the effect on the workers is nevertheless to take out from them the self-reliance, their economic independence. They are treated well in the same sense that a slave would be treated well by a kind-hearted master. But they remain abjectly dependent upon that master. They do not develop any self-reliance, and it is a very unhealthy and very unstable condition.

Take the case of Mr. Ford, who has justly been entitled to some share of the admiration of his fellow men. Now, he has certain high and broad ideas which he applies to his industry, and his workers are happy while it lasts—as happy as well-fed animals, and no more. Suppose Mr. Ford passes out of existence, and suppose the successors or purchaser of his stock have different ideas and introduce an entirely different régime, cut off all benefits of welfare work, and exploit the workers to the bottom. The workers have not been trained to resist it. On the other hand, if the same workers had the well-organized union, if the same workers had acquired these privileges by their own struggle, by their own organization, by their own power, they could maintain them, Mr. Ford or no Mr. Ford, whatever the inclination of the employer may be. Then the other type of employer is one who has the same powers, but does not have the same philanthropic inclinations. And, then, you have the characteristic régime of Colorado. You have the brutal oppression, which likewise tends to curb the American worker, his spirit of independence. I hold that only that nation will be great and powerful which will train its individual members to industrial, political, and intellectual independence and self-reliance, and that any nation which depends upon a group of men, powerful men, powerful in industry or otherwise, that that nation is bound to reach a state of retrogression, and that in a very short time.

Have the large corporations, you ask further, acted as bulwarks to prevent the growth of trades-unions?

I think they have. You have only to glance over the list of the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and you will find the strongest of those in industries in which industrial concentration has not so far progressed very far, or has been impossible. For instance, the mining industry is naturally and necessarily tied to certain spots in the United States where the mines are. It is scattered, and a physical concentration of the mines is impossible, such as the concentration shown in the steel works and similar industries. For this reason there are numbers of competing mining companies. The miners are the strongest union on the list of the American Federation of Labor. You take the carpenters, the building trades, the brewers, the clothing workers, the printers, the cigar makers, the bakers—all those are workers employed in, comparatively speaking, smaller industries, whereas you look in vain for the strong organization of steel workers and oil workers and of the workers engaged in any of the great industrial and consolidated trusts. So, I hold these trusts, these large concerns, did prevent and do prevent the development of labor organizations.

In the next questions I think I shall best group a few of them together and try to answer them together. The questions are: The extent to which potential control over labor conditions is concentrated in the hands of the financial directors of large corporations; the extent to which this potential control is exercised in connection with the labor methods; and, finally, responsibility of absentee landlords of industry for the conditions existing in corporations in which they are financially interested.

My answer to those, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, is that we have had a very concrete illustration here before this board in the testimony particularly of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and in the testimony of several other witnesses themselves interested in large industrial enterprises. And we have found a very peculiar and a very recent development. When some people of radical notions object to the distribution of wealth between capital and labor, and to capital receiving a very large portion of the general earnings of the American people, the answer usually is and has been, "Well, but without capital there would be no labor. Capital is entitled to a large share because it organizes and manages the industry, and thus furnishes the opportunity to the workers to earn a living." The profits of capital have been variously style wages or compensation of management or of direction.

Now, then, how well the present modern capitalist, particularly those of the highest type of development—I mean highest financially, the banking director—directs the industry has been shown in the case of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. particularly. Here is a community of 15,000 workers gathered in one part of the State of Colorado. They are all massed around certain coal mines and ore deposits in the State. They are engaged in the business of converting them into such shape as will make them articles of use and consumption to the world at large. With their families they probably represent a community of about 60,000 or 70,000 men, women, and children, all dependent upon this industry, this industry being particularly a natural one, one dependent upon the treasures embedded in the earth right there. And in their work and industry there springs up a civilization of its own. These men and women have their needs. They have their social requirements. They have their degree of civilization, such as it is; they develop camps, villages, towns, and other habitations. They have to have dwellings; they must have some recreation; they must have some food for their intellectual and moral lives as well as for their physical lives. And all this industry and all these people dependent upon it are managed and controlled by a corporation known as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. And Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., in behalf of his father, whom he represents, practically has the controlling interest in that corporation. He owns 40 per cent, he says, of its stock. He says he, as a stockholder, has nothing more than a large moral influence. We know better. We know that he practically has the actual control, because everyone more or less familiar with the affairs of this kind knows that the annual meeting of a large corporation is never attended by over 70 or 75 per cent of the stockholders. That would be a large per cent. Forty per cent concentrated in one hand has the absolute voting power. Mr. Rockefeller no doubt is fully chargeable legally and morally with the conduct of that community—that section of the American population, representing about 60,000 or 70,000 persons.

Now, then, what does Mr. Rockefeller know or do about this community? He comes before your commission with a very elaborate theory of corporate responsibility; he divides the corporation into four parts—the stockholders, the directors, the officers, and the employees. The functions of the stockholders are limited to the election of directors; they have nothing else to do, nothing to say about the management. They elect directors once a year and then do nothing until the next year. The function of the directors is limited to the election of executive officers and to the financial affairs of the corporation. The officials have the direct management of the industry, the direct control of it. The workers—well, the workers are there and that is about all they are, too.

Now, then, let us consider what does Mr. Rockefeller—and Mr. Rockefeller's case is used as an illustration because it is a typical case as has been described time and again on this stand and elsewhere—what does Mr. Rockefeller know or care about the actual industry in which he has a controlling share? It appears that he was last in Colorado about 10 years ago, and then made a very superficial examination of the plant of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. He does not know in what counties of the State the mines are located; he does not know where the principal office of the general manager of the corporation is located; he is absolutely ignorant of the working conditions in the mines; he does not know whether 12 hours' work in a rolling mill a day is too much or too little or just sufficient. He does not know whether 7 days a week of continuous work would be too much or too little or what effect it would have on the workers. He does not know whether the company owns the homes of the workers, whether it owns the saloons in the camps; he does not know whether it maintains a system of company stores; he does not know the first thing about the actual operations of the concern in which he has invested $24,000,000, and which employs 60,000 or 70,000 men, in which he is a controlling factor. He is, however, interested in the financial part of the concern, that, of course, he has to be as a director, he states. But when it comes to summarizing his knowledge of the finances of the company, here is what appears. When the chairman of this commission asked him what the amount of the capital stock of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was—and the amount of the capital stock of a corporation constitutes the financial side of it—Mr. Rockefeller did not know; when he was asked what the bonded indebtedness of the corporation was he likewise did not know. When he was asked whether the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. held all of the stock of the Colorado Supply Co. he did not know. He did not know what the Colorado Supply Co. practically represented, and when he was asked about the Colorado Industrial Co., whether that company was the holding company for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., he did not know. He did not know the capitalization of either of the corporations, and, most amazing of all, he did not know the amount of his own investments. He said he could ascertain what it was by looking into the books. The most comical part of it, if it were not so serious, was the fact that the chairman of this commission had to inform Mr. Rockefeller about his investments, about the revenue on his investments, about the capitalization of his company, about the real conditions of his company in its relation to the subsidiary companies, etc., and Mr. Rockefeller was only able to say, "If you say so, I suppose it is so."

Now, that is the extent to which Mr. Rockefeller contributes in knowledge, activity, usefulness, management, and direction of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Now, I do not hold that to be a crime. Ignorance is a pardonable offense; we all have the privilege of being ignorant on certain points, but the question nevertheless arises why, with that absolute detachment from business generally, with absolute ignorance of any fact connected with it, why should young Mr. Rockefeller be the owner and manager and director and controller of this industry? Why should the lives and welfare of 70,000 men and women and children depend, as they do, on one who takes so little interest in the matter? The answer is that Mr. Rockefeller has invested his capital in it. True, but that capital was secured by him as interest on bonds and as dividends on stock in other corporations of which he knows just as little as he does in regard to this corporation. And the $9,200,000 which he drew from this corporation will be reinvested by him in some other industry and then he will have control of some other large section or some part of this country, and so on indefinitely and forever.

The incomes of the large industrial magnates grow without any activity on their part, and as they grow they become that much more of a perpetual mortgage upon the lives and welfare of the population generally.

The testimony of Mr. Rockefeller shows that the modern financial magnates, especially the banking variety, have passed out of any active rôle in modern industry; that they have been reduced to a purely parasitic existence.

The next question, and I have very few more, is, "Does the fact that many large corporations of thousands of stockholders, among whom are large numbers of employees, in any way affect the control or policy of large corporations?"

My answer is that they do not. The ordinary stockholder does not manage, does not control. If we take our very large corporations we will usually find that their control is vested in some one financial group, and that the thousands of scattered small stockholders do not act in conjunction or concert, or do not act at all. As a rule, they never appear at annual meetings and never vote. The employees who hold stock in corporations have, perhaps, very much less influence even than the individual stockholders. First, they never have a substantial part of the stock of any corporation, they always have a very insignificant holding, and that holding is given to them in order to make them more subservient to the corporation. Many workers have invested $100 or $200 or $300 in stock of a company. When he invests his money in the corporation he becomes dependent upon that corporation. On the other hand, his little investment gives him absolutely no real control, direct or indirect, or even potential. In conjunction with this, this may be noted, that in modern times a stockholder has practically ceased to be part owner of an industry. Stockholding no more implies part ownership of a given industry, it is not any more a permanent investment, it is only a title to the profits or dividend or interest. The banking system which has stepped on to the heels of the corporate management and has taken over the corporate management has changed the character of stockholding. Now, the ordinary investor holds whatever stocks or bonds he has only as the stock market dictates. He may hold 100 shares of United States Steel or that amount of shares in some railroad or another—he may hold these shares on one day, and the next day he may change them for shares in mines or other industrial enterprises. He does not consider himself a permanent stockholder in the United States Steel Corporation or in the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. or any other corporation of which he holds bonds or stock, but he simply has possession of them in order that he may receive the dividends paid on them, and if there is any other security which he thinks preferable he exchanges them. Industrial management under the present corporate control has become so absolutely impersonal that stocks and bonds, except in large blocks sufficient to give control, mean no connection with the industry at all.

Now, finally, the last question, "Does experience indicate that large corporations can be trusted to reform themselves?"

The answer is that they can not, because their material interests are opposed to any such reformation, administered by themselves.

"Are the workmen employed by large corporations in positions to work out their own salvation by trades-union organizations?"

The answer to that is, partly: Trade-unions may help them largely in their resisting any attempted or actual purpose on the part of the employer, but only to a certain extent. Take, for instance, the situation in Colorado in this strike of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. Assuming that the workers had been fully organized in that industry, and assuming that the strike had resulted in a complete tie-up. Then what happens? Strike breakers are imported from every adjoining county and, perhaps, from Eastern States. The strikers are harassed and molested, attacked, assaulted, and practically beaten into submission. They attempt to appeal to the constituted authorities and the sheriff is found to be in the pay of the mine company; they attempt to appeal higher, to the courts, and the judge happens to be a former or a prospective lawyer of the mining company. They appeal to the governor of the State, and the governor of the State has been largely elected by the funds of the company; and they are checkmated by such conditions at every move.

I say that industrial organizations alone, the trade-unions alone, will not secure to the workers absolute industrial independence and freedom. In order to have that, in order to have the full economic power to which they are entitled and need they must necessarily also possess political power. In other words, they must see to it that the sheriff elected in their county, the judge elected in their court, the governor elected in the State of Colorado, do not represent the interests of capital. They must organize politically as well as they must economically. They must elect their men to office just as well as they elect their representatives in their unions. So my answer is that trade-unions but solve the problem partly; they would solve it completely in conjunction with political labor organizations.

And the final question is:

"Is existing State and Federal legislation adequate and properly drawn to provide against abuses; if none of the existing agencies are competent to deal with the situation, what general form of organization would you recommend as best for State and Federal action?"

It is always difficult to prescribe one general panacea or one general form of taking care of abuses, but I should recommend, first of all, the unrestricted legal right of workers to organize. By this, I mean that the workers should have the right to do all that is required for the purpose of organizing a union. They should have the right to speak freely without intervention or interference of spies employed by their employers. Spying on employees should be made a punishable offense and prohibited by law. They should have the right to meet freely and the right to persuade workers to join the union.

Now, in regard to employers having the same right to employ whoever they please, the reasoning of the recent opinion of the Supreme Court was that a law discriminating in favor of unions was unconstitutional, because just as a worker has a right to work or not work for an employer, just so the employer should have the right to employ and refuse to employ a worker connected with a union. The analogy seems perfect from the point of view of abstract legal reasoning, but it is opposed to real reason. It is not in conformity with the actual situation or the actual facts. The fact of the matter is that there is no analogy between the situation of the employer and the situation of the employee in modern conditions. The employer has all the power, the employee has none; the employee needs protection, the employer needs curbing. If we want to bring out this distinction suppose we suggest to the honorable judges of the United States Supreme Court to try this experiment: Let them have an employer advertise to-day, "I want 100 men for my factory," and you will see thousands will appear clamoring for the job and will take it on any condition dictated by the employer. But let a working citizen of equal rights with the employer, a sovereign worker, insert an ad of this kind, "I am ready to take a job; any employer who may want a good efficient workman may call at my house to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock," and let them see how many employers will stand at his door clamoring for his services. There is no analogy between the two at all. The position of the employer is different. from that of the employee; the employee needs protection, and he can only have it by joint organization and action by a majority of the men in his trade. The decision is based upon a fundamental misconception of existing social relations and should be changed by proper constitutional amendment.

I strongly recommend a law prohibiting the State militia from interfering in labor disputes. It is not created for that purpose and should be kept out. Experience has shown whenever it interfered in labor disputes it has always been on the side of the employer, and for good reasons.

I should also advocate the prohibition of the right of employers to hire the so-called private guards. That has become an increasing abuse in industrial conflicts in the United States. Private guards, as a rule, are professional thugs and cutthroats, supplied by certain agencies existing for that purpose.

In every one of the industrial disputes which we have had the outrageous massacres of workers have been committed by such irresponsible criminals and ex-criminals who parade in the guise of private guards. I think a law should be framed prohibiting the interstate transportation of such thugs and the State laws prohibiting their use in the different States.

I believe that the use of the injunction and contempt proceedings in labor disputes should be discontinued; and I believe there is another great abuse going on now as applied to industrial conditions which has so far escaped public notice. I refer to what is known under our penal law as "disorderly conduct," designed for an entirely different purpose originally, and vesting in a petty magistrate absolutely discretionary powers to fine a defendant and sentence him to jail up to a period of six months, with practically no charges being made against him and no offense being committed, and there is no appeal or redress. The law in this State and in many other States, I understand, is that disorderly conduct is such as in the opinion of the magistrate may tend to a breach of the peace. It is in the discretion of the magistrate as to what may tend to a breach of the peace. Any conduct of any kind may, in the opinion of the magistrate, tend to a breach of the peace. The practical application has been that in the case of strikers in this city, for instance, hundreds of workers—men and women—have been haled before a magistrate, and many have been sent to the penitentiary for periods of six months for no greater offense than trying to persuade strike breakers to desist from working. And there is absolutely no appeal from it, the opinion of the magistrate being supreme. He is empowered to construe the law, as the acts which constitute disorderly conduct are not defined by the legislature, and the magistrate does very often apply it to striking workers. I propose a very careful definition of disorderly conduct, such definition as applies to any other statutory crime.

I think also what is cryingly needed at this time is a proper and thorough-going system of insurance of unemployed workers. Unemployment is becoming a more and more serious evil in modern industrial conditions. It is the corporate management—the large-scale production to-day that is largely responsible for it. The burden of maintaining such a system should, therefore, be properly placed upon these industries. They created it and they should relieve it.

And, also, I should advocate other measures, such as the trade-unions of this country have been working for, such, for instance, as a proper compensation act in every State, the establishment of a legal maximum working day and of minimum wage, and, finally, the public ownership, to begin with, of mines, the railroads, and gradually extending to all monopolies, trustified, large-scale industries.

If anything has been shown in this investigation from the testimony of Mr. Rockefeller particularly it has been this, that there is not an objection made against public or Government ownership of mines which can not be hurled back with tenfold more force against private management as now conducted. If a public official charged with the administration of a mining industry should exhibit as much ignorance and indifference to that industry as Mr. Rockefeller has shown, he would not hold his job for two days.

We speak of possible corruption and possible inefficiency of Government managers of such industries. The corruption that has been revealed on the part of the responsible officials of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the ignorance and incompetence and indifference of its directors, and the responsibility of managers have been such that not in the blackest history of political corruption or incompetence could it be paralleled. It seems to me that his testimony establishes conclusively the fact that modern capitalists have ceased to have any claim to control of the natural industries of this country on which the life of the people depends, and that for this reason the Government as such, the public as such, should step in and take over the management and operation. This finishes my answer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For your information, Mr. Hillquit, I want to explain that this commission adjourns at 12.30. Some of the members of the commission will be unable to be here this afternoon, and they are all very desirous of hearing your answers to these questions that will be put. Under the circumstances, therefore, I must ask you to be good enough in answering whatever questions are put to you to brief them as much as possible so we may keep within our time limits.

It is not my purpose to enter into a discussion on socialism, and yet the question of socialism touches upon the problem that this commission is dealing with, and I would therefore ask you, in the first place, are you a Socialist?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I am.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Secondly, I want to make sure that I understand socialism as you understand it. My conception of socialism is that it advocates the cooperative commonwealth; that it advocates that there shall be but one employer and that employer shall be all the people, and that all the people shall own all the machinery for production and distribution. Have I the correct conception of what socialism stands for?

Mr. HILLQUIT. You do not have, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you please describe it briefly?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I shall be pleased to do so. Socialism does stand for the democratic ownership of the instruments and resources of industry. But it does not stand for the ownership by all the people of all the industries. In other words, it does not stand for national ownership of all industry. It is opposed to private industries and private exploitation; it stands for the management of industry through the Nation or State or municipality or cooperative groups of any kind as to the various industries according to the extent and character of the industry.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I think, Mr. Hillquit, you represent a somewhat different school of Socialists from those Socialists whose doctrines I have been reading and studying. My conception was that socialism stood for the public ownership of all the machinery of production and of distribution, and I take it you are not in harmony with that particular school of socialism.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Pardon me, Mr. Weinstock. You have now given me a different definition. What you now say is public ownership of all industries or of the instruments of production.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of all the instruments for production and distribution.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Yes; and what you said before was the one employer—the national ownership—all the people owning all the industries. Now, these are two entirely different things.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. Let us be sure then that we understand this point alike—that socialism stands for the public ownership—common ownership—of all machinery of production and distribution. Have I got it right now?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Public ownership is right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; all right. I take it further that the Socialist believes that the real solution of the problems that this commission is dealing with—that the real remedy lies in socialism?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Eventually; yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That that would remove all the causes for industrial unrest?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Well, eventually.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that if we were to say to the Socialists of this country, "What is your remedy for industrial unrest?" the answer substantially would be socialism?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And I take it further, Mr. Hillquit, that you, as a Socialist living under capitalism and not desiring to become a burden upon society, and not desiring that your dependents shall become a burden upon society, are exercising your thrift and industry and talents to accumulate whatever competence you can?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Whatever I can, is right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Exactly; now, if you, by virtue of your talents, your character, and your ability, should be able to accumulate a great competency and should see fit to set aside that competence either in the nature of a gift or a legacy, specifying that it shall be used for the propaganda of socialistic doctrine, do you feel that you could be justly criticized for doing that?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I could not; under the circumstances outlined by you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You could not?

Mr. HILLQUIT. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would feel that you were thoroughly warranted in using your competency for the purpose of the propaganda of socialistic doctrines, believing, as you would, that that would be in the best interests of humanity?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Assuming that the amount that I had so set apart was not so overweighing as some of the amounts we have mentioned here. Assuming that I had accumulated it, as you say, by my own thrift and industry, I should say there was nothing objectionable in it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, supposing you should fall heir to a very large sum of money, and you saw fit to take that money and use it for socialistic propaganda, do you believe that you would deserve unfavorable criticism for it?

Mr. HILLQUIT. If I were to fall heir to a fortune of, say, $100,000,000 and should place it entirely at the disposal and disposition of the Socialist Party or the Socialist movement for propaganda purposes, I think that the stability of the present order would be seriously threatened by it—for good, from my point of view.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; well, would you think you would be justly entitled to unfavorable criticism for doing that?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I think any man who would attempt to exercise control over a sum of money amounting to $100,000,000, no matter in what way, will be justly subject to criticism. I think, in other words, Mr. Weinstock, that the mere power of any man to dispose of a fortune like $100,000,000 for any purpose which he thinks best, shows an abnormal social condition which should be curbed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, living as we do under the capitalistic state, Mr. Hillquit, if you should wake up to-morrow and learn that you had fallen heir to $100,000,000, what would you do?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Well, I should say, "I don't believe it," first. I should say this, Mr. Weinstock, your question is entirely hypothetical, because, as a matter of fact, $100,000,000 do not usually come by unexpected gift from inheritance, but are usually accumulated by the present industrial practices, and that makes all the difference in the world. But, assuming that I allow the flight of my imagination to have free play and imagine I wake up with a fortune of $100,000,000, I should say, as I am at present inclined, I should refuse to administer it, considering that no individual would have the right to exercise such public functions as are inherent in a fortune of this kind.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, if it was yours, thrown into your lap, what would you do with it?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Throw it back to the State or Government for the use of the people from whom it has been wrung. It does not grow on trees.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would then present it to the Government?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. With or without any restrictions?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I would; if I were to have it to-day, present it to the Government for the use of such general public enterprises as I should think would go for the welfare of the community, and particularly of the working class.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, would you simply hand the $100,000,000 over to the Government without saying anything, or hand it over and say, "I recommend" or say, "I desire it should be used in this and this and this fashion"?

Mr. HILLQUIT. If I should follow my inclinations formed at this moment, and this is entirely an unexpected situation, I should hand it over without restriction. I should not consider myself entitled to place any restriction or to make any directions for the handling of such a vast sum of money, which I would consider social wealth and social power.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, the reason why you would do that would be purely because of the large amount involved. You said a little while ago that if you should acquire a competence and should decide to use that competence for the purpose of socialistic propaganda, you would feel you would not be deserving of unfavorable criticism. Now, where would you draw the line? At what point in the volume of the fortune.

Mr. HILLQUIT. It would always be difficult, Mr. Weinstock, to fix upon a definite figure. I should say that I should consider a sum like several thousand dollars or tens of thousands of dollars possibly representing the actual earnings of an individual under modern conditions—but that I should consider a sum such as $100,000,000 as quite impossible to be produced by personal efforts or merits.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, are we to understand then, Mr. Hillquit, that your limit for setting aside of funds for propaganda purposes would be $100,000?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I should say that I would not consider that any individual to-day could earn more than $100,000 by his personal efforts and by his contribution to the general industrial welfare of the community.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So that $100,000 would be the limit that you would set aside for propaganda purposes; is that correct?

Mr. HILLQUIT. We are discussing here altogether abstractions, of course.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. HILLQUIT. I should say that I should not feel that I had earned more than $100,000; I should not feel that I had earned that much, if I had it. If I had more, I should feel that I have abstracted that from somebody else without being morally entitled to it. What I should do if I should, nevertheless, find myself in possession of such an amount, why, whatever I should say to you would be in the nature of an unpremeditated guess.

The chances are, if I had $100,000 I could spare—if I had more, I should devote that sum to the propaganda of socialism, quite likely. The chances are, I might devote part of it to other purposes that I might consider proper. The chances also are if that fortune should mount into such figures as to cease to be, in my view, purely a private fortune, I should refuse to handle it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The inference, then, from your statement is this: As you pointed out in answer to the questions, you would regard great accumulations of wealth as a menace to the welfare of society?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And if you had all the rich men of this Nation before you at this moment and you were asked to talk to them and give your views, I take it your speech would contain something like this: My advice to you in the interest of commonwealth of society is that you set aside sums approximating $100,000 for the propaganda of any views that you may have, and that all of the rest of your wealth you would give to the Government to be used as the Government may see fit.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Your conception is entirely wrong.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I will be glad to have you right it.

Mr. HILLQUIT. I should not risk to make any such statement or give any such advice to a group of the wealthy men of this country. I should rather address myself to the poor man, to the workers of this country, and I should say to them: The swollen fortunes are taken from your earnings, and I therefore consider it your duty and your business to take over the industrial as well as the political government of the country and make the system which creates such swollen fortunes impossible, leaving the present fortunes, if you please, in the hands of the present owners. I would not care for that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And if the wealthy men to which you were talking should ask you how to deal with that wealth, what advice would you give them?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I should say, "Gentlemen, you are powerless to deal with your fortunes in any equitable proper way, or to deal with them at all." I should say, "You are the victims of the system which has created you abnormally and morbidly wealthy, just as the workers are victims of the same system that has made them poor and suffering."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you would have no advice to give them as to how they should use their wealth?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I should not care to give any advice. I do not think that is the crux of the situation. I do not think the manner in which they use their wealth will make much of a change as far as social evolution is concerned. I think it is a question how the workers will use their power and intelligence, and not how the capitalists will use their wealth.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It seems to me that that is a very pertinent question, for this reason: We are investigating into these foundations, and we want to determine whether they are good things or bad things.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And we invite your opinion.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Very well.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On that point, to tell us whether, in your judgment, they are good things or bad things. The tendency or the trend of your opinion, as I gathered it from your statement, is that you do not regard them as good things.

Mr. HILLQUIT. I regard them as bad, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As bad things. Very well. Now, if they be bad things they ought to be discarded?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Sure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And, if possible, they ought to be prevented?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well. Now, then, what answer shall we make to the criticism that came to my ears this week from a woman, who said: "This is a very strange situation. We find fault with men because they made great wealth, and now we are finding fault with them because they are giving it away for the common good?"

Mr. HILLQUIT. Quite right, Mr. Weinstock. The answer to that would be the fault is exactly the same—the creation of such tremendous wealth is a social wrong, and the application of such wealth for any purpose is tainted with that social wrong and must carry the germ with it.

But to answer your question. Your commission is investigating the desirability or undesirability of such foundations. I take the point of view that they are highly undesirable, but that does not mean I propose to take Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., aside and say, "Look here, what you are going to do is wrong," because I know no matter what he will do with his billion dollars will be wrong and must be wrong of necessity. But my advice through the commission to the people of the United States is not to permit conditions which will allow a billion dollars to accumulate in the hands of one man and then make him the master of our economic destinies and our natural and political development. So my advice is not addressed to Mr. John D. Rockefeller; my advice is addressed to the people.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You offered as one of the reasons why, in your judgment, foundations such as the Rockefeller Foundation is not good, but is bad, is because it can influence the thought of the creators of public influence?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that it can influence the opinions of professors in colleges, for example, and so on. And that your remedy would be to have all educational institutions under Government control; that is, that all schools of learning shall be Government schools of learning and not private schools of learning. Do I get that correctly?

Mr. HILLQUIT. That is correct.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, would you go so far, Mr. Hillquit, as to prohibit private educational institutions?

Mr. HILLQUIT. I should not prohibit private educational institutions for certain specific purposes or subjects which the Government as such does not take care of. I would prohibit any private institution for general education. By that I mean general preliminary education and technical and professional education.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That you would confine to the Government?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Exactly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your belief is that under those circumstances the teachers in these schools of learning would be free and independent and could express their opinions, whatever their opinions might be, as long as they were honest opinions?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Always assuming that at the same time our Government will develop sufficient democracy and freedom in every respect.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, is it not a fact, Mr. Hillquit, that there have been innumerable occasions where in Government schools of learning, in our State universities, professors have been retired because of their opinions?

Mr. HILLQUIT. That is undoubtedly the fact, Mr. Weinstock, and it is a fact that is accounted for by the further fact that such State institutions have been very largely controlled and influenced by a dominating political party, in turn influenced by great economic interests.

Now, our program, Mr. Weinstock, is not confined to schools alone. But what we have in view is to increase the powers and functions of the Government while at the same time making the Government more democratic and placing it in the hands of the people, so as to make such sinister influences impossible.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If it is admitted that public teachers and public educators have lost their positions in its educational institutes because of their opinions; if that is admitted, which I am sure can not be denied, then the proposed remedy under existing conditions is no remedy.

Mr. HILLQUIT. It is. Even while under existing conditions such cases may occur, they would, on the whole, be more bearable and more wholesome than would the private influence of such teachers in universities, and for this reason: That any fault in administration in politics can and will eventually be corrected by the public at large. You take the State university; if a teacher should be dismissed for the expression of some views, he has the public to appeal to, he has the voters to appeal to, and he has a campaign in which to fight it out.

Take the case of an individual professor dismissed for similar views by privately endowed institutions; he has no remedy of any kind. Faults of democracy can be cured.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of course, you are quite aware, Mr. Hillquit, that when a professor in a university is dismissed, in the State university, on account of his opinions that that is not the reason that is given.

Mr. HILLQUIT. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He is dismissed for other reasons.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Quite right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Ostensibly, but really for his opinions?

Mr. HILLQUIT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So that he has no redress.

Mr. HILLQUIT. Now, pardon me. While the other opinions are stated by the authorities of the university, there is nothing to prevent the displaced or dismissed professor from telling the actual facts and from explaining them as loud as he can and making the people of the State see it and forcing redress, but there is no such avenue in privately endowed institutions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, but that would simply tend to confuse the public mind, because the other side would deny his charge.

Mr. HILLQUIT. The question there would then be between truth and falsehood, but we never should despair of truth because somebody opposes falsehood to it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you. You will be excused.

We will now stand adjourned until 2 o'clock.

(At 12.30 p. m. Friday, February 5, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock in the afternoon at the same place.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Will the house please be in perfect order?

Mr. Carnegie, will you please take the stand?

TESTIMONY OF MR. ANDREW CARNEGIE.

Chairman WALSH. Take that chair, please.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Thank you.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Andrew Carnegie.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Carnegie?

Mr. CARNEGIE. No. 2 East Ninety-first Street, New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. CARNEGIE. My business is to do as much good in the world as I can. I have retired from other business.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly take your seat?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Carnegie, you have been asked to appear before this commission to discuss two particular questions; that is to say, the responsibility of industries and directors for labor conditions in the corporations in which they are interested, and, secondly, the question of the relation of the great foundations to industry, education, and the public interests generally. I understand that you have prepared some statement, and the commission is inclined to allow you to go into these matters in your own way.

Mr. CARNEGIE. I do not know how to thank you, Mr. Chairman. That is what I would like to do, and I have prepared a statement so that I would not delay you.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. CARNEGIE. I have followed the examination of the other gentlemen who have appeared before you. Now, may I begin?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and if you desire to stand, you may deliver it that way.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Well, I like to stand. I am not much of an orator, but I like to be able to stand.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the commission, I have read with deep interest the testimony given before you by many millionaires, Messrs. Schiff, Belmont, Guggenheim, Perkins, Gary, and notably Miss Tarbell, who, though not a millionaire, certainly deserves to be. She seems to have a firm grasp upon the problem and proves herself one who has studied the question and rightly appreciates the great progress made during her time.

I agree with her statement, "Sane publicity is the cure for most evils in American industrial life." Last but not least, the testimony of that unaccountable being, Henry Ford, who declares that he could make every convict in Sing Sing a competent, trustworthy laborer in the vineyard.

I am not disposed to question anything that this prodigy asserts. Success to him! By all means let us give him a trial. His success here would be no more of a seeming miracle than his success has been with the Ford car.

I never bought or sold shares on the exchange; all my earnings came from manufacturing. If it were necessary for me to return to that calling I should not consider the problem of labor as at all difficult. On the contrary, I enjoyed conferences with our men. We had one rule, come what may—we would never think of running our works with new men after trouble with them. Able, sober, well-behaved workmen, such as ours were, are not to be picked up on the street, Mr. Chairman, and we wished no others. We were very particular in regard to drinking; I am a total abstainer myself. A first offense, men were excluded 30 days; second offense, 60 days; third offense, we parted company.

We have only had one serious disaster with labor, but that was sad, indeed. I was coaching through the Scottish highlands on my holiday and did not hear of the lamentable riot at Homestead until days after it occurred.

I wired at once that I would take the first steamer home, but was requested not to come. My chief partner, Mr. Phipps, in a letter published in the New York Herald, January 30, 1904, explains it as follows:

"Q. It was stated that Mr. Carnegie acted in a cowardly manner in not returning to America from Scotland and being present when the strike was in progress at Homestead.

"Answer by Mr. Phipps, which was published. When Mr. Carnegie heard of the trouble at Homestead he immediately wired that he would take the first ship for America, but his partners begged him not to appear, as they were of the opinion that the welfare of the company required that he should not be present at the time."

Now, mark this:

"They all knew his extreme disposition to always grant the demands of labor, however unreasonable. I have never known of any one interested in the business to make any complaint about Mr. Carnegie's absence at that time, but all partners rejoiced that they were permitted to manage the affairs in their own way."

Some of the men at the works cabled me. "Kind master, tell us what you want us to do and we will do it for you." It was too late.

I supposed, from Mr. Phipps's cable, that all was settled and decided it best to conform to my partners' wishes. My partners made a most generous offer to the workmen. The new Homestead rolling mill increased its product 60 per cent over the old. We had spent millions in this new work, which are the greatest works, I think, to-day. There are none like them, and visitors come from all over the land to see them. The rollers were offered 30 per cent advance in wages, one-half of the total gain. We took the other half from the millions that we had spent. I would not have done more. The error was in trying to start with new men against our rules. But here, again, I understand, the governor of the State, with troops at Pittsburgh, determined to vindicate the law. With this exception, we never had one grave disaster.

One or two partners out of our 40, as Mr. Phipps states, sometimes considered me foolish "in always yielding to labor," while I am satisfied that for every dollar so spent we had, indirectly, ample, and more than ample, reward.

One of the committee asked one of the workmen: "What are you making per day?" And the roller said, "$12." And the Congressman said, "Per week?" "No, sir; $12 per day." And that was quite true.

The workmen that we had—sober, well-behaving men as they were and are to-day—are the most profitable of all; and many of them rose to permanent high salaries and not a few to partnerships, of which we have not less than forty-odd, who are organized to-day as the Carnegie Veterans and dine once a year in our home. They come from all parts of the land.

You might like to hear the following incident connected with that Homestead strike: The governor of Pennsylvania, I understand, wished certain of our workers arrested for riot and bound over for trial. Consequently, some of these disappeared, among them the burgess of Homestead. Some time afterwards my friend, Prof. van Dyke, of Rutgers College, was ordered to California for his health. Upon his return he told me that he had met the ex-burgess working as a laborer in a Mexican mine at Sonora. I asked him to offer McLuckie any help he needed, and upon his return to the West he did so. Meanwhile, McLuckie had got a position with the Sonora Railway driving wells and was succeeding admirably and making high wages. The professor said, "You don't know whose money I was told to help you with." He said that he had no idea. "Well, it was Mr. Carnegie's." Then came the slow, earnest response: "That was damned white of Andy"—words that I treasure.

When I heard this I suggested to my friend Van Dyke that it wouldn't be a bad epitaph to grace one's tombstone. If it ever did, I hoped there would be no long blanks between the two d's. Each letter must be put down to give McLuckie's proper expression.

When I talked to the Homestead rollers upon my return I told them my partners had offered liberal terms, and I could not have offered more. One roller said, "Ach, Mr. Carnegie, it wasn't a question of dollars; the boys would have let you kick them, and they wouldn't let another man strike their hair."

May I trouble you with one example of the workings of our system—another feature entirely? Upon these old things, Mr. Chairman, my memory dwells with great satisfaction. Upon one of my visits to Pittsburgh I met the men who wished a conference. They asked that payments be made every two weeks instead of monthly, as the Pennsylvania Railroad employees were then paid. We followed their example. One named Johnny Edwards, a clever workman and fine fellow, rose to state their case. He said that if they were paid semimonthly, it would be equal to a raise in their wages. He and his wife visited Pittsburgh the last Saturday of each month and bought a full month's food supply, thereby saving one-third on shop prices near the works. "Why don't other workmen do the same?" I asked. He replied: "Few of your men can afford to buy a month's food in advance. My wife and I can."

Here was an opening. I decided it will be semimonthly payments thereafter, and so it was.

Then Edwards said: "There is another unfair charge; the coal dealers here charge almost double for coal in small quantities." "Indeed," I said, "hereafter our workmen get their coal at the exact wholesale cost to us; not 1 cent of profit." "And," said Edwards, "we don't want to be too troublesome, but everything we buy here is far dearer than in Pittsburgh." "Well," I replied, "why not start a shop of your own? Rent one on Main Street, and we shall pay the rent; organize and run it, and charge our workmen just enough to pay your way." And this was done, but from one point of view I regret to say that the shop did not prove successful; but nevertheless we had a victory. The retailers reduced prices.

You have here an illustration of the difficulties workmen are often compelled to bear. There was another feature. We offered our men 6 per cent upon all the savings left with us, payable on demand. And here let me congratulate Judge Gary and his board on the greatest step yet taken between capital and labor. When workmen were made shareholders they were sold shares in the company upon a very liberal basis and guarded against loss. I consider this the greatest of all steps forward yet taken for making workmen and capitalists fellow workmen indeed, pulling and owning the same boat. This can not fail to prove highly profitable to both. Far beyond the pecuniary advantage I esteem the fellow partnership which makes to-day Judge Gary, Mr. Farrell, Mr.

Dinkey, and other high officials real fellow partners with their workmen. No greater triumph has labor ever won, nor one that will tell so much for them in the future.

All this reveals steady progress upward and onward to the benefit of both labor and capital, which will some day rank as one, notwithstanding the hesitation to cooperate shown by some labor champions—not many—who are still extremists and do capitalists injustice; but this must steadily fade away. As I told the great audience at Homestead upon my first visit after the strike, we shall one day all recognize capital, labor, and business ability as a three-legged stool, each necessary for the other, neither first, second, nor third in rank; but all equal. That is to be the solution of capital and labor.

Let me summing up, Mr. Chairman, may seem one-sided, I will give a proof of my efforts to hold the scales equal between capital and labor. Only once have I had experience of a determined effort to commit wrong upon the part of labor. In all my experience this was the only case that I ever had to meet labor which proposed to dishonor itself. It is true that the men at the Edgar Thompson blast furnaces sent in a written demand for an immediate advance of wages, which, if refused, would end in the furnaces being left unfilled. That meant stoppage. Upon receiving a telegram to this effect I took a night train from New York and got off at the works next morning. I found a long train of our empty box cars ready to house new workmen if necessary. I directed these to be pulled out of the yard and sent away, stating there would be no strike here, and notifying the leaders of each of the three different divisions of labor in those works to appear as soon as practicable, that I might consult with them. The leader of each department, with one or two aides, arrived. We assembled in the committee room. I addressed the chairman of the committee of the converting works first. This was not the one that had done wrong. This was one we had heard nothing from.

"Mr. Chairman, have we an agreement with you?" The answer came, "You have, and you haven't enough money to make us break it." "There speaks the true American workman," I exclaimed. The very words that I can never forget. "There speaks the true American workman."

Addressing the rolling mill chairman, I asked the same question, and the reply was to the same effect. I then addressed Mr. Kelly, the chairman of the furnace committee, who had presented this demand: "Mr. Kelly, have you an agreement with our company?" He said that an agreement was presented, and he had signed it and had supposed it was all right. Just then the irrepressible Capt. Jones broke in: "Mr. Kelly, you know I read all of it to you." "Silence, Capt. Jones. Mr. Kelly can speak for himself. I received many communications and documents which I haven't time to read. If they were of a formal nature, I have sometimes signed documents without giving them careful attention; but, Mr. Kelly, I have always stood prepared to take the consequences, and I never broke contracts. Now, Mr. Kelly, you have signed that treaty, and you can break it, but the grass will grow over these works before we will have such men in our employ. It will be heralded throughout the world as the deepest disgrace thrown on labor. You wished your answer at 4 o'clock. It is now a little after 3; but the answer is ready—go." And they went.

A little later some one who was coming in as they were passing out, and who had got in the crowd, said a fine-looking fellow had pushed across the hall and said to Kelly: "Kelly, you might as well understand now, there is to be no damned monkeying around these works." Some of the men being curious to know what would be the result had gathered at the blast furnaces. To their inquiries Kelly replied, "Get to work you spalpeens; by golly the little boss just hit from the shoulder" and he did.

There was no strike. And that is the best service I ever rendered labor, so that, although I was inclined to yield to labor, I drew the line at contract breaking. This was the first time I had found labor, and that was only one portion of them, ready to break a contract, and it was the last.

We once proposed making a change in the distribution—not in the amount—of wages among the different departments of the steel-rail mills, as new machinery was introduced. It was not fairly divided and we knew that; new machinery had made new conditions. The conferences were held in Pittsburgh. After several days' consideration I had to leave for New York on the night train. The men in the mills asked by telegraph if I could meet with them in our office in the afternoon. I answered, "Yes." They came to the city and were seated in the board room. Mr. Edwards, who was again spokesman, here rose and began: "Mr. Carnegie, we agree that there is a sufficient sum proposed for our total work, but we think it is not wisely divided. Now, Mr. Carnegie, you take my job." "Order, Billy Edwards, order; Mr. Carnegie takes no man's job." Suppression was impossible, out came roars of laughter, and foot stamping, and the victory was won. We shook hands and I was off on the night train. Money is not the foremost or sole object of the better class of workmen. That play upon words with Billy Edwards did the business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we began manufacturing with a capital of $7,500; that was a big sum then. My share I borrowed from a bank in Pittsburgh. When superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad I had seen a wooden bridge burn, blocking traffic for eight days, and I believed in iron bridges; the day of steel had not yet arrived. From this small beginning grew the Edward Thompson Steel Works, Homestead Works, Duquesne, the blast furnaces and locomotive works at Allegheny, our gas wells in West Virginia, and the great ore fields we bought from Mr. Rockefeller.

It is 14 years since I retired from business, in pursuance of my decision to cease accumulation and begin distribution of my surplus wealth, in which I am still engaged.

In 1888 I published an article in the North American Review, which was afterwards christened "The gospel of wealth," by Mr. Gladstone. He had read it in England, and he commented upon it in the Nineteenth Century. It attracted attention and many answers were sent to this magazine. I quote you the following extract from "The gospel of wealth," because here is my gospel that I have accepted and labored in for 15 years since I left business. This is called "The problem of rich and poor":

"Thus is the problem of rich and poor to be solved. The laws of accumulation will be less free; the laws of distribution free. Individualism will continue, but the millionaire will be but a trustee for the poor; intrusted for a season with the great part of the increased wealth of the community, but administering it for the community far better than it could or would have done for itself. The best minds will thus have reached a stage in the development of the race in which it is clearly seen that there is no mode of disposing of surplus wealth creditable to thoughtful and earnest men into whose hands it flows save by using it year after year for the general good. This day already dawns. Men die without incurring the pity of their fellows, still sharers in great business enterprises from which their capital can not be or has not been withdrawn, and which is left chiefly at death for public uses, yet the day is not far distant when the man who dies, leaving behind him millions of available wealth, which were free for him to administer during life, will pass away 'unwept, unhonored, and unsung,' no matter to what use he leaves the dross which he can not take with him. Of such as these the public verdict will then be, 'the man who dies thus rich dies disgraced.'

"Such in my opinion is the true gospel concerning wealth, obedience to which is destined some day to solve the problem of the rich and the poor, and to bring 'peace on earth, among men good will.'"

In accordance with this doctrine my first act upon retiring from business was to give $5,000,000 to the workmen of the Carnegie Steel Co. as a parting gift—$4,000,000 for pensions to the men and $1,000,000 to maintain the libraries and halls I had built for them. I say "I." My partners did not contribute to these gifts. My partners were poor and were in no condition to distribute surplus wealth and were therefore not asked to do so.

I was greatly pleased when, later, the United States Steel Corporation saw fit to join with me in this and duplicate my gift, adding $4,000,000 more to the fund for pensions. I have just read the following report of this joint fund with great satisfaction:

"The fourth annual report of the United States Steel and Carnegie pension fund, made public to-day, shows that since January 1, 1911"—that is when I started it—"when the fund was established, the retired employees of the Steel Corporation have received in pensions $1,575,021.33. For the year 1914 the total disbursement from the pension fund amounted to $511,967.90, which was a gain over the previous year of $89,152.76, and a gain over the previous year of $89,152.76, and a gain of $230,510.53 over the first year of the fund's existence.

"The Pittsburgh district leads in the amount of money paid out to the aged and infirm, former employees of the various subsidiary companies. To retired mill operatives in the Pittsburgh and valley districts the sum of $222,656.33 was paid during the year, and to this may be added the sum paid to the coke workers in the fields adjacent to Pittsburgh, which amounted to $59,995.66, making the total for mills and mines in the district, $283,651.99.

"Pensioners in Cleveland and its vicinity received approximately $50,000. In the Chicago district the amount distributed to former mill workers was $30,157.86. In New England retired employees of the Worcester, Mass., plants received $39,855.56.

"There are now 2,521 beneficiaries of the fund. During the year 612 pensioners were added and 183 died. The average pensions of the cases added were $20.40 a month, the average age of the pensioners being 63.33 years, and the average term of the service 28.76 years. Under the rules of the fund not less than $12 nor more than $100 per month is paid."

The hero fund which I was privileged to found has always interested me most deeply, perhaps because the idea came to me through personal experience. Mr. Taylor, who was formerly superintendent of a coal mine near Pittsburgh, heard that an accident had occurred and immediately drove to the mine, called for volunteers to descend to the rescue of those below. A number promptly responded and many were saved, but Mr. Taylor, the volunteer hero, lost his life. Here was the true hero of civilization, a man who saves and serves his fellows. The heroes of barbarism wound and slay theirs. That is the difference between barbarism and civilization. I could not rest until I had founded hero funds with a total capital of $11,790,000. That is the cost to date. The report of the annual meetings held at Pittsburgh on January 20 shows awards given to 40 heroes or their wives and families, with a total of 1,027 awards since the fund began operations. Every case is most carefully investigated. We do not want bogus heroes, but want absolute proof, and the mayors of the various towns and other officials have been anxious to help us. We require absolute certainty and proof given by witnesses.

The Carnegie Institute of Pittsburgh, one of the greatest gifts I have made, has not been mentioned. It has cost so far $24,000,000 and has over 3,000 students from 42 States, 1,288 of whom are men from the industries, the sons of our own workmen, trying to improve their conditions. The fees are only nominal, averaging $25 a year, which is one-fifth to one-tenth what is usually charged. The cheapest we know of elsewhere charges $150. The highest is $500. We charge $25. We had to make a nominal charge of some kind as we had over 4,000 young men pressing to get in when we opened that institute. I have sheets to show the salaries some of these young students have received; one has received, which is the highest, $6,000 a year, and several have received $5,000 and some $3,000 or $4,000; and let me tell you the women are not behind. Numbers of them are earning splendid wages, fifteen, sixteen, or seventeen hundred dollars a year. I think we have it in detail and will leave you copies.

The students of that institution attend classes, and they only can work a portion of the time, and they do anything they can. During the past year, and I think this will surprise you, the students of this institution have earned in their spare time a total of $291,589. Another feature would, I think, surprise you. We have a women's department, educating the young to become themselves educators of others. Each goes through a course of instruction, from dishwasher and sweeper to housekeeper, and finally playing the hostess for a term and receiving her guests. Mrs. Carnegie and I always have luncheon with them, and I assure you we have the reception and attention of the genuine lady. Such distinguished foreign visitors as Baron d'Estournelle de Constant have been there, and have not failed to express and publish their surprise and pleasure.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the commission, we invite you to attend our next annual meeting at the end of April. The President of the United States, when president of Princeton University, once made the opening address and has given a conditional promise to open the next exercises, should conditions permit. I beg you to come and insure you proper accommodation in Pittsburgh. We will show you everything as it is for the year around and let you judge for yourself.

Some were at first apprehensive that our work would not favor the technology schools, which teach young men advanced modes of workmanship. These fears, however, have proved groundless. The men are sending their sons to the institute and rejoicing that they are to be advanced and rendered capable of higher scientific service. This step in advance is indorsed by the unions, and let them be credited therefor. Another proof that labor is fast supplanting prejudice. I predict that many of these pupils are to rise to eminence and be a source of happiness and pride to their parents.

There is another department I had not supposed it would be necessary to mention, but consideration has led me to believe that it is much better to make no exception whatever. After retiring from business I soon found that the widows of friends who passed away were sorely troubled how best to secure the safety of funds left to them; I volunteered to accept the money of one widow, giving her my note for the amount and agreeing to pay 6 per cent a year. The relief she felt was so surprising that I continued doing this as other dear friends passed away, until the number of depositors has now reached 148 with a total of $3,137,394.20 in deposits. I do not know of any service to widows which brings such relief. It relieves the widow of doubt about the security of the fund upon which she is able to live in comfort. Of course, the deposits and security are regularly examined by a representative of the State department of banking. Six per cent is a higher rate than banks would pay, but I feel justified in being liberal from the great good it performs.

I confess to being greatly surprised to learn within the past few days that I have no less than 481 pensioners upon my list, receiving a total of $214,954.56 a year. These pensions are continued to the widows. This fund has also been kept secret hitherto, but your call for statement of all foundations seems to embrace this.

Shakespeare has tersely put the solution of wealth and poverty before us in these words: "So distribution should undo excess and each man have enough." The trend is in this direction in our day, but its fruition may mean centuries of progress, slow but sure, for all grows better; you may depend upon that, in this life.

The complete statement up to date—up to the close of last year, shows that the total of our foundations and gifts amount to $324,657,300. The work still goes bravely on, thanks to the wise management of the able and willing trustees, and also of the employees who often assure me that it is labor in which they delight. I am, indeed, a most fortunate man, and think myself in nothing else so happy as in a soul remembering my dear friends, to whom I owe so much.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we have six foundations, but I understand that three only of these have been called upon to answer questions. If at any time you wish to call the heads of the other foundations or ask further questions, they will be most happy to respond. We have nothing to conceal.

Thank you very much for the attention you have given me.

Chairman WALSH. Now, just a few questions, because the commission is not going to keep you very long.

We must have perfect order, please.

What do you say as to the responsibility of directors in industrial corporations for labor conditions in their plants?

Mr. CARNEGIE. What is that?

Chairman WALSH. What responsibility do directors have for labor conditions that exist in their industries?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Well, I would say they have responsibility, but nine times out of ten they do not have anything to do with the works, hence do not know of conditions there. They attend to the administration of the funds, and would depend a great deal upon what the president said. Suppose I went on one of the trusts, and the President of the United States—

Chairman WALSH. I am afraid I did not make my meaning clear. I am leaving the foundations now, and just have two or three questions to ask you. What do you believe to be the responsibility of a director in an industrial corporation?

Mr. CARNEGIE. An industrial corporation, not one of my corporations?

Chairman WALSH. Not in your corporation, in an industrial corporation; what is their responsibility for the labor conditions which exist in the plants of that corporation?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Well, I would say, from my experience, that a man could be a trustee in an industrial corporation—you mean if he is in the works?

Chairman WALSH. If he is a director in the corporation.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Oh, a director in the corporation?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Oh, if he is a director in the corporation he naturally would not hear of the trouble at the works and would not feel the responsibility; but if he is a director he would meet with the president and a number of directors in consultation. You mean directors in the works—

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CARNEGIE. And not a director in these foundations?

Chairman WALSH. No; not in what you are speaking of now. May I make it plainer to you? It seems to be observed that the directors in these large industrial companies—these concentrated industries, as they have been called—receive reports as to the financial conditions, inspections of machinery, comparison of production, sales, and such matters as that. In your opinion, should they also not receive as definite and frequent reports as to labor conditions?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I think that it would be well. I think that they would appreciate it, but I think if I were a director and I heard of no complaints, I would take it for granted that everything was right. It would be when notice was served that trouble had been created I should feel it my duty as a director to go down and consult with the others.

Chairman WALSH. But not until that time?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I do not know. I would be engaged in other affairs and it would not be likely I would know. Provided they are apprised of it, then I think the directors would be bound to give attention.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do you not believe, in view of the number of industrial disturbances—

Mr. CARNEGIE (interrupting). My friend, will you please put your question in another way? When you say "Do you not believe" that would imply that you would have me give acquiescence to your view, and I want to give my own. Be kind enough to say, "Do you," and ask me. [Laughter.]

Chairman WALSH. We must have perfect order, because I want to have a connected statement here.

Should a director so keep himself advised, in view of the disturbances, the recurring disturbances of labor in the large industries, as to the condition of labor, the wages paid, the hours of labor, the conditions surrounding the labor, so that he might have his voice in averting trouble?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I certainly believe that he should look into it, should give it attention, always remembering that he is apprised of the difficulty. As a director in an institution he would take it for granted, if everything is running well, the president and officers do not apprise him of trouble, he might go on perfectly innocent of there being any difficulty. But if he is apprised, then I think it would be his duty as a director to go and do the best he could to harmonize things.

Chairman WALSH. Should the director or the board of directors establish some system of reports by which they would be constantly apprised of conditions that might lead to industrial strife at any time?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I think it would be well. I think it would be a great improvement.

Chairman WALSH. That does not—or does that seem to be the custom among directors of corporations at the present time?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Well, it is so long since I was a director—you must remember I have been out of business for 15 years—although I have had a number of directorships in my time. I think that the duty there would devolve upon the president of the institution, and if there is trouble with labor the natural recourse would be to call the board together and consult. I go entirely with you there. But at the same time I could not blame a gentleman who was a director in one of these institutions that had not heard of anything. You must bring knowledge home to him.

Chairman WALSH. You say, Mr. Carnegie, knowledge must be brought home to the director. How would it be done?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Oh, I think through the president would be the natural course.

Chairman WALSH. If he did not do that, then what should the action of the board of directors be with reference to the president or other executives who fail to do that?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Well, gentlemen, I am not a director and I could not tell you unless I was one and knew all the circumstances. The man who has agreed to act as a director has taken some part of his time, and it is quite an obligation when he does it; but I think he would certainly expect to be apprised, if his counsel was wished, in any serious juncture.

Chairman WALSH. What do you say as to the desirability and right of workmen to form organizations of their own for what they believe to be their mutual protection and benefit?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Why, I should be delighted to hear from every such organization.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe in the principle of collective bargaining, or the so-called right of men to bargain collectively with their employers?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Why, yes; I had great times. I never objected; and the more I got on the committee the better.

Chairman WALSH. Your experience, then, has been, I take it, from your answer and from what you have read from your paper it has been a pleasant experience rather than otherwise?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I never enjoyed myself so much—I tell you I look back to the old days—that is the chief joy I have. I burst out laughing many a time when I think of McLuckie, or Billy Edwards catching him there, "You take my job." That was the cleverest thing I ever did. "Order, Mr. Edwards, order; Mr. Carnegie takes no man's job."

Chairman WALSH. You never felt, Mr. Carnegie, that you could not confer with any man representing an organization of workmen that came in a business-like and respectable manner to confer with you?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I was only too glad when the workmen came. I felt pretty sure that if they came to consult with me that we would part all right.

Chairman WALSH. And did you find that it was usually a means of establishing peace to so deal with your workmen?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Undoubtedly. I knew them by name, and I delighted—and you see behind my back they always call me Andy. I like that, and I would rather have it than "Andrew" or "Mr. Carnegie." There is no sympathy about that. But you have your men calling you "Andy" and you can get along with them. [Laughter.]

Chairman WALSH. I have had no difficulty in restraining the expression of the audience until you came.

Mr. CARNEGIE. [Laughter.] That is all right.

Chairman WALSH. We must observe order.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate you upon having such an audience and to see how many ladies are here. Do you know, one of the greatest triumphs in this age? It is the elevation of woman. [Laughter.]

Chairman WALSH. Ladies and gentlemen, if you will please keep quiet a few minutes I will ask Mr. Carnegie to repeat that sentence, as some of you may not have heard it. If you will keep quiet, I will ask him what it was.

What was it that you said, Mr. Carnegie?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I want to tell you something, that I never can forget. I was traveling in China—I went around the world and left the boys to do the work at home. But they cabled me very often. Sitting with the mandarins in China, we began to talk, and the question of course came upon the different views of the future and religion, and so forth, and one of the mandarins said to me, "Mr. Carnegie, the greatest work of your Christ is the elevation of women. They are not elevated in China, but that is Christ's great work. He has elevated women beyond any human being that ever lived."

And she is going on to-day. Just think of that young lady in our school that gets $2,340 a year.

Commissioner WALSH. Now, I just want to ask you a question or two, Mr. Carnegie, and then we will excuse you.

Mr. CARNEGIE. I am not in a hurry. I am enjoying this immensely.

Chairman WALSH. Have you considered the possibility, Mr. Carnegie, of the foundations establishing, those in which great endowments are made to educational institutions exercising undue influence upon the beneficiaries?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I can not imagine such a thing as that possible. From what point of view do you suggest it?

Chairman WALSH. I have no point of view. I am just asking you for your opinion, without holding any point of view.

Mr. CARNEGIE. I can not imagine any injury coming from that.

Chairman WALSH. President Eliot has said—whom of course you know.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Well, he is one of my pensioners. He ought to know.

Chairman WALSH. He says that the giving of these large sums of money does influence the directors, but the influence has always been for good.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Yes; I think it has.

Chairman WALSH. Do you agree with that proposition?

Mr. CARNEGIE. There are exceptions to all rules. There may be villains receiving pensions, but the ordinary educator, a man like President Eliot, who receives a pension in his old age, why I can not imagine anything that would give him greater relief, greater happiness. He was a member on the peace fund, but has resigned now.

Chairman WALSH. This refers more particularly, I would say, Mr. Carnegie, to the grants to institutions and not to any pensions to educators individually.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Oh, to institutions?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Now, the question again, please.

Chairman WALSH. I say, have you considered the possibility of the grant of large sums of money to educational institutions exercising an influence upon the institution or the teachers of the institution?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Why, yes; a great influence. I think it would lead to the greatest improvement. They will have funds that they can develop with. The great want in most educational institutions is the want of funds; and with more funds they would go on developing still further.

Chairman WALSH. In your practical experience in this line, Mr. Carnegie, the granting of money to educational institutions, have you found any persons or institutions which seemed to alter their avowed principles or previous methods of procedure in order to secure your other gifts?

Mr. CARNEGIE. No; I can not remember any such thing.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever observed any such change, for instance, in any institution to which your foundation gave money, in the teaching of vocational education and training or the teaching of political economy or in the discussion thereof by the professors?

Mr. CARNEGIE. No; I could not point out a case.

Chairman WALSH. You have never observed a case of that kind?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Never. Of course, with more money you get important books you would not otherwise get; you get better instructors, perhaps, in certain lines; and I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, one rule that I think you might use here, whenever a body of men bind themselves together to do anything mean, low, and disreputable or unjust—for instance, take New York here, just as an illustration. You know we have a bad reputation for getting up arrangements for depressing one stock and boosting another, and they go into engagements that way; and you can imagine a lot of irresponsible men and bad men may be joining together and saying, "Now, let us do this with that stock, or let us put it up to this." Now, the reason that it is so seldom successful is this: You can not get a body of men—such men as we are talking about—to organize and agree to do anything that would be injurious or to break the laws, or any of that sort, because the bad man will say to himself, "All these men are engaged with me in a nefarious operation just now, and would not like to expose it; but they are like myself. They may be taking care of themselves. Now, I will hedge on them." And it is a rule, if you follow it through life, that wherever men bind themselves to perform anything wrong and mean and disgraceful, or to gamble in stocks—which is about the most deleterious sort of gambling because it is so often done. Wherever they are joined that way two or three of them are pretty nearly sure to get ahead of the others that they suspect, and they hedge themselves. Most pools have been broken up by men who have got an advantage of their fellows. They are cheating each other. That is my observation in their case. But when you get a lot of able, good men, capable of making their fellows' condition better, elevating the world, and standing for all that is refined and pure and noble, you can always depend upon such men. And it would be as great a miracle that there should be a bad man in that line as that there be a Judas Iscariot among the Apostles.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention even been called to an apprehension on the part of individuals that these large foundations were a possible menace to American life and education in that they might influence—perhaps not immorally, but along the line of the interests of the managements thereof—education, publicity, and the like? If you have, I would like to hear what you have to say about it, Mr. Carnegie?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I never heard that suggested.

Chairman WALSH. You never heard that suggested?

Mr. CARNEGIE. No. I can not imagine—the character of men that you get together there—I have got a list of my trustees and I have asked my secretary to leave it with you. I won't trouble you with it, but in order that you could see the class of men that you would get to work for nothing and give their time and attention without reward, excepting the greatest reward of all, the judge within [pointing to his breast] telling them that they will become of greater use in the world.

Chairman WALSH. Is it or is it not true that many colleges have given up their denominational charters and removed all denominational connections in order to secure grants from you personally or from your foundation?

Mr. CARNEGIE. I do not—I think there was one or two at first did it, but I have not heard of any recently. I think I remember that that was a case, and I explained that I wanted all the universities to receive young men and young women, no matter to what sect they belonged. You may call them Methodists—there was a university had a case in Nashville, Tenn., lately where the ministers came in and declared that they had the ruling of the $2,000,000 I gave them, and the trustees took it up to the highest court, and they decided no—that my gift was right, and it was for a medical school. And I do certainly require that no matter what a young man thinks about the future life or any dogmas, I do not believe in my money shutting the door to that man and saying you shall not be educated as a physician because you do not believe this, that, or the other. I say that my money is for every young man and every young woman, and I do not care what he thinks or they think about the other world. My duties in this life are here in this life, and it is to benefit my fellow men in this world; and I tell you you can let the future world take care of itself if you obey the judge within.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe, Mr. Carnegie, that the State or Federal Government should exercise any supervisory control over the great foundations?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Why, I would be delighted to welcome them. I do not believe the United States Government or the State legislature would have any desire to do anything that would not be agreeable to me. I would restrict nothing of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that full publicity should be given to the activities of these foundations?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Well, I have heard of that story—it is one of Burdette's, the man who just died in the West, who was the publisher of the Burlington Hawkeye—who said, "The Rev. Mr. Taylor is to preach to-night, Sunday night, upon Why was Lazarus a beggar? We have never thought there was any doubt upon the question. The question was settled long ago. He did not advertise."

Now, I believe in advertising. I would like more men, more people, to get interested in my foundations. I am so sure they will be benefited that I would welcome them all, and I would not mind have more directors to-morrow.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent do you consider it desirable for the directors in one foundation to hold offices or places on the boards of trustees of other foundations?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Ah, yes. I will tell you that. There is every—you know I have so many trustees—I know a great many trustees. Now, every now and then in one of the boards there is an element, perhaps, wanting. If we had the right men here we could manage this better, with better results. Well, as I know so many, I am very apt to think that I know a man living in Iowa and a certain man in Mississippi and a certain man here who would do; and I have been glad to suggest that, as the man may need it, and the result is that we have several interlocking men. I know men are especially fitted—fitted for special duties. Some men have a knack of doing things that is really remarkable, and there they are. Now, we have several—a great many of these men—noted men; and I have several times, I think, said, "If we had him on this board he would be adding great force to it." And he has been elected. I don't think that interlocking directors in my institutions—I do not think it has proceeded any further than benefited the case.

Chairman WALSH. Your idea is that if you observe a good man in one place, who shows he is a good man, and has some special knowledge or special adaptability, you think it well to put him in others, so far as he was willing and able to serve?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Yes; provided that other institution had not got the man who could attend to that department.

Chairman WALSH. You see nothing wrong or undesirable in what might be called interlocking directorates in these foundations, essentially?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Never had the slightest indication of anything of that sort.

Chairman WALSH. Now, we are going to excuse you permanently, Mr. Carnegie, and thank you very much for what you have told us.

Mr. CARNEGIE. The thanks are reciprocated. I have not spent a more agreeable afternoon I can not tell you when. Do not forget to come to Pittsburgh, if you want to see something there worth while.

Chairman WALSH. We are going to hold a hearing in Pittsburgh.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Oh, I see; I am very glad. I thank you very much.

Chairman WALSH. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I am going to ask you now that you will all here cooperate with the commission from this time forward to preserve perfect order. Of course, we will forget the past. Mr. Carnegie unsettled the commission and the audience both. But we are going to try to get through with a number of important witnesses, and I must say once more, that if any audible expressions of feeling are given by laughter, such as we have had in this instance, why, we will have to adjourn. It is absolutely essential that the way this witness has been examined can not be tolerated again. So I hope now you will all cooperate with us and keep quiet.

Call Mr. Rockefeller.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, SR.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. John D. Rockefeller.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. My legal residence is 4 West Sixty-fourth Street, New York City.

Chairman WALSH. And I believe that you are a retired business man?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I am. I have been 30 or 35 years out of active business life.

Chairman WALSH. Have you also a home at Tarrytown, N. Y., Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, no; at Pocantico Hills, which is back of Tarrytown.

Chairman WALSH. You are the donor of the Rockefeller Foundation, I believe?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I am. Mr. Chairman, may I here read the questions, if you please?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; Mr. Rockefeller, if you please. We will be very glad to let you do so. I have a few questions to ask you, and I believe we submitted some to you, and we will be very glad to allow you, of course, to just do it your own way.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes; well, if you please, I will just read these questions and the answers.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. You may proceed now, if you will, please, Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Mr. Chairman, if I do not read loud enough, I can raise my voice, if desired.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. (reading):

"Information furnished by John D. Rockefeller in answer to questions submitted by the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, February 4, 1915.

"Question 1. The motive and principles which underlie the various foundations which you have established.

"Answer. The sole motive underlying the various foundations which I have established has been the desire to devote a portion of my fortune to the service of my fellow men. The principles have been fully set forth in the two chapters from my book 'Random Reminiscences,' which has already been made a part of the record of your commission.

"Question 2. Your purposes and plans with respect to the expenditure of the special $2,000,000 annual fund which is reserved for your personal use by the Rockefeller Foundation?

"Answer. The Rockefeller Foundation was a development into impersonal form of my own personal plans of giving, followed for many years. While I desired to have the directors of the foundation free to use the funds as they might see fit, in making my last gift I reserved the right to designate, during my lifetime, the specific objects to which $2,000,000 of the income should be given annually, my purpose being in this way to provide for the various philanthropies more or less personal to myself and related to the places of my residence, to which I have been a contributor in the past. Under the terms of the clause of my letter of gift reserving this right, it is stipulated that the objects must be within the corporate purposes of the foundation and my designations are subject to review by the board as to that feature.

"Question 3. Your views regarding safeguards which have been stated to be necessary to prevent such institutions as the foundation from becoming a menace to the public?

"Answer. I regard the right to amend or rescind the respective charters of the several foundations which inhere in the legislative bodies which granted them as an entirely sufficient guarantee against serious abuse of the funds. Furthermore, I have such confidence in democracy that I believe it can better be left to the people and their representatives to remedy the evils when there is some tangible reason for believing they are impending, rather than to restrict the power for service in anticipation of purely hypothetical dangers.

"Question 4. The conference at Tarrytown with regard to the affairs of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., at which were present Mr. Welborn, Mr. King, yourself and others.

"Answer. The meeting at Tarrytown therein referred to was purely social in character. Messrs. Welborn and King were spending the night with my son. He asked me to meet these gentlemen at dinner. I never had had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Welborn before. No conference took place. Such mention as was made of business matters was of a purely informal and unpremeditated nature, taking place as I sat at dinner beside Mr. Welborn.

"Question 5. Your opinions regarding the responsibility of investors and directors for the labor conditions existing in the corporations in which they are interested.

"Answer. I think that the stockholders are responsible for the choice of the best men as directors. The directors are ultimately responsible for the general conduct of the business, and in discharging that responsibility it is their duty to select the best men to actually administer it. These administrative officers must have discretion and power commensurate with their responsibility. A large stockholder would ordinarily have more influence with a board of directors than a smaller one, and consequently would have a greater responsibility for the selection of directors who would see to it that the administrative officers maintained proper working conditions for their employees."

Chairman WALSH. I have a few questions I would like to put to you, Mr. Rockefeller.

We must have perfect order, ladies and gentlemen, please.

When you established your various foundations, Mr. Rockefeller, did it occur to you that they might under any conditions become a menace to the public, either through mismanagement or by exercising a great influence upon the public mind in any direction?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. No; I can not say that I had any fears on that question.

Chairman WALSH. And from your experience, so far as you have advanced, have you found any such tendency?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I have had no occasion for any anxiety in that respect.

Chairman WALSH. What precautions or safeguards did you consider as a means of preventing such an outcome, say, in the future?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, I think that I have relied upon the people who are constantly to watch and to know what these foundations are doing with the fund, that is to see what use they are making of it; and the legislators will be much interested. They can not be more interested than I am.

Chairman WALSH. Would you consider that serious wrongdoing on the part of any such foundation would endanger the existence and hamper the proper activities of all?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I think that if there were on the part of any one of those foundations something found to be wrong that that would be corrected. I should hope it would not result in harmful inferences to the other foundations.

Chairman WALSH. In order that the great foundations should be subjected to the same regulation and afforded the same protection, would you not deem it advisable that all foundations whose activities extend to more than one State should be chartered by the Federal Government, under certain uniform requirements?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, at the present, speaking of the Rockefeller Foundation, I would feel that the interests of the public are well protected, just as we are. What the future might develop would have to be for the future.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that full publicity should be given to all the activities of these institutions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I think it would be very well, indeed desirable, that the public should know, and that the reports should be made.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think of any definite system of public inspection that would be desirable for all foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, I have not occasion to contemplate anything of that kind up to the present time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you considered the possibility, Mr. Rockefeller, of such foundations exercising an undue influence upon education?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I have no fear whatever in that regard. There has been nothing in my observation that has led me to have any anxieties so far.

Chairman WALSH. In your experience, Mr. Rockefeller, going back of the establishment of the foundations, from your entire experience in giving, especially to educational—well, broadly speaking, educational institutions—have you found that any persons or institutions are likely to alter or profess to alter their avowed principles or previous method of procedure, even in order to secure your gifts?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I have never known of anything of that kind; never heard of anything of that kind, and can not imagine of our people desiring anything of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that colleges have given up denominational charters and removed the denominational connections in order to secure grants from any of these foundations? I am asking you now for your general experience?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Either in yours or observance of others?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. As to ours I have no idea that that has been true; as to others I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Carnegie mentioned the fact that some years ago, if I quote correctly, owing to a desire to give all persons an opportunity of education in certain sections, that colleges that had been known as denominational, I believe he mentioned, perhaps, a Methodist Episcopal college had given up their denominational character and gone upon a nonsectarian basis to secure funds. Was your attention ever called to any such case?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I do not recall that it was. I may have noticed at the time newspaper records, but I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. I am not asking for your opinion, unless you recall the case.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. No; I do not recall it.

Chairman WALSH. It is rather vague in my mind.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does not the greatest power which these foundations can exercise arise out of their ability to give or to withhold money?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Will you kindly repeat that question?

Chairman WALSH. Does not the greatest power which these foundations could exercise arise out of their ability to give or withhold funds—money?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. It is a great power to give. It may be equally virtuous and commendable to withhold. A great responsibility rests upon the men in that regard, the men administering the boards of trustees.

Chairman WALSH. Going back for a moment to your expressed belief in the continued integrity of trustees, of course, there have been many cases of mismanagement of mutual funds, such as was the case in the insurance companies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Of men that had stood very high?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Of men who stood very high before the public and lost their reputations and in many cases their social life?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, considering the experience of the past, do you conceive that there would be anything wrong about putting regulations in the constitution or these charters that might prevent any such occurrences within these bodies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I think that at any time that anything of that sort is made manifestly desirable by these directors—these trustees—that they would be the ones that would be glad to take any such progressive step if, indeed, it were progressive.

Chairman WALSH. That is, that it would have to come—or more properly come from the inside of the organization? Did I understand that correctly?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes; at the present time, unless the legislatures had complaints to make.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in the insurance companies where it was concentrated at least to the extent of the interested persons being policyholders, did you not observe that the existence of the abuses covered many years and that it was with great difficulty that a large number of the policyholders and stockholders brought about even better conditions through legislative inquiry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I did not follow that insurance affair—that investigation. I do not have the details or particulars of that in my mind. I had no personal interest in it, I believe, in one way or another.

Chairman WALSH. In the answers which you have already made to the commission—in addition to them, I would like to ask a few additional questions. You say under the terms of the clause of your letter of gift you reserve this right; that is, to hold personal control of a portion of it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. It is stipulated that the objects must be within the corporate purposes of the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I believe that letter of gift was the paper which alone transmitted the title of this $100,000,000 to the foundation, or was there another deed or document passed to the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. My attorney would know better about that. I should think that would be the order of the transfer.

Chairman WALSH. I think we may assume that, as we received an answer to that question from your son.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Already?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; but I was going to ask do you consider that, in case the legislature did repeal this charter during your lifetime, the property would go back to you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, I have been so hopeful, Mr. Chairman, otherwise that I confess I have not allowed myself to worry about that. I have a great deal of confidence in this board, and I have a great deal of confidence in our American people, in their integrity, and in their good common sense, and in that is our security.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, in case that something were to happen after your departure from this world which would cause the legislature to repeal the charter of your foundation, was it your idea in writing that letter that under those circumstances the money would go back to your heirs or to your estate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I think that you will find that there are provisions in the charter for the distribution of those funds by the trustees, perhaps. I think that they can distribute—if you will kindly read the question again, please.

Chairman WALSH. Will the reporter please read the question?

The REPORTER (reading): "Now, then, in case that something were to happen after your departure from this world which would cause the legislature to repeal the charter of your foundation, was it your idea in writing that letter that under those circumstances the money would go back to your heirs or to your estate?"

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I have never thought of that question.

Chairman WALSH. Now, it has been stated, I believe, Mr. Rockefeller, that you have certain gentlemen who are your personal advisers as to your business and investments?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Those are Mr. Starr J. Murphy, Mr.—I would have you repeat them, please.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I do not know that I could, out of hand, repeat the names of all of the gentlemen who are in such a relation. I could have a list prepared. Among the principal ones are Mr. Starr J. Murphy, my personal counsel, and my son, who has charge primarily of my affairs.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would submit that list.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I shall have a list prepared; and shall I in that list include, as I may well do so, also the staff of younger men who are coming on?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. And by and by will take the places of these men in the more prominent positions?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I wish you would.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. There are quite a number of the younger men, faithful and loyal and reliable, and I think that they would naturally come along and bear an honorable place in regard to this question you speak of.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would do that. It would be interesting and form an important part of the history.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I will ask to have that prepared, and, as I say, I will have included the men in my office and perhaps elsewhere who have more or less of those responsibilities.

(See Rockefeller, sr., exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. And in doing that, Mr. Rockefeller, will you indicate, as briefly and concisely as may be, the general functions performed by these gentlemen at the present time and those which you will expect to be performed by the younger ones who are coming on?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I think I could give that out of hand.

Chairman WALSH. Very good; I wish you would do it, then.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. My policy has always been to select for the lower positions—that is, for the beginning in my office staff and in the various relations—clean young men that were ambitious to improve and make their way in the world. Now, these young men steadily move up from the lowest positions as they show themselves qualified to take the highest positions.

Chairman WALSH. Is it from these gentlemen that you select your advisers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. They come to be good advisers. Among the list of these younger men I know some men who are quite competent to speak intelligently in regard to the affairs of business.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently do you see Mr. Murphy?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, I see Mr. Murphy, say, perhaps once or twice in a year.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently do you see Mr. Jerome D. Greene?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I do not see Mr. Greene—I would not naturally see Mr. Greene as often as I see Mr. Murphy, as Mr. Murphy has been now a long time in my employ.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Greene stated that he had met you but twice in five years during one period?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. That is probably correct.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. Gates, who has retired shortly from your personal staff, how frequently did you see him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I do not recall, of course, definitely, but periods of years run by.

Chairman WALSH. Have you seen President Elliot since he has been on the Rockefeller Foundation; have you met him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I have only met President Elliot twice in my life. I have seen him once, answering your question.

Chairman WALSH. Since the foundation was instituted?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you are a director of the foundation; a trustee, that is?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I am.

Chairman WALSH. But you do not attend its meetings?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I have not attended any of the meetings so far.

Chairman WALSH. In so far as the personal direction you desire to give it is concerned, does that go through your son?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Might I ask what personal direction you refer to?

Chairman WALSH. For instance, what I am leading up to, Mr. Rockefeller, is that an inquiry has been set upon foot by this foundation into the industrial relations of the United States, and I was going to ask you whether or not that was your conception?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. If you will be good enough to repeat the question to see if I got it straight.

Chairman WALSH. I was inquiring whether or not the personal direction that you desired to give to the foundation, if any—your personal suggestions, perhaps, I might say—came to the directors of the foundation or the executive committee through your son or Mr. Murphy or through what source?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I suppose it would come from them to me more than from me to them; that is to say, they are conversant with the applications; they are conversant with the situation the world over. I do not personally follow such questions. When a great need arises I may know before action is taken. I may not know, but I have my right as a director and my voice in giving with the others—nothing different from the other directors.

Chairman WALSH. I understand, but I understood you to say that you did not attend the meetings.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. No; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. And when you have a suggestion to make that you desire to go before the whole board how do you transmit it to the board?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, my son often speaks to me about the things they are considering, such as the hookworm or the relief in this quarter or that quarter; and if I have any expressions to make, that would be one of the ways. Or if I were to meet any of these directors or if they communicated with me by phone or any way.

Chairman WALSH. How often have you met Mr. Ivy Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I think I have seen Mr. Lee perhaps two or three times, possibly more.

Chairman WALSH. Referring to the occasion at Tarrytown, when Messrs. Welborn and King were present, as you say, was there a discussion there of the pending trouble in the State of Colorado? I will ask you a few leading questions to bring you directly to the point.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I do not recall any special discussion. It was a purely a social event; it was that and nothing more.

Chairman WALSH. Was anything said there about writing the letter in answer to the suggestions of the President with reference to relieving the situation in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I do not recall about that. I do not recall that there was anything of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Had you been told prior to that visit, Mr. Rockefeller, that it was expected to employ Mr. Mackenzie King to undertake a world-wide investigation into industrial relations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. My son had spoken to me about Mr. King some time before this. My son had called my attention to Mr. King.

Chairman WALSH. Was there anything said upon the occasion of Mr. King meeting or being with you on this social occasion at Tarrytown with reference to his employment by the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Nothing whatever. It was, as I have already stated, a purely social meeting at the dinner table.

Chairman WALSH. What responsibility, Mr. Rockefeller, do you believe that directors have for labor conditions in the industry in which they are directors? I am asking that as preliminary to another question. I would ask you to please repeat what responsibility, if any, you believe the directors have for the labor conditions in the corporations which they direct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I should say that the responsibilities in connection with the labor question were lodged with the officials appointed for that particular purpose, on account of their fitness for such position.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that constant reports should be made to boards of directors as to the conditions of labor, so that they may take them up as directors prior to the actual outbreak of labor difficulties?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think I could not enter into that question. I am not upon any of these business boards and have not been for long years.

Chairman WALSH. From your experience as an active business man and manufacturer, what would you say as to the desirability and right of workmen to form themselves into organizations for what they deem to be their own protection and advancement?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I would accord to all men the right to organize themselves—the workmen and the business men as well—with the proper limitations in respect to safeguarding the interests of the public or parties concerned.

Chairman WALSH. I want to direct your attention to a question that has been asked frequently of witnesses—and much has been said about it—to this effect. I will try to state it as concisely as possible, although it is a question that is somewhat broad, necessarily: After an industry has been organized to the extent that it can be controlled—that is, by one man or one group of men acting harmoniously and in concert—would it be possible, out of the potential profits of that institution, to increase wages to such an extent as to raise the economic level of all the workers in industry and relieve the necessity of extending charity, especially of those in it? Did I make myself plain, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. In part, and perhaps in all. I believe the best way to help the laboring man is to give them steady work and wages which they can earn—fair wages. I believe that that is better than any and all of the charities. And I believe that the good laboring men would prefer to have the labor and their honorable position rather than to have any charity.

Chairman WALSH. It has been stated, and I will restate to you as briefly as I can, and ask for your opinion. Of course, what I say, you will understand, I say without any personal reference.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Or desire to offend. It has been stated many times that it might be better for persons controlling very large industries, instead of devoting the excess profits to the dispensation of money along philanthropic and eleemosynary lines, that they should organize some system by which they could distribute it in wages first hand, or give to the workers a greater share of the productivity of the industry in the first place. Now, as one of the great givers of the world, Mr. Rockefeller, I will ask you kindly to comment upon that statement.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I will be very happy to see the laborers gradually become the owners of these same prosperous businesses to which you refer. I should be only too happy to surrender my holdings, in part, in any or all, that the laborers might come into the relation to the enterprise and have their representation on the boards of directors, according to their ownership, just the same as all other shareholders.

Chairman WALSH. I want to read you—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. (continuing). Thus giving them the profits to which you referred, giving them in addition to their labor these handsome profits which you are having in mind. I should be very happy to have them get those profits, and feel that they were my partners.

Chairman WALSH. Have you thought of any plan by which this transfer could be made?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. The transfer of stock?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; the transfer of stock or the transfer of ownership, that would thus give the profits to the workers in greater share?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Yes; that has been practiced in different institutions for long years. The processes, of course, are very different, Mr. Chairman. The man who has his money to pay for one share or more simply receives his share—he is already a member of the firm, one of the shareholders. And then he gets his two shares and three, and so on. Thus he is entitled to know all the ins and outs of the affairs of business.

Chairman WALSH. Without going into the details, did you read the grievances of the miners of Colorado addressed to the executive officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I did not go into those questions of detail, and they were far beyond my reach.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the grievances of the workmen in the mines of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. addressed to the executive officers of that company in 1903?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Oh, no; I have no recollection of any of those old conditions. I was a new investor at that time in this enterprise. I had just joined with some other friends, and we saved the enterprise at about that time from bankruptcy by putting in large additional capital. I have no recollection of that.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been advised of the claims of the workingmen in any of these industries in which you are a large investor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. No, sir. That would not come to me. That would be a matter of detail that would come to the proper officials.

Chairman WALSH. Your statement that in proper limitations, wise ones, that both the owners of industry and the workmen should be allowed to organize, is based upon your experience, I believe you stated, as a business man.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I would not ask any privilege or right for myself that I would not accord to the humblest man. I have always stood right there.

Chairman WALSH. I will read you, Mr. Rockefeller, from the Congressional Record, covering the hearing of the subcommittee on mines and mining, before following up the testimony, being the testimony of your son:

"I have been so greatly interested in the matter, and have such a warm sympathy for this very large number of men that work for us, that I should be the last one to surrender the liberty under which they have been working and the conditions which to them have been entirely satisfactory, to give up that liberty and accept dictation from those outside who have no interest in them or in the company. We believe that the issue is not a local one in Colorado; it is a national issue, whether workers shall be allowed to work under such conditions as they may choose. And as part owners of the property our interest in the laboring men in this country is so immense, so deep, so profound, that we stand ready to lose every cent we put in that company rather than see the men we have employed thrown out of work and have imposed upon them conditions which are not of their seeking and which neither they nor we can see are in our interest. There is just one thing, Mr. Chairman, so far as I understand it, which can be done, as things are at present, to settle this strike, and that is to unionize the camp; and our interest in labor is so profound and we believe so sincerely that that interest demands that the camp shall be an open camp; that we expect to stand by the officers at any cost. It is not an accident that this is our position. Rather than allow outside people to come in and interfere with employees who are thoroughly satisfied with fair labor conditions—it was upon a similar principle that the War of the Revolution was carried on. It is a great national issue of the most vital kind."

Considering now that the outside persons who came in were the organizers of a union which existed in the mining place of the company, would you say that that is your position?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Well, I feel decidedly that the employer must stand by his loyal men. He can not be treacherous to those men who render service faithful in their duties; and by all means, the employer should stand by his faithful employees.

Chairman WALSH. Is that all you care to say on the subject? That was quite a long statement, and especially is that your position, or would that be a fair way to ask you to state it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I would say by all means the employer must not disregard the rights and claims of his employees.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you, Mr. Rockefeller. We thank you very much.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. I thank you.

Chairman WALSH. You may be permanently excused.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Sr. Thank you.

Mr. Lindbergh.

TESTIMONY OF HON. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly be seated.

Congressman LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, in order to have this as brief as possible, I have written the matter as briefly as I could present it.

Chairman WALSH. That was very thoughtful. What is your name please?

Congressman LINDBERGH. Charles A. Lindbergh.

Chairman WALSH. And your residence?

Congressman LINDBERGH. My residence is Little Falls, Minn.

Chairman WALSH. And your business or profession?

Congressman LINDBERGH. I have practiced law in the past and farmed.

Chairman WALSH. What official position do you hold in the Government of the United States?

Congressman LINDBERGH. I am a Member of Congress from the sixth district of my State.

Chairman WALSH. That is of Minnesota, the sixth district of Minnesota?

Congressman LINDBERGH. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. We have been informed that you have given a great deal of study to the question of cost and prices?

Congressman LINDBERGH. I have.

Chairman WALSH. With reference to industrial conditions?

Congressman LINDBERGH. I have so.

Chairman WALSH. Have you been kind enough to prepare that in concise form that you might read?

Congressman LINDBERGH. I have.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would kindly do so.

We must have perfect order ladies and gentlemen.

Congressman LUNDBERGH. I realize that any report made by your commission will have the respectful consideration of the country, and therefore ask your review of certain facts, which I wish to present briefly.

"INCREASING COSTS AND SUGGESTIONS FOR A REMEDY.

"Legislatures and courts, as well as Congress, have an established rule that so-called vested property, when employed, is entitled to a so-called fair return. The enforced rule bears no relation to what men and women receive or should receive for their work in creating and conserving vested property, but corresponds somewhat with the results secured by speculators who make great profits from their respective schemes for scalping from the products of labor. The farmer, as well as the wageworker, whether mental or manual, strive year in and year out to secure success, each working his life out; but no rule was ever fixed by any legislature, Congress, or the courts that would enforce in favor of these toilers a fair return for creating the very property to which the vested rights privileges attaches. On the contrary, the rule of reasonable return established in favor of vested property when employed absolutely precludes and makes impossible a fair return to farmers, wage and salary workers. If any controversy arises as to what the farmer or wageworker should receive, the price is fixed at what others in his class receive for the same thing, which price has originally been made by the privileged class; that is, by the capitalists, and it bears no relation either to the cost of living, the cost of production, nor to its true relative service to mankind.

"No permanent reduction in the cost of living in favor of the masses can be secured as long as there is no relative rule for fixing a reasonable return for farm or other products and for labor, as compared with the so-called reasonable return for capital. The rule of reasonable return as applied—that is, the net profit, required to satisfy capital, does not change materially. It is the same now as it was for the years past, and as it is intended by the capitalist it shall continue on into the future. When the wageworker gets increased wages the employer adds the increase to the sale price of the goods the employee produces or the services he renders. If the employer did not, it would interfere with his so-called reasonable return, which it seems is a privilege regarded by legislatures and courts, as well as by Congress, as more sacred than human life. So, too, if the farmer gets more for his farm product, those who buy in just so far as they can, and if it is a special interest it can add the additional cost to the finished product and make the final consumer pay it. As a result this added cost is charged back to the farmers and wageworkers in the price they pay for the goods and the service that they must buy. Now, let us consider how the prices are continually marked up.

"VESTED PROPERTY WITH SPECIAL PRIVILEGE.

"With each additional year there is a greater amount of centralized accumulated property carrying to its possessors the special privilege of collecting reasonable profit for its use. Right there is the kernel in the nut; that is, it is the underlying reason—the fundamental cause of the increasing prices, and prevents a proper reduction of the hours of labor for the toilers.

"The interest, dividends, and profits that have been accumulated from past speculation are enormous, and they are multiplying annually. To comprehend this we must deal in concrete facts. There is over $100,000,000,000, including all kinds of property and debts owed by corporations and others, upon which the public is forced to pay interest, dividends, and profits, or what may be termed 'income property,' and to support and pay that, and also its further accumulation, the helpless masses of humanity are struggling to meet the payment of the reasonable profit upon this huge and constantly increasing sum.

"Including all ways in vogue to fleece the toilers it is understating rather than overstating to say that the profit averages not less than 7 per cent above expenses, and 3 per cent more may safely be added without overestimating it, as the cost and expenses, including upkeep, or a total of not less than 10 per cent. That is, there is an annual charge of more than $10,000,000,000 exacted from the toilers.

"I do not claim that those figures are absolutely accurate, for the exact amount can not be secured, but I do claim, and every careful student of the subject knows, that they are not exaggerated, and, in fact, are below the actual amount. They do, however, fairly demonstrate the principle I wish to make clear, which is, that the cost to the people of supporting the so-called rule of reasonable return for the use of capital, as it is applied in business and supported by law and practice, means that the toilers upon farms, in shops, and elsewhere, mental and manual, are forced to pay in a single year over $10,000,000,000, with the certainty that it will increase annually as long as the present rule and practice prevails. It is an actual tax upon the toilers to support and accumulate capital for the capitalists. It averages more than $100 for every man, woman, and child, and is increasing yearly in proportion to the increase of vested property employed in business.

"THE ENORMITY OF THE THING.

"This $100,000,000,000 upon which more than $10,000,000,000 is collected yearly, is owned by a comparatively few persons, and the courts decree and society accepts that when it is employed, as all this is supposed to be, it is entitled to a reasonable return above the cost of upkeep. There certainly are not to exceed 30,000,000 people who do any useful work, and upon them the entire burden rests. That makes an equivalent of $333 for each worker. Thus a man who is paid $600 annually for his labor or farm product, and his wife who works at home, have had their wages, or the income for farm products reduced, and the price of what they must buy increased, in order to contribute $666 as a reasonable return for the use of capital.

"I deny that the charge called reasonable return now made by the capitalists and supported by the courts as such, is in fact reasonable; but I admit that under the present system a charge for the use of capital is necessary in order to secure its employment. The Government charge to the banks is from 2 per cent to 3 per cent, and for good measure we will calculate on a basis of 4 per cent, which a few banks pay to a few depositors. On that basis the husband and wife depending upon a present income of $600 would, if only 4 per cent were charged for the maintenance of a reasonable income to capital, have their income increased by additional wages and by a saving upon purchases, working for the two an aggregate of six-tenths or $400. But even 4 per cent is unreasonable, for we must not forget that the $100,000,000,000 upon which the reasonable profit is being collected is in part the sweat money—that is, the accumulated, so-called reasonable profit taken from the toilers of the past.

"Take as an example the case of a skilled workman employed in a plow factory capitalized at $500,000, upon which the stockholders get 7 per cent dividend, while owing a bonded debt of $200,000, with an annual interest charge of 6 per cent upon that. To meet the dividend and interest would require $47,000 above the expenses of upkeep. That $47,000 would come from the profits on the sale of plows. In order to meet this payment the profits must be made as large as possible, not only to meet the dividends, interest, and expenses, but to accumulate a surplus, as well as a provision against future emergencies, which is the common practice. This is exactly the situation which creates the trouble in all cases. It causes the low wage to the employees in the factories and elsewhere, and high prices the purchasers pay for the goods, and as a result increases the profits with which to pay for the use of capital. It is not all deducted from the wageworker's pay. He is already chafing under the injustice of his meager pay, but under the rule, the profit must be made up. Therefore it is accomplished, in part, by keeping the workmen's wages below the actual value of his service and by tacking the rest onto the consumer's cost; and since the toilers themselves are also consumers, they get the worst of it both 'going and coming.'

"Your honorable commission will quickly see the problem presented. With the enormous accumulations of property now in the possession of the few, resulting, as it does, in a continually increasing capital upon which to compute the so-called reasonable return, it is certain that we are facing the impossible; that the masses are doomed to be more and more completely crushed and weighted to exhaustion, and that it can not be avoided except by resort to socialism, or by the adoption of a new rule by which the reasonable requirements of humanity will also be measured in connection with the so-called reasonable return for the benefit of vested property—that is, that vested property shall not carry to its owners the privilege of shackling the toiling millions with the burden of paying the tribute of what now is and has been enforced as the so-called reasonable return. The plain producer—the toilers everywhere must have a truly reasonable return for their services, which is, after all, the principal part of the world's requirements. The pay return of farmers, employees, and capitalists should be relative to their importance. The pay of the workers should not be encumbered with a charge such as that which I have described in favor of capital.

"Already the capital holdings upon which the tollers are forced to pay annual interest, dividends, and profits, averages more than $1,000 per capita. That is equal to more than $5,000 for each average family of five persons in the United States.

"Permit me to say that when the heads of the family once comprehend the fact that for each member of the family, as well as for himself, he owes a debt which he did not contract, but which nevertheless is annually increasing by force of this rule which I have described and is forced to pay interest, dividends, and profits for each member of the family be it large or small, and of the fact that upon their children and their children's children the debt will double and treble, as it must if the rule prevails in the future as it has in the past, I repeat, they will rise, and justly so, in rebellion against the system, and a new form of government will be established. If this is to be avoided, a reformed system will have to be installed to do justice to those who toll in all the useful industries that supply the needs of mankind. The rule of reasonable return can not much longer be exclusively applied for the benefit of capital.

"The other causes for the high cost of living are incidental to the one which I have presented. I shall not encumber you with a discussion of them. I wish, however, to make a few general observations before suggesting a remedy.

"THE RESULT OF THE SO-CALLED REASONABLE PROFIT.

"The rule as practiced has enabled greed, unobstructed, to appropriate the transportation systems, the most rapid systems of communication—telegraph and telephone—the forests, the valuable minerals, the water powers, the valuable patents, and the other most valuable agencies to mankind. The rule itself, as practiced, is sure to give capital the advantage which I have shown, but to facilitate its execution with the least delay and bring it to its most effective energy in behalf of capitalists, the banking and currency system has been made the agency of its hugest and most rapid accomplishment.

"THE MONOPOLY OF MONEY AND CREDIT.

"The people have now on deposit in the banks $19,100,000,000, on about half of which they receive no interest, and on the other half from 2 per cent to 4 per cent or approximately $285,000,000. But the banks have loaned more than 90 per cent of the $19,100,000,000 at from 6 per cent to 10 per cent—frequently more. In 1915 they will collect directly from the borrowers about $1,000,000,000 more than they pay for the deposits. In other words, the people take to the banks the $19,100,000,000 and get $285,000,000 from the banks for its use. But the banks collect from borrowers $1,285,000,000 which will be added to the price of the goods and services that the people must buy. In addition to these there is also the accumulated billions that the banks have collected in previous years for their stockholders, which is their vested property, and upon which those who save it collect the so-called reasonable return.

"The banks control the use of the $19,100,000,000 that belongs to the depositors and can loan it or withhold it as they please and loan to whom they please. It does not belong to them but they use it as they please. Because of that fact it is loaned in such manner and to such parties that the largest borrowers, who usually control the banks, get a decided advantage over all others and make several times greater profit out of the schemes into which they enter than the direct dividends that the banks pay to the stockholders. In other words, the bankers have a monopoly of the money and credit, which, as I stated, is the instrument for speeding up the absolute control of all property for the benefit of the capitalists.

"THE REMEDY LIKELY TO BE FIRST APPLIED.

"As I have already stated, there are two remedies that can be applied. One is pure socialism, which the people generally have refused to accept. The other is the one which I am explaining. It is to take from the banks the exclusive privilege of controlling the money and credit, which they have by Government authority. The interest to borrowers must be reduced to at least as low a rate as that now paid by the banks to the Government.

"An attempt will be made to fool the people by reducing the rate of interest in some cases. That will, in a measure, help the individual borrower whose interest is reduced, but the reduction will be accomplished by expanding credits, so that while the banks will collect less interest on a dollar they will collect interest on more dollars, thus preventing a reduction in the aggregate amount of interest paid. The public will find that it costs as much to pay interest, dividends, profits, and upkeep on $200,000,000,000 at 6 per cent as to pay 10 per cent on $120,000,000,000. Under our present system one or the other of those positions will develop very soon. I am referring to the process rather than the exact figures. The owners of the great banks, through their banks, having received from the Government the exclusive privilege to monopolize money and credit, will not care which way they do it, as long as they can force the public to pay as much or more than it has been paying. If the Government instead of private individuals got the interest and paid it out for annual expenses, we would not have the present accumulation of vested property in favor of a few who are permitted thereby to levy tribute to secure what they term a reasonable profit.

"The Government itself, so far as practicable, should collect the interest in lieu of taxes. There must be organization of all the useful industries in order that they may be financed by the Government as the banks are. This can be accomplished practically the same way as the organization of the banks was. The farmers, the transportation companies, the home builders, the manufacturers, and the municipalities, all should organize. To them all the Government must extend privileges such as are now given exclusively to the banks. To facilitate this great work and aid in securing the means, the postal-savings banks must be opened to all depositors for the acceptance of checks, money, and evidences of credit to aid in financing, not exclusively the banks, but all useful industries and enterprises which under the present system are burdened with the shackles of usury.

"Many are turning to the Socialist Party for a remedy, but the Socialists, I believe, do not claim that their proposed remedy could be put in full operation for a long time. If the Government will extend to all legitimate enterprise the use of the public credit, such as that which it has given exclusively to the banks, I am certain that more than half of our troubles about the high cost of living would be cured. Please understand me—I do not suggest taking from the banks all privileges of doing business, but I do maintain that bankers should have no exclusive privileges. The banks should be made our servants instead of our masters, and receive compensation as servants, for the value of their services only. This can be accomplished most quickly in a nonpartisan way. The remedy can be applied without hindering the enthusiastic office-seekers, proceeding as before in the name of their several political parties in an alleged attempt to bring about the millennium. As long as the progressive Republicans, the progressive Democrats, the progressive Progressives, and the progressive Socialists, and others, are divided into groups hostile to each other, the cause of humanity will progress slowly; for the reactionaries in all the parties are consistent and upon all problems vital to them which require their cooperation they stand together and act as a unit. It may be jealousy among the officeholders and those seeking office that keeps the progressives in all parties from acting together. But it does seem that jealousy should not exist among the voters, because their individual material interests are identical. It is the identity of material interest that ties the special interests together for united action to maintain control; but the material interest of the plain people to cooperate to prevent the special interests from having control and taking all in sight does not seem to work by the same rule. The plain people hurrah for the party and let the interests run away with the goods.

"Your honorable commission understands full well the significance of the main problem I have presented. If you broadcast its substance to the people, which the means placed by Congress in your charge enables you to successfully do, the people of this country will soon control legislatures and Congress, and a remedy will be forthcoming which will stop the increasing prices and give to the toiler less hours of toil and more of the substance that will supply them with the conveniences and demands of an honest and intelligent citizenship. It is merely a question of getting the right understanding home to the toilers on the farm, in the shop, stores, offices, on the railways, and elsewhere. Let these understand, and the manhood and womanhood of the citizenship of this naturally great country of ours will respond to its grandest opportunities. This is the people's country, and the men and women of this country should run it for themselves and their posterity instead of, as now, ignominiously submitting to a policy enforced in practice which makes of them the slaves of usury."

Now, having closed my written statement, I wish to add verbally that what I have stated is the main proposition I have desired to call your attention to. And, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to call your attention also to a report of the Secretary of the Treasury. This report is dated February 2. You will find on that date the Government of the United States had deposited with the banks something over $71,000,000. It has been for the most of the time in the last six months about $80,000,000, but suppose we call it $70,000,000. Upon that sum the banks are paying to the Government 2 per cent. As a matter of fact the banks are collecting directly for their own benefit 6 per cent approximately upon this $70,000,000, which you will see is 4 per cent in addition to what they are paying the Government; and therefore there is an indirect tax for the benefit of the banks which is added to the commodities and the prices which we are paying for our common necessities of this difference between 2 per cent and 6 per cent. But that is not all.

You know, as a matter of fact, that the total amount of money in the banks is about $1,700,000,000, and that by the process of banking it has been expanded so that the banks now have on deposit and are owing to depositors $19,100,000,000. The $1,700,000,000 has been expanded more than ten times in the form of credit. Now, this $70,000,000 which the Government has on deposit in the banks; that is, taken from the Government Treasury, is also expanded by a like process. Therefore, instead of the bankers collecting interest upon this $70,000,000 alone, they are collecting interest also upon a large amount of credit that is established by virtue of this $70,000,000. That, I say, in regard to the general bank deposits, was multiplied more than 10 times. We will not assume that they have been able to multiply it more than 10 times in the case of the Government deposits, because the Government may draw upon the banks at any time for this sum. But they have increased and expanded the credits they are given by virtue of that $70,000,000 to a very large extent; and on that account the banks are collecting many millions of dollars in the way of interest and profit above that which is directly collected by them upon the $70,000,000. This, too, is, in effect, a tax upon the people generally.

Now, the proposition I am making to you is this: That there has got to be some measure of a reasonable return, which is comparative, reasonably favoring property in the one case, but not losing sight in the other case of the toilers of this country, whether on the farm or elsewhere. You have got to consider the two together; and instead of the courts going on in the future and legislatures and Congress itself doing likewise, and measuring a reasonable return to capital upon the basis of what it can earn in speculation, it must be done with regard to what the toilers themselves are getting. So that both the toilers and the capitalists, as long as this system is followed out, will receive proportionately a fair return for the services that are rendered in the one case by the employment of capital and in the other case by the laborer.

Now, that is the particular problem that I have wished to call your attention to, and I do not think I need to take any more of your time. Of course, I am glad to submit to any questions you may wish to ask.

Chairman WALSH. I think, as far as I am concerned, that states it very concisely and well; and we will be glad to make that a part of our record, and if we issue a bulletin, to put it in the record.

Mr. Lennon says he was convinced of that a long time ago.

Congressman LINDBERGH. I thank you, gentlemen, very much.

Chairman WALSH. We thank you very much, Mr. Lindbergh, and we are sorry, in behalf of the commission, that we could not have given you a better place in the program; but we are limited in time.

Mr. LINDBERGH. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. I wished simply to get the facts before the commission so that you may have them in your proceedings.

Chairman WALSH. Very well.

At this time the commission will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 4.45 o'clock p. m., Friday, February 5, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Saturday, February 6, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m., at the same place.)

NEW YORK CITY, February 6, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Garretson, Ballard, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. Frederick A. Cleveland. Is Mr. Cleveland here? Please take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. FREDERICK A. CLEVELAND.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Frederick A. Cleveland.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. CLEVELAND. In New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Director of the bureau of municipal research.

Chairman WALSH. Director of the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The commission received a letter from you, Mr. Cleveland, under date of the 2d, stating that there had been injected into the proceedings of the commission statements that reflected on the integrity and professional character of yourself and associates in the bureau of municipal research by Dr. Allen. First, what are the statements that were injected into the hearing and reflected on the integrity of yourself and associates?

Mr. CLEVELAND. May I read the letter, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. May you read what letter?

Mr. CLEVELAND. The letter to which you refer.

Chairman WALSH. I will certainly allow you to. You mean the whole letter?

Mr. CLEVELAND. No; the half page of the letter.

Chairman WALSH. To which you refer?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You may read the whole letter if you care to; that is, the letter from which I just quoted, you mean?

Mr. CLEVELAND. The reason I ask is because it was not quoted, and this statement of my request, if I may read the letter, I think we will get it before us.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. CLEVELAND (reads):

"Hon. FRANK P. WALSH,

"Chairman Industrial Relations Commission, New York City.

"DEAR SIR: Mr. William H. Allen, who is employed by your commission, has issued to the public, and there has been injected into the proceedings of your commission, statements that reflect on the integrity and professional character of myself and my associates in the bureau of municipal research. I therefore ask that you incorporate the inclosed statement of facts in the record of your commission, and in order that there may be no grounds for the charge of misrepresentation or unfairness, I ask that I may be sworn as a witness before the commission under oath. A copy of this request is already sent to each member of the commission.

"Very truly, yours."

Chairman WALSH. You do not mean to say that I made a misstatement, but that I did not read the whole letter?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I mean to say that the statement of the chairman was that the letter alleged that there had been injected into the proceedings of your commission statements that reflected on the personal integrity and professional character of myself by Dr. Allen.

Chairman WALSH. And your associates in the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CLEVELAND. But by Dr. Allen; I made no such claim.

Chairman WALSH. You mean to say that Dr. Allen did not inject those statements into the record?

Mr. CLEVELAND. As far as I know he did not, but that he is employed by your commission.

Chairman WALSH. What I meant to ask you at first and ask you again is, What has been injected into the proceedings of this commission in the form of statements, first, that reflect on your integrity?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I assume that you wish to have me state in brief and characterize it rather than attempt to go back to the record and pick out the particular thing?

Chairman WALSH. Certainly, I would not have you go back to the record, but state what has been injected into the proceedings of the commission that you say reflects upon your integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I understand that what are called the large foundations are being inquired into by your commission; that Mr. William H. Allen, formerly a director of the bureau of municipal research, has been made a special agent of the commission for this purpose; that the forms of questions asked by Mr. Allen and your commission are such as to be tantamount to the charge that the power to subsidize has been used to influence the activities and ideals of scientific, educational, and philanthropic agencies.

Now, so far, we have no greater or different status than any other citizen in this industry; but I also understand that the bureau of municipal research has been pointed to as an example, and the manner of inquiry has been such as to be tantamount to the charge that the bureau of municipal research has been subverted by the influence and the conditional gifts of Mr. Rockefeller and the Rockefeller Foundation; that as a protest against such influence Mr. Allen resigned as director from the bureau of municipal research.

Chairman WALSH. Who said that; you mean that was implied in the question?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Yes; I mean—and stated by Dr. Allen when in the employ of this commission to the public press—

Chairman WALSH (Interrupting). Please first confine yourself to anything that has been injected into the proceedings in the way of statements that reflect on your integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. The form of the questions so far as I have heard them.

Chairman WALSH. Please indicate the questions that reflect upon your integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. It would be necessary for me to have a copy of the proceedings before me and time given to indicate them.

Chairman WALSH. Have you heard any one question?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I have.

Chairman WALSH. What?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I heard a part of the testimony of Mr. Cutting while under examination by this commission.

Chairman WALSH. What was the question that reflected on your integrity that was asked of Mr. Cutting by the chairman or any member of this commission?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I can not refer to it by the page for the exact wording of the question.

Chairman WALSH. Give the substance of it.

Mr. CLEVELAND. There was a large number of them that could have no other purpose than to indicate that the purpose of the question was to bring out an undue influence exercised on the part of Mr. Rockefeller and that Mr. Allen had resigned as a protest against that influence.

Chairman WALSH. Give the substance of one question asked of Mr. Cutting or any person else that you claim now reflects upon your integrity?

Mr. CLEVELAND. My claim is this, that the import of all such questions reflected on the integrity of myself and my associates.

Chairman WALSH. Would you call this question a reflection upon your integrity if I asked Mr. Cutting whether or not he obtained $20,000 from John D. Rockefeller, jr., under conditions that he would change certain of the procedures of the bureau of municipal research; would you call that a reflection upon your integrity?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I should say that the use of such a question in an ex parte proceeding may be so used and, as I read the record, was so used.

Chairman WALSH. If you wanted to inquire into that, how would you inquire into it except by asking the question?

Mr. CLEVELAND. During any ex parte proceeding there is only part of the story brought out; that is the substance of my protest.

Chairman WALSH. And is that the substance of your claim, that statements were injected into the proceedings of the commission that reflected on your integrity?

Mr. CLEVELAND. The substance of the claim is, as I have stated, that the whole implication, if not the charge which has been made by Mr. Allen to the public press while in the employ of this commission through those questions, that those of us who are in the employ of the municipal bureau of research have been bought up for $20,000 and are simply acting as cut-paws for the Rockefeller Foundation. That I consider a reflection on our integrity and professional character.

Chairman WALSH. Certainly; if you think you have been called a cat's-paw, it would be a very degrading reflection and would be a reflection, but I am trying to find out now wherein there was even any question asked that you say was a reflection upon your integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I will be very glad to go over the record, if I may be supplied with a copy, and mark such things for your information as seem to carry that implication.

Chairman WALSH. I have supposed that inasmuch as you had written this letter that when you were placed upon the witness stand you would be ready to state what reflection was made upon your character and integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I had assumed when I came here that it would not be necessary to read into the record the things that were already in the record.

Chairman WALSH. But perhaps you have made other assumptions in which you will be disappointed?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Possibly.

Chairman WALSH. If you are not able to give us that now, I wish you would take from this record the questions asked any witness which you claim implied a reflection upon your integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I would be very glad to. I will not ask you to produce, for instance, a question that was directly asked by Prof. Commons as to whether or not the $20,000 which was agreed to be given at a luncheon at which Mr. Cutting and Morawetz were in attendance did not influence the bureau of municipal research in changing certain of its policies, because that question was asked for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not that was true, and Mr. Cutting made his statement which, of course, will have to be analyzed and weighed and passed upon finally by the whole commission.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I wish you would describe what you have said about any alleged injection into the proceedings of anything that reflected upon your integrity, and please state what public statement Dr. W. H. Allen has made since he was an investigator and an assistant of this commission which reflected upon your integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I will be glad to submit to you a list of those things, as gotten from the public press. I have not them at present. I was not served with notice until late last night to come here, and the staff in the office that has had charge of preparing the data for this hearing, in compliance with your former request, were all delayed until just the time of the hearing on account of the Rapid Transit tie-up.

Chairman WALSH. Please indicate the substance of any statement you had in your mind that was made by Dr. Allen since he has been an assistant to this commission which reflects upon your integrity, and refer to the statement.

Mr. CLEVELAND. That he resigned from the bureau of municipal research protesting against the undue influence of John D. Rockefeller and of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Where did that appear since he has been an assistant to this commission?

Mr. CLEVELAND. It has appeared in the public prints, and it has appeared, as I have been informed, in many conversations with people.

Chairman WALSH. First, in what public prints did that appear since Dr. Allen has been an assistant of this commission? What paper?

Mr. CLEVELAND. In the public press of the city of New York. I will be very glad to furnish you the clippings on such things as refer—

Chairman WALSH. Do you remember any paper it was in? We might get it ourselves while we are examining you.

Mr. CLEVELAND. As I recall, the American or the Journal had some such statement in it—I would not be specific until I have a chance—

Chairman WALSH (Interrupting). Attributed to Dr. Allen?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Attributed to Dr. Allen, as I recall.

Chairman WALSH. The Journal or the American. Now, do you recall any other papers had any statement attributed to Dr. Allen that reflected upon your integrity?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I would not care to answer without having an opportunity to go through my clippings.

Chairman WALSH. What is the approximate date of this paper which has caused you to make this statement here on the witness stand?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Since the commission has begun its activities in inquiring into the foundations.

Chairman WALSH. Now, just indicate the name of the persons to whom Dr. Allen, since he has been an assistant to this commission, has made statements which are deemed to be a reflection upon your integrity.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I don't know that I care to.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you ought not to do it anonymously, Mr. Cleveland, do you think?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Beg pardon?

Chairman WALSH. I say, you should not care to clothe that in anonymity, should you? Now, if you say Dr. Allen has stated something that reflected upon your integrity to certain persons, do you think that you should not give this commission the names of those persons?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I think that is a question that should be asked Dr. Allen and—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I now ask it of you, inasmuch as you have stated publicly before this commission that Dr. Allen has made statements to individuals reflecting upon your integrity since he has been an assistant of this commission, that you give the names of those persons, if you have any such.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I can only say that it has been so stated to me.

Chairman WALSH. By Dr. Allen?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Not by Dr. Allen.

Chairman WALSH. By whom?

Mr. CLEVELAND. By persons who said they had talked with Dr. Allen.

Chairman WALSH. Who are they?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I don't care to give their names.

Chairman WALSH. Give the name of one of them.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I would prefer not to give such names.

Chairman WALSH. Why?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Because it would be—my testimony in that respect would not be more than hearsay.

Chairman WALSH. Wouldn't you call that mere scandal mongering, if you claim he made the statements and you can not give the names of the persons who claim they made them?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I should say there has been a great deal of that here so far, in these charges and implications with respect to the bureau.

Chairman WALSH. Were they ladies or gentlemen?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I don't care to suggest.

Chairman WALSH. Did they live in New York or elsewhere?

Mr. CLEVELAND. In New York.

Chairman WALSH. Did they say they did not want their names known?

Mr. CLEVELAND. They did not give me to understand that it was the purpose of having them publicly interrogated.

Chairman WALSH. Are they members of the bureau of municipal research, any of them, or on your staff?

Mr. CLEVELAND. They are not.

Chairman WALSH. Are they members of any organizations that derive their funds from the same source?

Mr. CLEVELAND. So far as I know, they were not.

Chairman WALSH. They, of course, are persons of standing and respectability?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I so consider them.

Chairman WALSH. And they did not say they did not want their names mentioned?

Mr. CLEVELAND. No.

Chairman WALSH. Now, with reference to your request that we incorporate the statement of facts in the record of the commission, I would say that that will be compiled with. It will be so incorporated. With respect to the request that you be sworn as a witness and examined under oath, that request will have to be denied. The policy of the commission is not to swear witnesses.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Very good.

Chairman WALSH. The letter that was served upon you last night contained a paragraph as follows [reading]:

"The commission desires you should come prepared to tell us precisely each specific instance in which Dr. Allen has made such statements during his connection with the commission and each specific statement which appears on the record of the commission which you deem to be unfair, and that you should be prepared to make a full answer to each of such statements."

Now, then, I do not care to examine you any further upon that; but you may now take the statements that were made to these persons reflecting upon your integrity, and after stating what the statements were, make your reply thereto.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I have stated in substance what they were.

Chairman WALSH. What were they? I did not catch it. What were the statements that were made to the other persons?

Mr. CLEVELAND. That the policy of the bureau of municipal research has been changed, due to Mr. Rockefeller's influence, and that Mr. Allen had resigned as a protest against that proceeding.

Chairman WALSH. Now, without stating the source of your information or who the persons were, you may proceed now, and you will have a full opportunity to answer in your own way those statements, as you have asked.

Mr. CLEVELAND. My answer to the first proposition, that the policy of the bureau has been changed, is that it has not. And in further answer to that proposition, I wish to say that all the persons, or a very large number of the persons, who were interested in starting the bureau are still with it and guiding its policies; that from the very beginning Mr. Rockefeller was one of a very large number of subscribers; that the only pledges that have ever been made are subscriptions given by Mr. Rockefeller that have any conditions whatever attached to them were obtained by Mr. Allen; and that the board has put itself on record, and the codirectors of Dr. Allen have put themselves on record, as being against any form of contribution that had any conditions attached or that would in any manner influence or bind the policy of its future action or limit the discretion of the board or of the staff; that the bureau originally undertook to make inquiries into the organization and management of the government, to find out what the government was doing, and how it was doing its work, what results were being obtained, without any color or bias, and to do this as an independent citizens' organization; that this is still the underlying purpose, policy, and motive of the board of trustees and of all the employees engaged by them; that in order there might be no question about the unbiased and disinterested attitude of the bureau in doing its work, it started out with an established policy of first preparing a statement of facts concerning any subject under inquiry, without comment or criticism, and submitting this statement of facts to the official or person responsible for the conduct of the office that was being studied, or taking up with the responsible officer or person any suggestion for change, enlargement, or amendment of this first draft of the statement of facts as submitted. This statement of facts first having been agreed to, the bureau then undertook to place before the officer its critical and constructive recommendations based on the statement of facts. It also undertook to give to the public officer its reports before it gave them to the public, in order that the officer might take such constructive steps as he might think desirable, with the facts before him, for the public good and before making the report and the statement of facts a matter of news. This is still the policy of the bureau of municipal research.

During the first five years of the bureau's existence Mr. Allen had little to do with the research work of the bureau, this being almost entirely in the hands of Mr. Bruére and Mr. Cleveland during the last three years. While Mr. Cleveland was absent Mr. Allen had much to do with the bureau's research work, and it was during this period that serious differences developed with respect to abuses being made of the personnel of the bureau, and serious question was raised by the board as to whether the practices that had grown up under Mr. Allen's management were in harmony with its established policies. With respect to publicity Mr. Allen's views have never been in harmony with those of his associates, and within the first year of the bureau's existence a special committee was appointed to define its publicity policy, departure from which has since been the subject of frequent protest. When Mr. Allen began more actively to participate in the bureau's work, some three years ago, he first entered the educational field, and in this he not only attempted to go into the various institutional aspects of education but also to harshly criticize educational theories and the ideas of professional educators. This practice, together with his personal attacks on educators, was the subject of protest from the members of the board.

Chairman WALSH. I would like to ask you at this point, Mr. Cleveland, what does Mr. Allen's personality have to do with the subject, as you understand it, Mr. Cleveland?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I understand that the charge has been made that the bureau's policy has been changed by the influence of Mr. Rockefeller, and that Mr. Allen has resigned as a protest against it; and what I am attempting to point out to the commission is that the practices that grew up under Mr. Allen were at variance with the policy of the bureau, and it was the protest of the board against that that led to Mr. Allen's resignation.

Chairman WALSH. Well, was that charge made in the records of the hearing of this commission, do you claim, by any person?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I claim that is a fair interpretation of the whole spirit of the inquiry with reference to the bureau of municipal research that the bureau of municipal research has been pointed out as a horrible example of Mr. Rockefeller's influence.

Chairman WALSH. By whom?

Mr. CLEVELAND. That that is a fair interpretation of the import of the inquiry.

Chairman WALSH. By whom?

Mr. CLEVELAND. That is the fair interpretation of the import of the questions in so far as the bureau of municipal research and Mr. Allen's resignation has been brought into the question.

Chairman WALSH. Do you mean questions asked Robert Fulton Cutting?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I mean the whole proceeding, so far as it relates to the bureau of municipal research.

Chairman WALSH. Of what other witnesses was any inquiry made as to the bureau of municipal research except Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I have very limited knowledge of the proceedings of this.

That growing out a part of the protest of the board against practices that had grown up under Mr. Allen's direct management a number of the members of the board resigned, including Mr. John B. Pyne, whose letter has been sent to you at your request, and which sets forth specifically the objection of the parties. That for two months after January 1, 1914, after Mr. Cleveland was out and Mr. Allen's codirector objected to the other participation in the management, and there is a sequence of conferences with Mr. Allen, both by him and by a committee of the board, seeking to get a common basis of understanding for adjustment of what perhaps were and what would be conceded to be the policies of the bureau. That these were found to be fruitless, and the result was Mr. Allen and his codirector resigned. That this resignation brought the whole matter before the general board, and the result is as known to you.

Now, with respect to the second proposition about Mr. Rockefeller's subscription and influence, I only wish to repeat what has been set forth in the statement which has been made a part of this record.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. CLEVELAND. And to add to this the further statement that a considerable part of Mr. Allen's time has been given to an effort on his part to raise an endowment of $10,000,000 for the bureau of municipal research.

Chairman WALSH. From whom?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Various persons.

Chairman WALSH. Including Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Well, an appeal made to Mr. Rockefeller as well as to the Sage Foundation and the Carnegie Foundation and very many other persons. It has been one after another. He sought to obtain an endowment for the bureau of municipal research, and to that end we have letters showing his effort to obtain the influence of prominent public men to be brought to bear on those givers.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do you deem that to be a reflection on Dr. Allen that he solicited money for this purpose from Mr. Rockefeller and others and in attempting to have influential persons assist in it?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I only offer that as evidence that the inquiry which is being conducted by Mr. W. H. Allen at this time is not wholly ingenuous.

Chairman WALSH. You think that the situation created is pernicious or otherwise; when a man leaves a bureau it might be stated that he did such things, that he solicited contributions of these men—what do you think a situation like that creates; what is your comment on it?

Mr. CLEVELAND. My comment is this, that when a man persists in that down to the time that he is asked to resign and then suddenly comes out as a missionary for the people as against that sort of thing, that it indicates that the commission has in its employ one who has prejudices and can not approach the thing fairly and unbiasedly.

Chairman WALSH. In other words then, following out your answer, I am just going to ask you this one question; it is not clubby for a man to try to get money from these people and say anything to those after he goes out?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I would say that it is rather this, that if a commission which is using the power of inquisition of the Federal Government employs an agent of this kind, it is not going to get the truth.

Chairman WALSH. Why not? Suppose you were out and we employed you.

Mr. CLEVELAND. For the reason it is an ex parte proceeding and they are the very ones who are looking for the kind of thing that can be used to get somebody, which is the psychology that seems to be back of part, at least, of this inquiry.

Chairman WALSH. Who prepares all the answers to those questions?

Mr. CLEVELAND. The questions, however, direct the course of the inquiry. They can not prepare the answers to the questions, but the questions—

Chairman WALSH. Did you understand that you could not make answer to the questions which were submitted to you and give a full explanation in regard thereto?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I understood that when a person has had access to other persons' records and he is permitted to ask all the questions that he can, is in a position to put the other person in a position to explain things that need no explanation if the whole truth were told.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, if there is anything of that kind which has occurred in this inquiry, proceed now and tell the whole thing.

Mr. CLEVELAND. That is the reason I submit this statement of fact, because the inquiry was such as to limit the discussion of things and an attempt to answer the question would leave things unsaid that if injected into the record would give an entirely different view of the case.

Chairman WALSH. And this statement you have made into the record contains the whole explanation to any questions that may have been asked by the commission?

Mr. CLEVELAND. It is an attempt to set before you a number of statements of fact about three propositions to which this statement goes.

Chairman WALSH. I will say, Mr. Cleveland, that if you deem that that does not set forth the facts in full, I wish that after you have called the attention of the commission to the statements made in the press, which you claim reflect upon your integrity and that of your associates, and after you have thoroughly considered what has been told to you by other people, that if you desire to supplement those with any statements of fact, we will be glad to have you do so and have it made a part of your record. Is there any statement you care to make orally at this time?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to say that the principal questions of difference that have arisen with respect to matters of policy have had to do with the scientific character of the work on the one hand and to its impartiality on the other, and it was thought by the board and by the associates of Dr. Allen that in both respects the work of the bureau was being impaired by the manner in which he was conducting inquiries and by the use which he was making of the organization and resources of the bureau.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Commons would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner COMMONS. As far as I understand the situation, Mr. Cleveland, it amounts to this: That we are investigating these foundations with reference to whether they are a menace to the public and with reference to their power to control public institutions, colleges, universities, which are supposed to look out for the interests of the public. I take it that your bureau of municipal research is such an organization, and here is a concrete case presented to this commission where we may be able to pass judgment, not only on whether these foundations might possibly be a menace in the future, but whether they are actually now doing things which are a menace to freedom of investigation, to the right that a man has to hold his job in an institution of this character as against moneyed influence, and as to whether that influence is now being used to determine policy and to determine the personnel of investigations. Now, Mr. Cutting, the other day, in answering my question which I put to him, answered it in about that form, treating it in this way: That he, being a wealthy man and being as large a contributor as Mr. Rockefeller himself, must feel that was such an immaterial thing that if anybody wanted to believe it he could not help it, and so he did not give us any satisfactory answer.

As the situation is left with Mr. Cutting's testimony there is no evidence to show whether the bureau of municipal research ever examined or ever changed its policy and would have dismissed Mr. Allen had there been no Rockefeller Foundation in the question.

The question at issue, by which we can judge of a concrete case, whether these foundations are a menace or not, would have to be decided largely by whether or not that policy would have been changed and Mr. Allen would have been dismissed irrespective of the existence of the Rockefeller institution. In order to get that, there were three things, as I understand it, the method of publicity was changed—the investigation of pedagogical methods was changed, and the training school for those who expected to be experts in this line of work was either discontinued or planned to be discontinued.

Now, what I should like to know would be such examples of the kind of publicity or the kind of investigation that was being conducted by the bureau to which you objected and from which we might then judge whether or not it was of sufficient importance to have caused a change of policy and to have caused the dismissal of Mr. Allen, irrespective of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Now, what was there on the matter of publicity that you objected to? I asked that question of Mr. Cutting, but he was unable to give me any information.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Before I answer that may I say one word as to the form of the question?

Commissioner COMMONS. All right.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Namely, that in the statement preceding it the assumption has not been that the training school would be discontinued nor that publicity would be discontinued, but that the practices and management with respect to these would be changed in such a manner as to make it square with the established policy of the institution. Coming to the point of the publicity, I say that during the last three years—

Commissioner COMMONS (interrupting). Mr. Cleveland, if you will simply read the typical ones—pick out a few typical ones and file the others—give the typical ones that you refer to.

Mr. CLEVELAND. May I say that the first publicity of the bureau was begun the first year after its organization, in which Mr. Allen, who was employed almost entirely on the publicity contact side of our enterprise and the money raising, began to use the funds of the bureau to issue small leaflets that could be sent in an envelope; that at once, these matters coming before the attention of the board of trustees, question was raised about that form of publicity, and a committee was appointed, which finally accepted this as a form of publicity and reported favorably on it, but recommended that in that form the publicity should be limited to quotations and excerpts from the public press or from any documents that were in the nature of expressions, either with respect to the work of the bureau or its interests; that these would be used simply as a way of distributing; that is, making these clippings, or a press service—or an educational service, I should say. The departure from that established policy of the bureau for municipal research has been one of the causes of irritation. It was adhered to for a time, but every little while there would be a break away from it, and finally it was brought up in the board and understood that Mr. Cutting and another member of the board—which one I have forgotten, but I think Mr. Morawetz—were to pass on every one of these things before they were sent out, but that was not done. Every little while something would get out without their having seen it. However, the exigencies or the limitations of time being urged, these were overlooked, and the matter was kept pretty well within those lines until about three years ago. I have forgotten—it is within the last three years at least, because I know it was during my absence—the publicity of this kind was converted into two weekly publications, one called Efficient Citizenship and the other called Municipal Research, thereby giving them the status of publications under the postal laws of the United States and giving to the institution the benefit of what is called second-class postage, or the newspaper postage rate.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now, have you some examples there?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Now, as examples of a departure from the policy of the bureau that these things should contain only the excerpts from others, here we have for example:

ADENOID SMILE AND ADENOID AGE TABLES.

The cat's in the dumps,
She's bothered with lumps,
And nothing is really worth while;
Her brain it is fogged,
Her nose it is clogged,
And she's wearing an adenoid smile.

This is on the first page of Efficient Citizenship, a large part of which is in the nature of comment, editorial comment within the office, and not in the nature of excerpts.

There were a large number of things of this kind, as for example, another one, No. 618; the other was 616, issued under date of May 10, 1913. This is No. 618, issued under date of May 17, 1913. There was a special number in between, which I do not happen to have before me at this time, Making Lemonade with Lemons, with some more of this kind of comment.

Now, that is the kind of thing, and I could give you hundreds of those.

Commissioner COMMONS. You might file them if you will, please. File those two with the record.

(The witness hereupon introduced, in printed form, two leaflets, entitled, "Efficient Citizenship," issued May 10 and 17, 1913, by the Bureau of Municipal Research, 261 Broadway, New York.)

And here is another in which this appears: Civicity Like Charity Begins at Home.

The REPORTER. Civicity?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Yes; that is a newly coined word coined by the bureau of municipal research.

That is the character of publicity that was repeatedly argued against while it was commented on as something that might be highly desirable for the purpose of propaganda, but for the purpose of popularizing an ideal it was thought that our agency was not one that should employ—at least devote—those weekly publications to.

Commissioner COMMONS. On what ground did you object to that kind of publicity? Why was that not consistent with your bureau, if you say it was not?

Mr. CLEVELAND. The thought was that it was—well, in the first place—it was in direct violation of the instructions of the board of trustees, which had taken this matter up and considered it in committee and decided against it.

Commissioner COMMONS. I am trying to get at the reasons.

Mr. CLEVELAND. As to what were the reasons that moved the board of trustees, I can only tell you of the discussion that took place at the meetings at which I was present. I was not present and did not take up with the committee the question in its deliberations, but the reason advanced at that time was that while it might be effective, and very effective, it would tend to give to the public a wrong idea about the methods and purposes of the bureau; that it was reaching out for publicity and that it lent itself more directly to hostile criticism than it did to constructive purposes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now, take up the investigations or methods of investigation or subjects you refer to.

Mr. CLEVELAND. You mentioned the management of the training school. The training school was organized for the purpose of giving men who were just out of engineering or technical schools—men who had little or no practical experience, but had laid a broad foundation for a career, and who wished to get into public work in one capacity or another, such as an investigator or employee of the Government, or an employee of one or another of those citizen agencies that exist in this country having a public interest. The thought was that this would give men an opportunity to get in touch with public problems and Government work, and of working with men who were working on those problems or working under them. In other words, it would be a laboratory or clinical process of studying government. Now, as I said, the whole theory was that these men would work under direct supervision of those who had assignments on the staff, and when I came to get into active contact with that part of the management I found only a small percentage of the men had been so assigned; that most of them were working independently and many of them were employed on assignments wherein they were to be used directly as the persons to make the report, and whose reports were to be relied on as basis for bureau action.

I raised the question about this as a matter of policy, and I found that Mr. Allen and I could not get into an agreement on the matter. As illustrating the character of assignment which has been made by Dr. Allen, and it illustrates both that the person was not assigned to work under a member of the staff who had his report to prepare—a technical or expert report to prepare as a basis for a conclusion, and also illustrates assignments to a subject that to my mind was entirely foreign to the purpose of the institution. This assignment to Mr. Taylor—

Commissioner COMMONS. How much experience had Mr. Taylor had?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Taylor had had the experience of a law clerk, I think, before he had come in there, and had had a college education. He, by the way, was exceptional in that he had had some experience. But this was the assignment [reading]:

"For the next few months there will be a great deal of discussion of the possibilities of destroying or rehabilitating Tammany Hall. Talk of destroying Tammany Hall is probably absurd. Talk of rehabilitation is equally absurd unless they go further than the making up of the men at the top. So far as I know there has never been a suggestion that the charter of Tammany Hall be qualified or repealed so as to give its membership a voice in the management and more particularly a guaranty of complete publicity. It has no publicity as to what has happened. Please look into this thing and report when you see your way out as to the possibility of so reorganizing Tammany Hall by charter and by publicity provisions that it will become a veritable bureau of municipal research, plus training school for public service, plus clearing house for adequate community relief discussion."

This is assignment 489 of November 5, 1913.

One of the assignments was almost—which was before us concurrently at the time that we had our discussion.

Another assignment made on the same day to a Mr. Zeiger; the assignment is as follows:

Commissioner COMMONS. How much experience had he?

Mr. CLEVELAND. He was a man, as I recall it, just out of college. I have a list of the men with their experiences here if you would care to have it in the record [reading]:

"The portion of Mr. Shroeder's letter hereto attached which speaks of fish in Iceland. Take steps to see whether it would be possible for American shippers to have fish come from Iceland."

It was thought that that was in the nature of an expert problem in the first instance for which Mr. Zeiger was wholly disqualified, or not qualified, and second, that it had nothing to do with the purpose of our work.

Now, with respect to the utilization of the bureau, or of the training-school men, independently on assignments, here are some of the assignments I brought to the attention of the board when this subject was under discussion. This is an assignment to a Mr. Schneider, No. 630.

Commissioner COMMONS. What was his qualification?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Schneider, before he came to the training school, had been at work for—he was a college graduate and had been at work for the park and boulevards commission of Indianapolis. He had had quite a little of contact with that kind of a problem. This was an assignment that was given similarly to a large number of the men. It was entitled "Help Your City Complainants," the purpose being to investigate complaints. The instructions were these [reading]:

"Please remember that the first purpose of the assignment is to get information promptly, and to suggest remedies."

My objection to that was that the complaints in nearly every instance had to do with more or less technical or intricate parts of the city's business. At least it would require a man familiar with the subjects to know whether the complaint was well founded and what remedy, if any, should be applied. None of these men had any such qualifications, or if they had, their proper place was not in this training school.

Another, to Mr. Talmadge, a man who had just come in and who had had experience, I think, as an insurance broker, or in an insurance broker's office, or something of that kind. The assignment was [reading]: "Re information Concerning Automobiles Owned and Used by Various City Departments."

The instructions [reading]:

"The purpose of this study is to obtain the facts stated for the use of the bureau. The assignment to get information as a basis for bureau action."

Commissioner COMMONS. We will pass from that. We have not the time to go into it any further.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I would like to say further in regard to this particular man. I brought before the board three assignments of that man, one for the investigation of automobiles, one for the purpose of obtaining information for the sinking fund commission, which will be of assistance to it in considering requests made by the street cleaning department for renewal of leases, and one for the investigation of municipal buildings, for none of which did he have any qualifications more than any boy that was out of college, and without any assignment to any person to have him work under supervision.

Commissioner COMMONS. Take up the next question of the investigation of the public schools. What have you to say upon the question of the policy and of the method that you objected to?

Mr. CLEVELAND. The methods that we objected to there was the sort of public pickling process that grew out of that was based on one thing and another that had been published or issued either by the board of education or by the persons who had been employed by the board of estimate and apportionment to investigate the board of education, and as a large amount of the publicity which will be submitted to you as you suggest will bear out that subject.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now, on what date did you first get this matter of criticism?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Before I leave that may I say one word?

Commissioner COMMONS. We only have a very few minutes, and we will have to take that up, as I say.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I wish to call attention to the incident of my having been forced to apologize to the court of the city of New York—the supreme court—for a kind of statement that was gotten out reflecting on them, which was one of the things brought before the board.

Commissioner COMMONS. You may file that, if you will.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Be very glad to have it.

Commissioner COMMONS. What was the date when you first took up these matters of criticism, or when it was first taken up?

Mr. CLEVELAND. They were first taken up when I was still employed on the customhouse work and only occasionally at the bureau.

Commissioner COMMONS. What date was that?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Along in November and December of 1913.

Commissioner COMMONS. What did you take up then?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I was still—had the responsibility of a director, although I was not active in the management. I took up a number of these questions that I have referred to at that time and discussed them at length with Mr. Allen, and also participated in the controversy. I say participated in—was present at conferences concerning the controversies between Mr. Allen and Mr. Bruère.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you any correspondence relating to that?

Mr. CLEVELAND. There was no correspondence.

Commissioner COMMONS. What was the next date at which you took up anything?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Then, after January 1, Mr. Bruère having resigned and I having been made free for active work, when I came into the active management or responsibilities there we had almost daily conferences on various things; and I found, after some two months and after six hours of conference on the 28th of February, that there was no possibility of Mr. Allen and me agreeing on any question that had to do with the work or the management of the work of the bureau of municipal research; and on the next day, which was Sunday, March 1, I wrote my letter of resignation and submitted it on the 2d.

Commissioner COMMONS. What action was taken by the board on your letter of resignation?

Mr. CLEVELAND. It was sent to the chairman of the board. The chairman of the board asked me—there was nothing said in it reflecting on Mr. Allen—asked me why I was resigning, and I told him, as I had indicated in the letter, that I had other work to do. And he said that he was very much disappointed, and he felt that the other members of the board would feel very much disappointed that I would go away from them, when Mr. Bruère had already gone out, and they had been depending on me to help out; and I said, "If you are going to put me in the position of running away from responsibility," I said, "the board will have some questions to decide." And he wanted to know what I meant, and I told him these questions of policy could not be agreed on and that the bureau of municipal research, as I understood, was composed of the board of trustees, and that Mr. Allen and I were only employees; and that its policy should be determined by the board and, so far as I was concerned, they would have to determine it if I remained. Then he wanted to know if there could not be some arrangement made similar to that which first obtained the first five years, under which we would have a division of responsibility; and I said I had tried to talk out with Mr. Allen various possibilities in that line, and said I was ready to take any part of it, all of it, or none of it. And then he came to the bureau—this was over the telephone that we were talking—and he sat down with Mr. Allen and me, and on Mr. Allen's motion we agreed to a type-written memorandum of the subdivision of responsibility, the important feature of which was that I would be given charge of the work of the staff and of the professional and technical work, and Mr. Allen would have the training school. That lasted 24 hours. It is unnecessary to say what happened, but it was found that my orders were being countermanded, and the only thing to do was to put it squarely up to the board. And on the 24th of March the board acted on the proposition presented by Mr. Cutting, practically confirming that memorandum, but to no purpose; and the thing drifted along until May 13, when the board finally took its action.

Well, I would say that there was an executive committee meeting, which finally decided on certain questions of policy which indicated very clearly that the board would not support the contentions of Mr. Allen.

Commissioner COMMONS. Was that after the arrangement was made with Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Rockefeller—the request sent to Mr. Rockefeller to take up the question of next year's funds, as I recall, was on the 7th of January, but there was no response to that, and no contact with him, so far as I know, except by Mr. Allen, until the 20th of April, when at his request Mr. Cutting met him at luncheon to talk over next year's finances. And while I was not present at that conference, and in fact up to that time had never been in contact with Mr. Rockefeller or any person in the Rockefeller Foundation with respect to any business of the bureau, Mr. Allen having done all those things, I was present at a conference immediately following Mr. Cutting's return to the bureau and telling Mr. Allen and me what had happened. Mr. Cutting stated that in taking up this question of funds that Mr. Rockefeller had said that he was just as much interested as he ever had been in the work of the bureau, as originally planned, and as he understood it was being carried on pursuant to the policies of the board until comparatively recently—within a recent period. That during that time the bureau had branched out on a lot of things—a number of things—with which he was not in sympathy; that if there could be some way devised whereby he could know what he was contributing to, that he would be very glad to consider a contribution for the next year, and he did not wish to be considered as having stated arbitrarily that he would not contribute in any event, but that he did not feel like contributing to things that he did not have any interest in; and in that he referred to the questions—the very questions—of publicity, of the use of the training-school men on service, which had come to his attention through the reports that had been made by the training-school men, and with respect to the—well, what was called the outside work—the use of the large part of the staff for work outside of New York.

Commissioner COMMONS. Getting back to my first question. Suppose the influence of Mr. Rockefeller had not come in at this date; do you think the policy of the bureau would have been changed in the same way as it has been changed?

Mr. CLEVELAND. May I say on that point exactly what Mr. Cutting said on that matter?

Commissioner COMMONS. He said it had not been, but I want to know what your idea is.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Well, the affairs to which the policy of the bureau—the distinguishing policies from practices—must necessarily be a matter for determination by the board. But Mr. Cutting on that day said that he told Mr. Rockefeller that he had not raised a question that had not been prominently before the board and on which they had committees at work, and that so far as he could find out that a question of that kind had already been determined in the minds of the board of trustees. Furthermore, that the expressions of meetings at which I was present showed conclusively—that is both before and after this period—that every member of the board, before this discussion arose, was firmly convinced on the subject and had firmly determined as to what his action would be with respect to making the recent practices square with what they understood to be their continuing policy.

Commissioner COMMONS. Did you put up to the board the issue of either you or Allen getting out of the board?

Mr. CLEVELAND. I only resigned. At that time I did not know how the board would stand on any question of controversy between me and Mr. Allen. He had been here all of the time and I had been away except for the last two months, and I assumed they were quite familiar with the things I had objected to in the private conference with him that had not, up to that point, been brought up openly in the board; and therefore I resigned.

Commissioner COMMONS. Was this a personal issue between you and Dr. Allen, or was it based on a question of policy?

Mr. CLEVELAND. Absolutely on a question of policy. We never had any question of personal issue except one growing out of the methods of work and the practices that had grown up under Mr. Allen's management.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Cleveland.

(The letter and statement previously submitted by Mr. Cleveland are as follows:)

BUREAU OF MUNICIPAL RESEARCH,
New York, February, 2, 1915.

Hon. FRANK P. WALSH,

Chairman Industrial Relations Commission, New York City.

DEAR SIR: Mr. William H. Allen, who is employed by your commission, has issued to the public and there have been injected into the proceedings of your commission statements that reflect on the integrity and professional character of myself and my associates in the bureau of municipal research.

I therefore ask that you incorporate the inclosed statement of facts in the record of your commission; and, in order that there may be no ground for charging misrepresentation or unfairness, I ask that I may be sworn as a witness and examined under oath.

A copy of this request is being sent to each member of your commission.

Very truly, yours,

F. A. CLEVELAND, Director.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

THE ORIGIN OF THE BUREAU.

The one novel idea in the organization of the bureau of municipal research (the continuous employment of a staff by a citizens' agency to keep in touch with the Government and what it is doing, and to cooperate in constructive work) had been discussed for many years before 1907. In its issue of March 11, 1901, this was the subject of an editorial in the New York Tribune, which was clipped by Mr. Frank Tucker and sent to Mr. Cutting as something to which he should lend his support. Soon after this a formal proposal to create a bureau or department of civic affairs of the chamber of commerce was prepared by Mr. Tucker and taken up by Mr. Cutting with Mr. Charles Stewart Smith, a prominent member of that body. When Mr. Allen came to New York his assistance was invited. While engaged professionally on work of this kind, Mr. Frederick A. Cleveland became impressed with the need for an independent agency, supported by citizens, which would be equipped to obtain information about the management of public affairs, and follow up and support the constructive measures of public officers. When Mr. Cleveland became a member of the mayor's advisory commission on finance and taxation in January, 1905, he actually employed an outside staff in this manner.

In February, 1905, Mr. Cleveland prepared a written prospectus for the organization of a permanent "Bureau of municipal research," at the suggestion of Mr. Tucker, and placed it in Mr. Allen's hands, with the understanding that he would undertake to raise money for it. This brief was used for some time by Mr. Allen and several conferences were arranged with professional and business men. Later in November, with the help of Mr. Tucker, Mr. Allen prepared a revised statement and circulated it under the title of "Brief for the Establishment of an Institute for Municipal Research."

In the latter part of 1905 Mr. Cutting decided to support the effort at the rate of $1,000 per month for a year, to make an actual demonstration of what could be done; and with this fund Mr. Henry Bruère was employed to take charge of it, taking over on his staff some of the men who had been working with Mr. Cleveland. The work was financed by Mr. Cutting and conducted by Mr. Bruère as the "Bureau of city betterment," a branch of the citizens' union, of which Mr. Cutting was president. The success of the first year's effort led Mr. Cutting to ask Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller to join him, and the bureau of municipal research was incorporated in 1907, with Mr. Cutting, Mr. Tucker, Mr. Allen, Mr. Cleveland, Mr. George McAneny, Mr. Richard Watson Gilder, Mr. Edwin R. A. Seligman, and Mr. Carroll D. Wright as trustees. Mr. Bruère was the first director of the bureau. Mr. Cleveland was brought in as director on the technical side and Mr. Allen was made director in recognition of his ability as a promoter and advertiser.

THE PURPOSE AND POLICY OF THE BUREAU.

The bureau originally undertook to make inquiries into the organization and management of the Government, to find out what the Government is doing, how it is doing its work, and what results are being obtained, without color or bias. This is still the underlying purpose and motive of the board of trustees and of all of the employees of the bureau engaged by them.

In order that there might be no question about the unbiased and disinterested attitude of the bureau in doing its work, it started out with the established policy of first preparing a statement of facts, without comment or criticism; of submitting this statement of facts to the official or to the person responsible for the conduct of the office that was being studied, of taking up with the responsible officer or person any suggestion for change, enlargement, or amendment of the first draft of statement of fact, as submitted. A statement of facts having thus been agreed to, the bureau then undertook to place before the officer its critical and constructive recommendations based on the statement of facts. It also undertook to give to the public officer its report before it gave it to the public, in order that he might take such constructive steps as he might think desirable for the public good before making the report a matter of news. This is still the policy of the bureau of municipal research. During the first five years of the bureau's existence, Mr. Allen had little to do with the research work of the bureau, this being almost entirely in the hands of Mr. Bruère and Mr. Cleveland. During the last three years, while Mr. Cleveland was absent, Mr. Allen had much to do with the bureau's research work, and it was during this period that serious differences developed with respect to the uses which were made of the personnel of the bureau and serious question was raised by the board as to whether the practices that had grown up were in harmony with established policies.

With respect to publicity, Mr. Allen's views have never been in harmony with those of his associates, and within the first year of the bureau's existence a special committee was appointed to define its publicity policy, departure from which has since been the subject of frequent protest.

When Mr. Allen began more actively to participate in bureau work, he first entered the educational field; and in this he not only attempted to go into the various institutional aspects of education, but also to harshly criticize educational theory and the ideals of professional educators. This practice, together with his personal attacks on educators, was the subject of protest by members of the board.

Further questions were raised as between the directors with respect to practices pertaining to the professional-service work undertaken for compensation, management of the training school, office organization and discipline, and other matters, many of which were not brought before the board.

During the period of these controversies, several members of the board of trustees resigned, the last being Mr. John B. Pine, his letter, with statement of reasons, being dated February 20, 1914.

Effective on January 1, 1914, Mr. Burère resigned as codirector.

For two months after January 1, 1914, efforts were made by Mr. Allen's remaining codirector, who had then returned to active participation in the management, to find a basis whereon an agreement could be reached with respect to bureau work, either by a definition of duties or by a subdivision of responsibility, which could be presented as a formal proposal to the board of trustees.

Finding that this was impossible, on March 2, following a six-hour conference on February 28, Mr. Cleveland submitted his resignation to the board of trustees, recommending that the management be turned over to Mr. Allen.

The resignation of Mr. Cleveland brought the chairman of the board into the matter and an agreement, in writing, was made with respect to the division of work, to no avail.

A formal proposal along the same lines was then brought before the meeting of the board of trustees (Mar. 24, 1914) and a resolution was passed defining the jurisdiction and authority of each director, with no better result.

Again the questions in controversy were taken in hand by the chairman of the board, but as it became evident that it was necessary for the board to formally decide matters of policy, the questions in issue were formulated and a meeting was called to pass on these May 13, at which Mr. Allen submitted what he has been pleased to term, "An alternative to the Rockefeller proposal."

FACTS ABOUT THE ROCKEFELLER SUBSCRIPTIONS AND INFLUENCE.

Although Mr. Rockefeller and the Rockefeller Foundation have been among the liberal contributors to the support of the bureau, the total of all the contributions from both sources has amounted to only about 10 per cent of the funds expended. (See "List of contributors," Exhibit I.)

During 1907 Mr. Allen sought to obtain large financial support from the Sage Foundation and the Carnegie Institution, as well as from Mr. Rockefeller.

In May, 1908, Mr. Allen wrote to Mr. Rockefeller, emphasizing the need for a permanent endowment. In November, 1908, Mr. Allen again sought to enlist Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Carnegie in obtaining large support for the bureau.

From 1910 to 1914 Mr. Allen frequently urged Mr. Rockefeller and his associates to contribute to the bureau.

In 1913 Mr. Allen obtained from the Rockefeller Foundation, on his urgent solicitation, $30,000 for a special investigation to be controlled by him, although at that time Mr. Rockefeller's subscription to the general fund of the bureau was only $2,000.

As late as December, 1913, he stated that he still hoped to get from Mr. Rockefeller an endowment, and cited the fact that he had obtained a special fund of $30,000 a year before as the reason to hope for such a result.

The only contributions to the bureau by Mr. Rockefeller or the Rockefeller Foundation with restrictions attached were obtained by Mr. Allen, and the only difference between the subscription which Mr. Rockefeller made in 1914 (the subject of Mr. Allen's hostile criticism) and the $30,000 subscription of 1913, above mentioned, is that the subscription of 1914 was to the general fund, without restrictions, whereas the 1913 subscription was to a special fund.

The fact that Mr. Allen sought and frequently obtained special funds from Mr. Rockefeller and others, instead of giving his thought and attention to obtaining general funds, the use of which would be for the free determination of the board, was one of the subjects of serious complaint against Mr. Allen by his codirectors.

During the entire period of eight years Mr. Allen was the only one who had any considerable contact with Mr. Rockefeller or his associates in asking for financial support.

During this period Mr. Allen also made various overtures to try to get Mr. Rockefeller to interest himself personally in the management and affairs of the bureau.

In 1909 Mr. Allen proposed Mr. Rockefeller as a trustee and obtained the consent of the board to write a letter to Mr. Rockefeller, urging him to become a trustee, which Mr. Rockefeller refused to do.

It was not until May, 1914, after Mr. Bruère had left the bureau and after questions had formally been raised before the board bringing into issue questions of policy concerning the management on which the trustees could not agree and when, with the resignation of his codirector before the board, there was a disposition shown not to accept it, Mr. Allen made it known that he thought that Mr. Rockefeller was exercising undue influence or that he objected in any manner to Mr. Rockefeller's contributions.

A conference between Mr. Cutting, Mr. Morawetz, and Mr. Rockefeller took place on April 10, in response to a request of Mr. Cutting made several months before, urging Mr. Rockefeller to take up the question of another five-year subscription, the last year of the previous one being about to expire.

Upon the conclusion of this conference, Mr. Cutting immediately reported the conversation to the directors and stated that Mr. Rockefeller had raised question about the publicity and about the policy of the board, but that he had been told that every question he had raised had for some months been before the board, further that Mr. Rockefeller had requested information about certain details of bureau practices, and that he had suggested that he get his information from one of the directors.

On the following day (Apr. 11), at Mr. Rockefeller's request, Mr. Cleveland lunched with him to talk over the bureau's methods and work. At the conclusion of this conference a written memorandum was made and submitted to Mr. Allen, setting forth what questions had been raised and what had been the attitude of Mr. Rockefeller, this being the first conference that Mr. Cleveland had ever had with Mr. Rockefeller about bureau work or bureau affairs.

April 22 Mr. Allen wrote to Mr. Cutting, from Madison, a letter, an excerpt from which follows:

TESTIMONY OF MR. ROBERT W. HEBBARD.

Chairman WALSH. Your name, please.

Mr. HEBBARD. Robert W. Hebbard.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. HEBBARD. I reside in Albany.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. HEBBARD. I am secretary of the State board of charities.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you held that position?

Mr. HEBBARD. I have held the position altogether about 16 years, and 4 years was commissioner of public charities in the city of New York ad interim.

Chairman WALSH. Was it immediately prior to your service at Albany, Mr. Hebbard?

Mr. HEBBARD. No; it was after I had served a number of years at Albany; after I had served 10 years at Albany.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a member of the American Social Hygiene Association?

Mr. HEBBARD. I am a member of the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. We have been directing a part of our investigation to any possible influence that may have been exercised upon any of these organizations by the donors of money to the same, and Mr. Manly advises me to say to you, please, that we are limited in time, and if you have any such in your knowledge kindly give it to the commission in your own way.

Mr. HEBBARD. The American Social Hygiene Association is an amalgamation of the American Association for Sex Hygiene and the American Vigilance Association. Dr. Morrow started the American Association for Sex Hygiene, which went into this amalgamation something like a year and a half ago, as near as I can remember. The agreement was that 14 members of the board of directors of the sex hygiene association and 7 members of the vigilance association should form the board of directors of the new organization, the intention being to have the federation policies control the work very largely. Dr. Elliot was elected president. Very shortly after that he appointed an executive committee, which virtually has charge of the work. That executive committee was, however, not truly representative of that agreement. It contained on its membership Mr. Reynolds, Dr. Snow, Mr. Greene, Mr. James—Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Greene, and Mr. James being connected very directly with the Rockefeller interests.

Chairman WALSH. Jerome D. Greene?

Mr. HEBBARD. Yes—and Miss Dodge, myself, and a Dr. Keyes. Very presently after that Dr. Elliot appointed Mr. Reynolds and Dr. Snow—or about that time—to pay positions in the service of the association, Mr. Reynolds as counsel and Mr. Snow as secretary, Mr. Reynolds being paid $9,000 and Dr. Snow $8,000 a year. This was contrary to the membership corporations law of this State, which forbids any such appointment unless the by-laws of the organization so provide, or unless the board of directors by a two-thirds vote so provides. I pointed this out in a letter to Dr. Elliot and also pointed out the fact that the executive committee was not truly representative of the board of directors, upon which I became immensely popular with the organization.

This matter ran on in this way for about a year until finally I notified Dr. Elliot that unless the matter was properly settled it would have to be taken to court. That as secretary of the State board of charities of this State I had a great deal to do with the management or supervision of the management of membership corporations, and that I was placed in the very embarrassing position in continuing to be a member of a board of directors of an organization which itself was violating the specific provision of law, and as a result of that, within about a month a meeting of the board of directors was called and the payment was legalized.

Now, I presume that Mr. Manly wishes me to testify with relation to certain action taken by Mr. Greene.

The federation for sex hygiene had always had the union label on its paper. But at about the first meeting of the executive committee Mr. Greene very strongly objected to the union label continuing on the paper. It was explained to him that we desired to secure the cooperation of labor people generally in this work of sex hygiene, and that in order to do that it had been deemed necessary to have the union label appear on the paper. He finally compromised by agreeing to allow it to appear on the paper that was used for correspondence with the labor unions.

The net result of this amalgamation and action is that the funds of this organization have been practically used up. There was a guarantee fund for three years that amounted to about $100,000. The funds are now practically gone. The organization is absolutely in the control of Mr. Rockefeller's lieutenant, and the board has its hand out to Mr. Rockefeller for money to keep the organization going.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly make a written statement, Mr. Hebbard, of anything in addition now that you have in mind that will have a bearing upon the same subject, so that I may ask but one or two other questions? Do you understand that at the insistence of Mr. Greene this whole board adopted this policy of sending out letterheads only to the unions with the union label on, so that they might expect their cooperation?

Mr. HEBBARD. That was a concession granted by Mr. Greene, I should say.

Chairman WALSH. And that was the policy adopted thereafter—they sent out letterheads that went to the unions particularly with the union label on, so that they might get their support, and all others they sent out without the union label?

Mr. HEBBARD. That, as I say, was the policy adopted. I am very doubtful whether any paper has since been printed with the union label on it. I have not seen any myself.

Chairman WALSH. If it were so done, Commissioner O'Connell would want to know what percentage of your general printing would have the union label?

Mr. HEBBARD. I could not say.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Greene say what he objected to in the union label being on the stationery?

Mr. HEBBARD. He said it was undemocratic.

Chairman WALSH. Ladies and gentlemen, we must have perfect order.

That is all, thank you. You may be excused.

TESTIMONY OF DR. WILLIAM H. ALLEN—Recalled.

Chairman WALSH. Your name?

Dr. ALLEN. W. H. Allen.

Chairman WALSH. And you have already testified that you were formerly a director of the board of municipal research?

Dr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, were you present when Mr. Cleveland testified here this morning, Doctor?

Dr. ALLEN. I was not present.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask you, if you will, because we are hurried for time, not to refer to any personalities of any kind, but from your experience state what fundamental suggestions you have with reference to these foundations, from your inside experience and your observation as an investigator from the outside, and your reasons therefor, it being the understanding that we adjourn very close to 1 o'clock.

Dr. ALLEN. We have had sent to us a vast amount of material from the various foundations, and we have had written answers to a thousand or perhaps several thousand questions. It has been possible from original data that have come in to see the inside workings of some of the present foundations as has never been seen by me before even though I have been studying these matters for some time.

I have put together and just had placed on the desks of the commissioners some suggestions which I had thought in order for this particular question to make to the board this morning.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would read that aloud into the record, and make your comments upon the same as you go along.

Dr. ALLEN (reading):

"1. That all philanthropic agencies engaged in interstate philanthropy or investigation be required to secure a national charter and be made subject to inspection and supervision by the National Government.

"2. That no charter be granted to fewer than seven incorporators, and that the number of members be not reducible below a minimum of seven.

"3. That changes in the number of trustees above the minimum of seven be made only after advance notices of intention to change to the proper Government office and to the public."

One reason for that was that the last two members of the Rockefeller Foundation, President Elliot and Mr. Hepburn, had been added, without compliance with the laws of the State of New York, and by an informal decision, without, as Mr. Greene stated in their testimony, formal consideration or any formal procedure. If nine may be increased by two, nine may be decreased by two or four or six by the same process.

Chairman WALSH. So that would leave a board, if thought proper, to consist of three?

Dr. ALLEN. Easily. [Reading:]

"4. That the chairman of every such corporation require that the corporation work on the budget plan; that modern business principles of organization and procedure be followed.

"5. That the corporation budget may be voted by not fewer than the minimum number of incorporators.

"6. That annual reports be required not only of cash in and cash out, but of work done and not done; whether income has been spent or allowed to accumulate; the returns and rates of return from each investment and from bank deposits."

For example, we have been referred to one set of securities which have suffered very great decline since they were given to one of the foundations.

Mr. WALSH. What are they?

Dr. ALLEN. Particularly the pipe-line securities of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. What pipe-line securities?

Dr. ALLEN. Well, there are several; they vary, six or seven pipe-line companies.

Chairman WALSH. All carrying pipe lines?

Dr. ALLEN. Yes, sir. After the decision by the Interstate Commerce Commission that the pipe lines were common carriers there was a very great decline, and that suggested the possibility of a great shrinkage in securities, which shrinkage, for the protection of the public and for the protection of the directors, should be made concurrently known to the public. It is also important for the public to know whether bank deposits, as mentioned here, for example, are receiving the interest rates that might be received from wise investment. [Reading:]

"Opportunities met and not met; a number of meetings, and the attendance or absence of each member at each meeting of the board and of standing committees."

These are suggestions from the annual report. [Reading:]

"The organization of the corporation, its committees, and staff for the preceding year."

For example, there is nothing in the report of the Rockefeller Foundation from 1902 to 1914 to show who the executive committee are, and to show the fact which might easily develop into a very important fact in the future.

Chairman WALSH. You mean the General Education Board?

Dr. ALLEN. The General Education Board.

Chairman WALSH. You said Rockefeller Foundation.

Dr. ALLEN (reading): "And might easily prove important" that the control of this board is with a personal staff of the donor.

"The cost of each kind of work and of each important undertaking."

That, I think, is a very important beginning. Vast sums of money are being spent for investigation of various kinds, and if a foundation tries to put out a conflagration with an atomizer it is well for the public to know just how much energy has been put into one of its studies, and that is the only way to tell whether the foundation is properly grounded. [Reading:]

"7. That the number, character, and purpose of the applications received, but not acted upon favorably, be reported and accompanied by a statement that all applications have been read and accounted for; the failure to read an account for all applications to be reason for a special examination and report by the Government."

The information which in the last 20 years has gone into Mr. Rockefeller's wastebasket without being read, and has gone into Mr. Carnegie's wastebasket without being read, if stated to the public in the United States, and if a few thousand dollars had been spent upon circulating it, would have done infinitely more than has been done by the tens of millions that have been put into the so-called benefactions and into the foundations.

This statement I have made frequently both orally and published it years ago, and have proved it, I think, by analysis of one giver's mail for one year, and proved it again by information that we are getting in our returns here.

It is absolutely impossible with its present organization for the Rockefeller Foundation with its hundreds of millions of dollars if it is getting the mail which it is stated comes to Mr. Rockefeller, it is a physical impossibility for the present organization even to read the letters, to say nothing about studying them and analyzing them. [Reading:]

"8. That interlocking directorates be prohibited whether within a group of foundations established by one donor or between independent foundations; and that where donors wish to have the same man or men on several foundations, such donors be required to act under a single charter so that the ultimate control and responsibility will be constantly advertised."

Chairman WALSH. What do you say as to the explanation that was made for having interlocking directorates, that it was difficult to get men in the country that had sufficient information, and that the persons so selected were among the few that had that information and were broad enough?

Dr. ALLEN. It dates back to the too much reading of the divine right of kings, and is absolutely without warrant in fact. No effort has been made to increase the number. Any analysis of comparative work done by the organization will show that interlocking enervates and subtracts from vision and effort to do.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed.

Dr. ALLEN (reading):

"9. That no foundation be chartered for the purpose and with the power of giving away money to any organization of individuals or to any college, civic, charitable agency, etc.; that only agencies be chartered which will direct the spending of money given away and assume responsibility for the efficiency and safety of the results, or if this proposal is too radical for immediate consideration."

It is not Mr. Carnegie who is pensioning the teachers of this country. It is the teachers of the country that are pensioning Mr. Carnegie. There is a conception of wealth stated by one man who said that "I do not own a hundred million, I owe a hundred million." And he kept on owing the hundred million so long as he is in the open, doing work, finding work for others, delivering the goods. He owns money when he sits back and retires at 40 or 50, gives 100,000,000 here and 50,000,000 there for other people to seek.

It is to enforce that, to keep men who have power to serve serving, instead of putting them in a position to withdraw all this energy from business and to affect the men, the freedom of energy that others may put into the business. I am recognizing a distinction there between a man giving away money and a man establishing a foundation. If you say to this country Mr. John D. Rockefeller's secretary does not want us to do away with the union label, there is hardly an organization in the country that has the nerve to withdraw the label, but if, however, you say the secretary of a great national organization, a great foundation, with all the $100,000,000 that it has, wants that, at once you put a stopper on which will prevent analysis and free discussion of the facts involved.

This suggestion is that we simply not in any way limit a man's freedom to give. Freedom to give in the guise of a foundation is nothing more than a personal giving, and no one should have a right to exempt his fortune, or any part of his fortune, from taxation, because he calls it a foundation instead of personal. [Reading:]

"10. That for the same reason employment agencies are prohibited from running lodging houses and mine operators from controlling railroads, no agency be chartered for the double purpose of giving away money to colleges, civic agencies, etc., and at the same time for investigating this prohibition not to include agencies which have made special appeal for gifts of money."

There is no time this morning to go into facts in connection with this, but it will develop from the statistics given of the work of the great foundations, and which are current throughout the country, which scientific men and students and workers know are absolutely untrue, but they are afraid to say they are untrue, because they all want some of that money. [Reading:]

"11. That all national charters include provision for public examination of records, subject to reasonable restriction, such as control citizen inspection of governmental records."

The Rockefeller Foundation sent us a list of its contributions, but there is one contribution which has been listed that does not appear in the present investigation or included in the gifts sent to this commission. It is an omission, but it may not be an unimportant omission; but if we had time there are other reasons that might be given for the necessity of auditing and making it possible for closer supervision in order to see that these statements are correct. [Reading:]

"12. That in order to insure periodic comparison of work done by foundations with opportunities for service which have been presented to them, and in order to keep the burden of proof upon the foundations rather than upon an unorganized, unwatchful, and generally uninformed public sentiment, the life of a charter be limited to 20 years (suggested by Julius Rosenwald), renewable by the same process as originally granted it."

It makes all the difference in the world upon whom the proof is put. It is not to the interest of a foundation to ask for the withdrawal or appeal or amendment of its charter. Put it the other way around and say that the foundation must come back to the public and find out whether or not it should be continued, and it seems to me that the suggestion for periodic analysis would be a good thing. [Reading:]

"13. That the distribution of endowment funds or other funds not intended for current distribution be made only after notice has been given to the Government or public officers as to the intent to distribute, and as to the particular proposals for distribution."

In these charters we find it is left with the members of the foundation to decide as to the distribution of the funds, and if to-morrow the Rockefeller Foundation wanted to give away $100,000,000 that would be its own business, and they could do that before the public would know anything about it. [Reading:]

"14. That any findings of fact regarding public or private agencies or officers be submitted to such agencies or officers for confirmation or modification according to the truth before being finally incorporated in a report for the public or for the governing board of the corporation."

It is a pretty serious thing for a public official, say, out in Washington or Wyoming to find that a New York City newspaper and other papers all over the country have published unchallenged remarks in the annual report of a great foundation which he has never had a chance to protect himself against. [Reading:]

"15. That the fact base of all generalizations and proposals made with regard to the fields involved in such proposals be clearly stated, together with the proposals, namely, how many men were seen; how many records were examined; how long the investigation took; what conferences were held," etc.

"16. That each national charter require that all facts regarding matters to come before trustees at board meetings or before committees authorized by the board be submitted to trustees or committees at least 10 days in advance of meetings, and that all reports of action taken by committees be reported to trustees not on such committees immediately after such action is taken, and that consideration of any matters which have not been so reported to the trustees in advance be prohibited except for emergency reasons to be spread upon the minutes of the board.

"17. That membership by officials or employees of National, State, or city governments or bodies upon the boards of foundations be prohibited on penalty of forfeiting the foundation charter, and that when trustees are elected to public office they resign their trusteeship."

You can draw a map of the United States, and there are scores of men that can not say out loud a thing about the general actions of foundations or their relations to his particular State or section, because they are members of big national foundations, college presidents here and there, etc. [Reading:]

"18. That charters specifically prohibit foundations or officers speaking for foundations from recommending or urging the appointment of individuals to public or private officer, such as membership on boards of education, presidents of colleges and universities, professorships, and further require that all recommendations by officers in their individual capacities with respect to fields within the foundation's scope be reported to the trustees in writing and made a permanent record."

The secretary of the General Education Board told two of us for this commission that he has kept trying for the last 13 years to prevent people putting him in the position where he must make decisions for them with regard to prospective employees. Four heads of four great national foundations, in position to give or withhold money from local organizations in this city—in position, through interlocking directorates, to determine progress or retrogress by use of money all over the United States, and particularly in this city—sent to the mayor of the city of New York, and got other men to send, a protest against re-appointing to the board of education its president. It makes no difference who the man was; I am not interested in the man; he may have been the right man or the wrong man; but the point is that those men never saw him; they could not pick him out in this room, and they had not studied his work, and they were men who could not pass a mark of 13 per cent on the big questions involved in what they were protesting against. Now, if that can be done in New York City, it can be done in Madison or in San Francisco, and whether they do it by the form of signatures or letters, it is but a detail, and if you ask them why they do it, they will say that they are exercising their rights as free American citizens. I am suggesting that when that right is exercised, and the foundation's name or the name of the general board is used to give momentum to that statement, the facts should be made of record, so that when the report comes in and is examined it will be found that the trustees or the executive officers have been negotiating their prestige in the community to that extent. [Reading:]

"19. That charters be refused where a majority of incorporators are of the personal staff of the donor or are responsible to the same men or institution; and that charters be withdrawn when a majority of a foundation's members or executive committee become of a donor's personal staff or of a single organization."

The General Education Board started with one member of the donor's staff on its executive committee. To-day the majority are on the executive committee. Two others are salaried officers, and the last is so intimately personally connected that practically the full control is in the personal paid staff; it happened in this case to be one donor. It was stated here the other day that men who had been chosen to fill the places of the great men who were acting without salary were men of similar kind. They are not. They are paid secretaries and officers who are in the donor's personal staff. For the same reason the Rockefeller Institute—the powers were originally given to the technical men who are honest and supposed to stand for it, but they have been delegated back by the process known as "Indian giving"; they have been delegated back to the trustees in the personal staff of Mr. Rockefeller. As the letter reads, "the powers that usually go with the directors of such a corporation," and it is to prevent that happening, after the donor has gone, and to prevent the control under any one executive management that I suggest this nineteenth proposition. [Reading:]

"20. That an outside vote upon persons proposed for membership be provided, but that this vote be by representatives of the public or by persons chosen by public officers, and not by specific officers of private agencies, such as those named in that bill.

"21. That, in view of the European war, this investigation be continued to include a thorough investigation and report as to the use made by the Carnegie Peace Fund of its funds and opportunity between the time of its founding and the outbreak of the European war."

And, finally:

"22. That such recommendations regarding foundations as are finally adopted by the Commission on Industrial Relations be specially placed before the following officers of every State—governor, executive officer responsible for supervision of charitable agencies, executive officer responsible for supervision of education, and attorney general."

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps you had better go ahead; I have some other questions to ask, but you had better go ahead now and make what further statement you desire to make.

Dr. ALLEN. The interlocking of directors and donors has been pointed out. The interlocking of directed and donees needs to be pointed out, because it is more important. No sooner does one of the great foundations turn toward or against a man or an institution than veritable hordes of people or institutions needing money or favor also turn. Newspapers turn. Subordinates turn. And the response is quicker, too, in the field of philanthropy and education than ever it was in the field of business, because dependence is more communicative than avarice.

If the Rockefeller Foundation were to invite Mr. Lawson, of the United Mine Workers, to serve on its board, trade-unionism would be introduced in the course in ethics, physiology and biology, and economics in 300 colleges almost overnight and preached from 10,000 pulpits.

Interlocking loyalty of this endless-chain kind is at work, and will always be at work in spite of the best safeguards that can be devised, until chartered foundations are forbidden to give away money. I give two illustrations of such interlocking loyalty, one of family interlocking and the other of foundation interlocking. The family tangle is as follows:

A distinguished investigator is made head of the Rockefeller Institution for Medical Research; his brother goes to the Carnegie Foundation and makes a study of medical education, which maiden effort is thought by the Nation, including most medical men, to have been done by his much advertised and much deserving Rockefeller brothers; a sister works for a local agency, the public education association; the younger brother helps this board and goes on this board. The flocking of birds of a feather and the family connection puts them on a Rockefeller pay roll; added reason for helping the local society, added cohesion of Carnegie and Rockefeller boards. The result is that without leaving the family it has already become impossible practically for Bryn Mawr, or the New York School of Philanthropy, or for men intimately connected with the Rockefeller Institute to question, criticize, or frankly discuss part of the work of the Rockefeller Foundation, which is done by one of the two salaried investigators, but it is equally impossible for them to discuss frankly and openly any other Rockefeller activity.

The foundation tangle is illustrated by four pages of the December number of the Educational Review. I call your attention to the following: First, to an advertisement on the back cover. Second, to an earnestly recommended course of reading in the fundamental principles of American government, on the inside of the back cover, and to an editorial note. This editorial note is on page 538.

This journal is nominally an organ of Columbia University, a largely endowed institution, whose annual tax exemption is many times as much as would be required to conduct an organ of complete independence for telling the truth about the program and work of great foundations, with enough money left over for currently publishing fundamental principles of American government and fundamental principles not yet formally expressed by government.

The editor is the president of Columbia University, who has a list of advisory editors not named in this issue. Its clientele is described on the back cover advertisement as follows: "Every prominent student of education, both in the United States and in Europe; representative students of education, catholic in sympathy; the broadest and most able of American periodicals devoted to education."

To this influential body, which is said to contain not only part but all the cream of educational leadership, and to their classes of teachers and students, the following list of seven books is "earnestly recommended to those who wish to understand the full significance of the grave changes that are constantly being proposed in American social and political life, the effect of which, if entered upon, will be to convert a representative republic into a socialistic democracy." The words beginning with "earnestly recommended" are quoted by me. The list is as follows:

President Butler, of Columbia University, "True and False Democracy," and "Why Should We Change Our Form of Government?"

Grover Cleveland, "Presidential Problems," that cover, inter alia, "The independence of the Executive, the duty of the Government in the Chicago strike in 1894, etc."

President Lowell, of Harvard, "Public Opinion and Popular Government."

E. P. Oberholtzer, "The Referendum in America."

Senator Root, "Experiments in Government and the Essentials of the Constitution, with Clear Exposition of the Folly of Tampering with Them."

Ex-President Taft, "Popular Government: Its Essence, Its Permanence, and Its Peril."

Of six authors, one is dead; four of the remaining five are on Carnegie Foundations; two of them are heads of Carnegie Foundations. The editor of the magazine, and author of two of the seven books recommended, is also head of the Carnegie Peace Fund, of which Mr. Root is also a member.

A mere glance at this announcement shows that on the basis of the philosophy here earnestly recommended and on the motives which prompted that selection of works on the fundamental principles of American government there can be no peace that is worth having. The point of view can not adequately direct a peace fund, for it has not human reasons enough for peace to see the opportunities of a peace fund.

In this one picture we have the foundation tangle, Carnegie Foundation, Carnegie Corporation, Carnegie Peace Fund, Columbia University, and Educational Review. Every prominent student of education in the United States and in Europe and the endless chain of contact between people who have money to give or withhold and people who can not render the public service they want to render without money.

I hope that this commission will ascertain whether foundation money or money given by persons within or responsible for great foundations is being spent to publish and circulate this course of reading, calculated to postpone international and within-national peace.

Again, the editorial note on page 538 illustrates not only the foundation tangle, but illustrates a journalistic and foundation prostitution which is more injurious to mankind than the prostitution upon which Mr. Rockefeller's bureau of social hygiene has been working four years.

This first note has to do with the very core of the questions which have been before your commission the past three weeks. [Reading:]

"Certain educators, not named but known by name to the readers of this magazine, are referred to as educational 'sappers and miners' and as 'third-rate men,' whose school surveys have for the most part 'been dismal and costly failures.'"

These sappers, miners, and third raters are contrasted with the notably helpful and constructive educational inquiries and surveys "recently completed in and for the State of Vermont."

These jibes, which would be libelous if names had been mentioned, are particularly directed against a group of educators who conducted the New York school inquiry and who are here contrasted with the great superintendent who, as stated on the next page, "has always had clearly in mind the interests of the children and the schools that are provided for their training."

This editorial note does not say that the editor of the magazine, who is the presumptive author of the editorial, is also member of the commission whose Vermont report he commends and of the foundation, which at the commission's request, made the investigation and the report; nor did he say that the superintendent mentioned is also editor of this journal, but frequently affects its unsigned position, but was indorsed for the presidency of the college of the City of New York by the Carnegie Foundation president; nor that the editor of the magazine knows that the city's superintendent opposed the New York school inquiry and has opposed one advance after another for 20 years; nor that both the editor of the magazine and president of the Carnegie Foundation know that it would be hard to choose a less equipped man for the city college. But interlocking loyalty must praise or blame according to "follow the leader."

I can say, and I can say with a smile in my heart, that if I live 100 years, I am going to have to pay, in social connections in personal connections, and in professional connections for talking even as I am talking here to the officers of this commission, but I can not let these things go unchallenged.

But they speak of all these sums including millions and millions yet to be contributed, perhaps as the results of the efforts of the General Education Board. In the totals for the period ending June 30 are included for farm demonstration, and so forth, totaling $140,000, nearly one-fourth of all they have given in the 13 years which was to be spent during the current year, and which fact was not reported in the public statement. Even for spending a considerable portion of this sum no plans have as yet been made.

Although the board's part in several of the activities was not that of initiator or responsible agent, the headlines for the publicity items, which means headlines suggested to editors, read like these: "The Boys' Corn Club movement," "The Girls' Canning Club movement," "Educating the negro," "Farm demonstrations," "$117,000,000 dedicated to education," and so forth. I have these heads put on just to show us the nature of the heads. Mr. Ivy Lee testified he prepared the headlines on publicity. These are suggested headlines for editors all over the country, and they do not speak of Mr. Rockefeller's "part with reference to" the Girls' Canning Club, or the Boys' Corn Club, or the $117,000,000 dedicated to education, although by far the greater part of that was given by other people. But the report itself reads, on page 17, that "The board has initiated several distinct, though related, lines of activity which will be described in this volume." Not one of the activities described was initiated by the board.

Whether it was intended to misrepresent is less important than the fact that these headings which mischaracterized the General Education Board's contribution did lead to misrepresentation.

Although the board was established before Mr. Rockefeller gave it any money, and, so far as the records show, without Mr. Rockefeller knowing anything about it; although his first gift was made several weeks after it started and was then only $10,000,000; and although the expression "Founded by J. D. Rockefeller" does not appear in the charter or the constitution or the correspondence, it does appear in the preliminary announcement of the recent reports in several of the newspaper items prepared by a member of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff, not on the General Education Board, and in the first sentence of the book.

Chairman WALSH. What is this book?

Dr. ALLEN. This is the General Education Board's report for 1912-1914. There was not a time in the three years that they spoke of that board as being founded by Mr. Rockefeller. He made it perfectly clear that he was one of the several that wanted to come in and help that proposition.

Extensive misrepresentation appears in the chapter on farm demonstrations. Perhaps the most important is the misstatement on page 25 that the Federal Government held in 1906 when the General Education Board began to finance farm demonstrations "that Government funds could be spent only for interstate purposes," and that "the Government appropriation was not available for strictly educational uses." Though they say here, and repeat it over and over again, that education could not legally have been done by the Government, officers of the Department of Agriculture assure us by letter and by quoting acts and by referring to work done, that that was not the understanding at the time and never had been the fact.

Against the background of present-day comprehension of school problems and school needs the following statements in the report are shown by examination of original records to be not merely exaggerated, but patently contrary to facts, e. g., that the board started in 1902 to secure a thorough knowledge of conditions in the Southern States; that the surveys dealt fully with high-school conditions in the several Southern States; that the surveys dealt fully with the condition of negro schools in the Southern States, public and private.

Failure to make adequate annual reports for 13 years is excused by the statement in the introductory note to explain the board's failure to make detailed reports between 1902 and 1915; for example, "Because, as the board's work was felt to be experimental in character, premature statements respecting the scope and outcome of its efforts were to be avoided." Now there is not a thing reported there to-day which would have been premature to report in 1903, because the Government was reporting it. To me it is a tremendously significant thing that that book, prepared by the officers, should go out to the world as a lasting and much-thought-over product of the distinguished men now on the board of directors of the General Education Board with deficiencies that even a casual analysis show to be serious. Later admissions have come to the commission that with respect to this and that important feature of the report, publicity would not have been premature. Obviously, the two statements can not be true—that the early studies were thorough and dealt fully with conditions and that publication of results would have been premature. Yet the trustees of the board passed resolutions at their annual meetings in January, 1915, commending the report as being excellent and a great contribution to education, after which, of course, no helpful criticism may be expected from the trustees themselves.

Although in many respects this document is as vicious in its ex parte statements and its special pleading as anything Ivy Lee wrote regarding the Colorado strike, there are not a handful of educators in the United States who can afford to criticize it as frankly as they would have criticized it had it been given to the world by its author as Abraham Flexner, Louisville, Ky., one of the officers of the board.

Now the question comes up of pressure brought to bear to control sentiment. That is the book [handing a large cloth-bound volume to the commission].

Of a thousand men not two would guess from that book, after reading all the assurances, that they ever made it a condition anywhere that before the money was used they should see the man and approve the man. I want to read just two or three of the conditions that have been imposed. To President Alderman, of the University of Virginia, a letter was written May 1, 1905, stating that the General Education Board had appropriated $3,000 for a professor of secondary education. They have furnished money for professors of secondary education to promote high-school work throughout the Southern States. They have conferences here sometimes in the offices of the General Education Board. The secretary stated that he generally saw the man before he was appointed. Now this is from the letter [reading]:

"The only additional condition made by our committee was that before the formal appointment of this member of the faculty you should confer with me regarding the man."

Last year and the year before funds were voted to Maine and New Hampshire to enlist the cooperation of State colleges, "it being understood that the agents to be employed and the work to be done shall first be approved by the secretary of this board."

Chairman WALSH. Of what board?

Dr. ALLEN. General Education Board. I am speaking only of the General Education Board. These are records which they have furnished us in answer to our questions. There are many of them. Personally I am not raising these questions because I have any question as to the excellence of the men or the method; but I am raising a question of whether any number of millions should be chartered by enactment with the power and duty of giving money on condition that a central private office anywhere in the world shall see the man first and shall approve the work first.

The Rockefeller Foundation's conditional offer to the bureau of municipal research: That John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and Mr. Murphy, both of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff and of the executive committee of the Rockefeller Foundation and the General Education Board, offered $10,000 a year to the bureau of municipal research on condition that it change the method and purpose of spending $100,000 a year, has been testified to by the chairman of the bureau.

That the bureau would have been given no money if its conduct had not met certain conditions, as stated by Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Murphy, has been testified by the chairman of the bureau, Mr. R. Fulton Cutting.

That since the conditional offer was made no less than $110,000 has been given or pledged to the New York Bureau of Municipal Research, has been testified to by the Rockefeller Foundation.

Regarding the desire and willingness of the Rockefeller Foundation to impose conditions, both the foundation and the bureau of municipal research are in agreement.

The only open question, and a far less important question, is whether in this particular instance the bureau, which later received $110,000 in gifts and pledges, was influenced in its conduct by a conditional offer.

The original conditions, as stated to the two directors by Mr. Cutting immediately after his return from luncheon with Mr. Rockefeller, were these:

Stop out-of-town work.

Stop the postal-card bulletins.

Divorce the training school, founded by Mrs. E. H. Harriman, from the bureau, not only in organization, but physically, so that they would be in different offices, and, if possible, in different buildings.

Stop its New York school work. That was testified to by Mr. Cutting as to that part of the school work; and with one exception the only part of the school work that ever related to anything but administration, and in that particular instance the story about it appeared as a full-page story in the New York Press, the Sunday edition, illuminated by the nearly quarter-page photograph of one of my codirectors, who not only assumed full responsibility for the way we did the work I had supervised, but assumed full credit for all that had been done.

In exchange for these assets of the bureau, Mr. Rockefeller offered $10,000 a year for five years, and help in raising a total of $100,000 a year. This offer was later increased to $20,000 a year for five years. The record shows that within seven months he had actually given or pledged a total of $110,000 for 1914 to 1918. When Mr. Cutting came to my office at the bureau to report this offer he began by saying, "They are most amazing people, most amazing, and if it were not for the money I wouldn't have sat in the room and listened to them."

In May Mr. Cutting stated, first to me personally and later to the board, as he testified last week to this commission, that the bureau was sadly in need of funds, and that Mr. Rockefeller's offer was the last hope of continued support. And he stated, in detail in conversation with me before the meeting and later to the board, that a certain large contributor, not Mr. Rockefeller, was very much provoked at him, personally, and at the city chamberlain, and would not give any more money to the bureau directly, but could not refuse if Mr. Rockefeller used his influence, or, as he said to me, "Mr. Rockefeller, with the force of Standard Oil behind him, will compel him to give."

The principal conditions were sent in writing to each trustee by me, as secretary of the bureau's board. Notwithstanding Mr. Cutting's testimony, this commission has requested the letter from the bureau. Mrs. E. H. Harriman was a member of our board and had raised money for the training school. Mrs. Harriman asked me to see her. With my letter in her hand she began the conversation:

"Mr. Allen, I am going to keep this letter as long as I live. Nothing has ever made me realize as does this what a grasp money has on this country. Who is this man and what has he ever done to justify his telling the bureau of municipal research what we may or may not do with respect to our program."

Commissioner Commons. This was Mr. Rockefeller that is here referred to in the letter?

Dr. ALLEN. "What has he ever done for New York that makes him the proper judge of our work, and what is his paltry $10,000 toward our program?"

I was advised not to remain for the board meeting two days later, at which the subject was to be, should have been, but was not, the principal subject for consideration. Mrs. Harriman urged me to return at once to the University of Wisconsin survey, "without recognizing the Rockefeller offer even by so much as going out of my way five minutes."

In regard to this, and as a confidential matter, I immediately called up my two colleagues, Mr. Bruère, who used to be a colleague, and Mr. Cleveland, and said I had had this meeting with Mrs. Harriman. I think I used an expression like this, that if we would hold our horses and not be stampeded we could make it possible to go on with the program that had been so close to us for years without having to accept any man's conditions as to what we should do.

The occasion of the Rockefeller offer seems to me to be of great significance.

The invitation to lunch came to Mr. Cutting from Mr. Rockefeller while the trustees of the bureau of municipal research were in Mr. Cutting's office reading aloud an answer to this report made upon the bureau's educational activities by an officer of the General Education Board who was acting in this instance for Mr. Rockefeller personally. The telephone message came to Mr. Morawetz, who, as this commission has declared and has been testified to before this commission, was at that time a member of one of the Rockefeller committees. Mr. Cutting testified that he had not known in April of his connection of Mr. Morawetz, and he does not yet know whether any other trustees of ours knew that at that time Mr. Morawetz was not on our side asking for money, but was also on the other side advising Mr. Rockefeller privately about our program.

The report in question by Abraham Flexner was believed by Mr. Cutting to be superficial, unsound, as he stated the other day, to be unfair, and prejudiced. Yet the purpose of the lunch was not to talk about the injustice which had been done to the bureau by Mr. Rockefeller's agent. Instead, Mr. Rockefeller played safe and offered money to two multimillionaires who were fresh from preparing, as trustees, a document which proved the ruthless disregard of true and fair and scientific methods by Mr. Rockefeller's agent.

Had the same kind of attack been printed by Tammany Hall, Mr. Cutting would have been willing to spend thousands of dollars in getting the truth before the public. Had it come from Mr. Rockefeller with assurance of no further financial aid, Mr. Cutting would have felt that his reputation and the bureau's reputation required a fight to the finish until the facts were established.

There is just enough truth in Mr. Cutting's testimony that the bureau's opinion was crystallized, and not influenced by the Rockefeller offer to explain how honest men with careless memories could persuade themselves that they were not being unduly influenced by money and power.

The true part of the statement is that the bureau had for a long time considered financing its local work and out-of-town work separately. I had months before, as recorded in our minutes, secured the promise of a bank to loan money on contracts received for out-of-town work. The rest of the statement is absolutely not true. No one had dreamed of giving up our publicity for any other reason except inability to secure funds for it. Nothing was more of a surprise than the proposal to separate or divorce the training school from the bureau. It is not true that there was any intention to discontinue the bureau's work in connection with the New York schools. On the contrary, we were "out of the woods," so to speak, and had a free field for cooperation with schools such as no agency had ever had before.

Mrs. Harriman had just given $5,000 for it. We had asked for it, and she had given it. We had acknowledged our responsibility and opportunity in the school field as we never had before. There is no absence of records in minutes and publications about our work in connection with schools. Here is a document, Six Years' Municipal Research, referred to the other day, stating what we have done. Mr. Cutting testified that we had not used money, and the board had not in any way authorized school work. But, as this report shows, there was $11,000 given into this school work, not including Mrs. Harriman's $5,000 and other items. There is a list of publications regarding schools and curiously enough, I think, it is a rather interesting fact.

Chairman WALSH. What document is that, please?

Dr. ALLEN. This is "Six Years of Municipal Research for Greater New York."

Chairman WALSH. What date?

Dr. ALLEN. 1911.

Chairman WALSH. By whom?

Dr. ALLEN. The bureau trustees; signed by all of the trustees, officers, and read by them before signing. And, by the way, particularly and very carefully and very happily read by the trustee who has been mentioned to you as having withdrawn because of publicity this year, which publicity again was under the joint direction of the other director and myself.

Commissioner COMMONS. You mean Mr. Cleveland?

Dr. ALLEN. It was Mr. Cleveland at that time; it was only Dr. Cleveland and myself.

I want to call your attention to the first two lines of this document, "no comment has ever been made by the bureau that did not relate to some specific act or record." Here [indicating document] is the story of how we have worked at different times to get the school inquiry and here [indicating document] are random statements from different educators about these bulletins that have been so objected to; here is one from the president of the National Education Association and division superintendent and other city superintendents.

Speaking of that publicity, may I inject this: We have been sent—the commission has—a number of clippings illustrating the objectionable publicity. Among those clippings is one where the word "civility" is underscored as being very undignified. "Civility, like charity, begins at home." Civility means civic interest. There are several of those, and this has a personal side that is at least interesting to me. Here was a movement to fully deal with in cooperation with some educational agencies and represented an extremely important principle, representing the same principle as the national university project, which is being fought by these same privately endowed large institutions; and because we were trying to put it over, because we were trying to talk so that people could understand what we are saying, we are told that this thing must be stopped, and that it is undignified and objectionable.

I want to read one of them. Here is another bulletin with regard to the police. This chart shows the complaints made to the police department that have been put back from the police commissioners. The little notches or squares show the ones that were reported, and the black marks show those which were not reported.

(A leaflet entitled "Efficient Citizenship," issued by the Bureau of Municipal Research, 261 Broadway, New York, June 16, 1913, was submitted in printed form.)

Now, I want to show something that illustrates what happens when a leader in education becomes an apologist and becomes a vassal because of conditions that have to be explained. There are several of these down there. Here is one thoroughly approved and suggested, as it happens, by Mr. Cutting, and thought to be very clever at the time of issue. It starts off, "To Hell with Reform," with a question mark over it; and inside, for the record, I would like to read a number of the headings: "Blind man's buff is over," "The dust of years," "Substituting work for soft snaps," "Out of commission." And there are others. Here is the pamphlet from which I am reading. This is a publication of the bureau.

(At this point the witness submitted a printed pamphlet entitled "Municipal Reform Through Revision of Business Methods, New York City." Published by the Bureau of Municipal Research, 261 Broadway. July, 1910.)

Now, the records show, for example, that I made the first move to secure the western trip of the mayor and school board president which has already done so much for vocational education. The only one of the Rockefeller conditions that favored any previous bureau plan was the particular proposal which Mr. Cutting testified the bureau has not even acted upon, namely, to discontinue the out-of-town work.

For the board meeting in May, to which I was asked to return, I sent from Madison, on May 4, the following advance notice to Mr. Cutting [reading]:

"I shall stop for bureau meeting at Grand Rapids May 7 and for training-school meeting at Princeton May 8, reaching New York on May 9."

The following facts I want you to know in advance as to my personal position on reorganization. I do not intend to do more than state my position and answer any question the board may wish. Whether my work entitles me to an independent position others must judge. Having it, that I should state it seems clear:

1. To restrict the bureau men to New York City and New York State will not work, I believe, with men big enough to do the New York work.

2. To assume that the national organization shall not have a direct permanent New York base will, I believe, defeat in large measure and limit its influence.

3. To deprive the national organization of a name which shows its lineage is, I believe, to injure both services.

4. For the local and State bureau to promise to avoid any field whatever, not to mention education, I personally regard as a disloyalty to the principles which originated the bureau, and as an extravagant bargain both in influence and in money.

5. To restrict the training school work in New York to bureau supervision as in the proposed reorganization is, I believe, unfair to the training school and an unjustifiable restriction of its capabilities.

6. To have the present bureau trustees select or censor the proposed trustees of a national organization is, I believe, a mismove.

7. To attribute our failure to have funds to failure of utmost or even considerable effort to get funds is, I believe, contrary to the record. In my belief no New York civic work ever received so much money with so little effort.

It was to discuss these points that I came East. To discuss them I was asked to come to Mr. Cutting's house. Most of our discussion was with regard to point 7, namely, whether I was correct in saying that poor as we were we were not poor enough to make such a poor bargain with Mr. Rockefeller, and our poverty was due not to our cause but to our method of trying to raise money. When at this meeting Mr. Cutting told me that they hoped I would head the out-of-town work as he had written me April 18, I told him that never again, so long as I lived, would I, if I knew it, take money from a man who would go back on a movement at the height of its success.

When he pleaded that Mr. Rockefeller's Standard Oil influence would force a distinguished and venerable philanthropist to give money to a cause he did not want to help I told him that our kind of work could not be done with that kind of money.

Although I had come back from the University of Wisconsin survey on purpose to discuss the Rockefeller proposals and the reorganization plans that had been crystallized by those proposals no mention of the purpose of the meeting had been made in the call sent out by Dr. Cleveland. The greater part of the time of the board meeting, however, was given to the discussion of the Rockefeller proposals. This was May 13, more than a month after the proposals were made, yet the trustees dispersed without passing any resolution not to accept the conditions.

Instead of passing resolutions they spent most of the time trying to show me why the proposals should be accepted. Mr. Cutting pleaded before the other members our inability to raise funds. Prof. E. R. Seligman, of Columbia University, had had a private talk with Mr. Cutting and took the aggressive at the meeting. He said, "Gentlemen, this is a very simple proposition. The Rockefellers have determined to eliminate the bureau," and Allen, "from the Maxwell-Churchill school fight."

At the last board meeting, when our school activity came up, Prof. Seligman had said: "Every time I have gone into this matter I have found Allen in the right." Our only part in the so-called fight had been to get and publish facts or help school officers get them.

My answer covered the ground of the statement published in October, although more bluntly. I told the trustees that the acceptance of these conditions or the withdrawal at Mr. Rockefeller's instance from even one field of public education would make me feel that my personal reputation was tarnished, that the reputation of every man who had been associated with us was tarnished, that the world would never believe one of us and would not believe in the integrity of public officers who had gone out from our group or with whom we had been intimately associated, and that such act would seriously injure every bureau of municipal research in the country, and striking at the capital character of every man who had been associated with us.

When Prof. Seligman asked why I felt so sure that I was right when the others disagreed with me, I told him that I felt sure because I was taking the position which we had always held since the bureau was organized.

I have here several things which I have not time to read which I would like to submit, in which Mr. Cutting cites his position as to the reason for the differences with the board.

When he, Prof. Seligman, asked if I would be willing, after our many years of association, to pull down the pillars of the temple, as he put it, I told him that those who wanted to accept conditions were about to pull down the pillars of the temple by destroying the temple's spirit.

Once before on the only other occasion when effort was made to throttle our independence Prof. Seligman, at a board meeting, had been the one to say, "Gentlemen, the minute we do anything or stop doing anything because of outside influence, it will be the beginning of the end of the bureau of municipal research."

But the cat got out of the bag and Mr. Cutting let it out. The directors found there had been a secret meeting between certain people and certain of our trustees. The directors went down there and said, "Gentlemen, we must have a showdown on this thing now," and they did, and the board decided to make up its mind with reference to what was right and without reference to outside influence.

Mr. Chairman, it is 10 minutes of 1—

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you just one question, please: In the written statement made by Dr. Cleveland he heads one portion of it, "Facts about the Rockefeller Foundation's subscriptions and influence," and he mentions many dates and occasions upon which you yourself requested contributions from Mr. Rockefeller. Make any comment you may have to make on that.

Dr. ALLEN. It is all true, Mr. Chairman. Anybody that knows anything about me knows that for 15 years I have been on the begging side of this foundation proposition and have even written a book about it. But there is all the difference in the world between trying to get Mr. Rockefeller to do something you think is right and helping Mr. Rockefeller do something that you know is wrong, and that is the difference that they have not seen in that document. At the time I made those propositions to Mr. Rockefeller he was an independent factor and he was not surrounded by men who put blinders on him, as has been done since the so-called foundation has started. Mr. Rockefeller and I talked about this thing. It was known here for 18 months and generally talked about that Mr. Rockefeller's secretary was going to help smash the bureau, and he called my secretary down to his office twice for this thing, and he offered her a job, and I thought she was going to take it, but she refused his offer of several hundred dollars advance, and he raised it again several hundred dollars, and then he asked her what her figure was, and if she had been a man she would have used language that would have given him an idea of her indignation. She came back thoroughly indignant. And he told her then in February that she had better come to the foundation, because it would always have lots of money, while the bureau was in danger of losing its money. In fact, he thought it had lost its money. I went over a similar threat with Mr. Rockefeller after a meeting of school superintendents down in Philadelphia about a year ago, or about two years ago it was, and a trip to the Pacific coast. By the way, Mr. Cutting told you that most of my work was school work, and the commission has asked for the distribution of time, and they have sent you a list of the out-of-town work. Now, it happens to be the out-of-town work and that was done by the training-school men that are now being patronized in their references. I went out to the Pacific coast and it was I that got the Denver survey, the Los Angeles survey, and the Portland survey. And while I was out there I had letters from superintendents and other men in the country saying there had been a conference in Philadelphia in which was planned a campaign to get the bureau's support.

Later in the summer Mr. Rockefeller asked me to come down to talk about some of this publicity, and in the conversation he said, "You are making a personal fight on Mr. Maxwell." I said, "Where?" He said, "You have said this and said this and that." I says, "Let's see." There were about 20 cards he had and there wasn't a personal reference on any one of them. And when I got through with them I said to Mr. Rockefeller, "Mr. Rockefeller, what has happened is that we have stated the facts impersonally; it has sunk home; and because these facts disclose work which you do not like you have made a personal conclusion from it."

In the course of that conversation I said to Mr. Rockefeller over and over again, "They say they are going to get our financial support," when he said, "I have never heard anything of it," and I replied, "That is natural; but your secretary has heard of it." That was in August, nearly a year before this whole thing came up.

Chairman WALSH. Prof. Commons, did you have some questions?

Commissioner COMMONS. What have been your relations with Mr. Cleveland since the bureau started?

Dr. ALLEN. They have been extremely intimate. I knew him in Chicago and in Philadelphia, and I asked him to serve on the original committee that made the report about school affairs—he made the report, the greater part of it; I did not. Mr. Cutting signed it and it is that document that is the foundation of these enmities we speak of. We were extremely intimate.

Commissioner COMMONS. When did your first disagreement arise, and on what ground?

Dr. ALLEN. The first disagreement arose—I will tell you the conclusion of it, and then I will go back if you wish. The last words of the disagreement were, "Cleveland, if a million men"—we were standing at Thirty-third Street and Broadway—"if a million men were to come to me and tell me on their honor that F. A. Cleveland was pussyfooting around with the trustees and talking and gossiping about the office business, I would have told the millionth man that it could not be true." We never had any disagreement until the whole thing was over; and he had had conversations with the trustees and all sorts of things had happened that I never heard about.

Commissioner COMMONS. What date was that?

Dr. ALLEN. Nothing that I knew was a disagreement happened until I came back from Wisconsin.

Chairman WALSH. What date?

Dr. ALLEN. Well, in the week probably somewhere between April—we had two disagreements. Well, they are a matter of record, fortunately, and I have the records here which show what they were and the issues involved; and they were after I had gone out to Wisconsin. Now, if you mean by "disagreement," if we disagreed as to method—

Commissioner COMMONS. That is what I mean—on method and policy of the bureau.

Dr. ALLEN. Well, I thought you meant personal disagreement. Now, I have very few friends I have not disagreements with as to methods; but nothing that you and I would not have, talking about the time of day or at luncheon, until this thing happened. We had exchanged memoranda in—I suppose it began in—February, 1914. The doctor disagreed about the national commission upon efficiency and economy. I felt that if it had told the public more it would have had more success. I raised the money for one public campaign to secure funds for it from Congress at the time the thing was on. I told one of our men that I believed with $10,000 a year used in telling the public what we already knew about these things, we could accomplish more in regard to national efficiency than with a quarter of a million dollars the way Dr. Cleveland's commission had been spending it on scientific municipal research. It took about five minutes for that sort of thing to get to my colleague; and before I knew it this thing was a matter of offense and had been reported to the board as a serious difference.

Commissioner COMMONS. Did Mr. Cleveland send in his resignation on account of a dispute with you?

Dr. ALLEN. Yes; as it has been introduced in evidence.

Commissioner COMMONS. Mr. Cleveland mentioned this morning. I think, it is in that published statement, Mr. Cleveland—

Dr. ALLEN. Well, he sent it, yes; but that is only a part of it. No one could have gathered—

Commissioner COMMONS. What date was that resignation?

Dr. ALLEN. I think it was in March. I hope you will ask for it, by the way, because it says some things that I think, as long as this is on the record, ought to be in.

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, it has been mentioned by Mr. Cleveland this morning. I am sorry you did not hear it; you might have made the connection—

Dr. ALLEN. I got the connection. I know it. I have got the thing here, I think.

Commissioner COMMONS. The question is what are the circumstances regarding his resignation at that time, and what was your relation to it?

Dr. ALLEN. The resignation was the result of something that he had not explained to me, and I and others in the office did not know to exist, and it was a part of this campaign that I have referred to as a private conference with board members about difficulties that I did not know existed.

Commissioner COMMONS. Were they or not personal differences or differences of policy as between you and him?

Dr. ALLEN. So far as I know, they were entirely differences of policy.

Commissioner COMMONS. And what were the policies?

Dr. ALLEN. The fundamental difference of policy had to do with the training of men in the school for public service.

Commissioner COMMONS. And what was his position on that question?

Dr. ALLEN. Well, they were several. He proposed, for example, that every man we took in should spend six months on what was called scientific research, six months as a staff member and six months in the office. My answer was that the scientific work should be done by the colleges before the man came to us; that we ought not to take a man whom we could not expect to do the scientific work. That my idea of training a man was not to go and let him get lost six months on some scientific study that nobody would supervise or know about, but to put him on the jump up against something to-day, something different this afternoon, and something different next week so that we would find out if there was a yellow streak in him, or if there was not a yellow streak so that we might find out the weak or the strong points and quickly size the man up and find whether he was the man who could do our kind of work. And with regard to the office, I told him that many of our men could get in six hours all they could get in six months from our office.

I hope you will call for the exchange of memoranda, because it does have an important bearing on the foundation question.

If Mr. Rockefeller had liked this publicity, if he had wanted the sort of things that were being done in the schools, the rest of this thing would have been entirely different.

Commissioner COMMONS. Did he disagree with you upon any other subject of policy—Mr. Cleveland I am speaking of now.

Dr. ALLEN. Yes. Will you ask the sergeant-at-arms if he can find outside somewhere—I had all that stuff right here—the Cleveland memoranda.

(Here envelope of papers handed witness. See Allen exhibit.)

There was the question of assigning men to public officials. That was one. In the original announcement of the training school we had letters from a number of men and in the original announcement that particular class of work was featured.

It was published in accordance with that idea, and we have letters from Mr. McAneny, Mr. Prendergast, Mr. Mitchel, and Mr. Fosdick, all suggesting they would like that kind of relation; and it is true that Mr. — Commissioner COMMONS (interrupting). What else? I have a memorandum from one of my colleagues asking me to shut down; but I have—

Dr. ALLEN. It is all clear on the record, and I hope you will call for it all.

Commissioner COMMONS. What was the other point of disagreement between you?

Dr. ALLEN. That is one of them.

Commissioner COMMONS. What other than training schools, publicity and what else?

Dr. ALLEN. No; publicity I was not aware of until I heard that statement yesterday, that there was a serious difference as to publicity, because at that time all the publicity was going over his desk, as did these objectionable things, and I had no—there was no indication at the office.

Commissioner COMMONS. What was the other point of difference at that time?

Dr. ALLEN. Well, I was very anxious to have staff meetings and have them frequently. We did not get those. And he promised to have them, but we did not have them.

Commissioner COMMONS. What else was there?

Dr. ALLEN. The division of labor; we asked for—he asked for a division of labor, and I was very glad to have it. I have the memorandum here showing that although we divided, the division was on the basis of my carrying most of the labor of the pressure sort, that had to do with getting things off our desk.

Commissioner COMMONS. What was the other question of difference?

Dr. ALLEN. Well, if he has testified to any, why don't you ask me if it is so? I don't know; I will answer anything—I didn't know that these personal matters would—

Commissioner COMMONS. I have not made a memorandum.

Dr. ALLEN (continuing). Would justify your commission's attention; but I am very glad to go into them if they are relevant.

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, I think the rest of it can be answered by submitting his testimony to you.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Doctor. You will be excused.

Dr. ALLEN. May I put just two things into the record?

Chairman WALSH. What are they?

Dr. ALLEN. One is a letter from Mr. Wickersham with regard to enemies; three lines: "You can not expect to turn the light in on abuses without evoking screams of protest. Sometimes a man's best credentials are furnished by the catalogue of his enemies."

The particular card that gave so great offense last year was a card in which my colleague was as much interested as I, calling attention to the fact that our reform friends, the board of estimate, had appointed as chief official examiner a specialist in the Irish drama, and that led to a member of our board protesting, and an officer announced to his staff that there would be no more publicity, and there has not been very much since.

The second thing I want to put in the record is a report that was made by the—about the General Education Board's officer acting for Mr. Rockefeller upon the educational activities of the bureau of municipal research and the bureau's answer. The essence of the report is that if it is possible—these are the two reports—that if it is possible for an organization with the methods used to circulate privately or publicly the kind of statement that is made in this report and based on a lack of evidence represented by this report, if that is possible—and our trustees agreed with us about that—and here is the answer of Mr. Cutting to the blackguarding statement as unjust and particularly cruel in reference to the men who have done wonderful work in different parts of the United States. If it is possible to do that there is almost nothing that it is not possible to do in the name of the foundation for the welfare of mankind, and I want to speak of that in the record.

Chairman WALSH. They are before the board.

(Three printed pamphlets referred to and presented by Dr. Allen at this point as exhibits are entitled, respectively, "The Educational Activities of the Bureau of Municipal Research of New York; a Report to the General Education Board," by Abraham Flexner; "Regarding the Educational Activities of the Bureau of Municipal Research and Training School for Public Service; Mr. Cutting's Reply to Mr. Flexner's Report to the General Education Board"; "Six Years of Municipal Research for Greater New York, Record for 1906-1911," published by the Bureau of Municipal Research, 261 Broadway.)

Chairman WALSH. There are witnesses here whom, on account of the lack of time, we are unable to call. And I want to say that at a later date in New York probably there will be an additional hearing, of which public announcement will be made, or the witnesses will be called at a hearing which will later be scheduled in Washington, D. C.

Also, the investigators of the commission will call upon certain of the witnesses for written statements in answer to questions. The hearing will now stand adjourned without day.

(Thereupon at 1.08 o'clock p. m., Saturday, February 6, 1915, an adjournment was had sine die.)

STATEMENT OF MR. R. M. HUNTER.

PHILADELPHIA, January 26, 1915.

CHAIRMAN INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE,

New York City.

DEAR SIR: According to the newspapers there have been some important business interests examined by your commission, but it seems to me that testimony such as is given by capitalists at large and those representing big business is always directed to finding a "cure" instead of treating of the "disease," which has ever existed between capital and labor. The differences will always exist so long as present conditions exist, even though the differences may be mitigated to some extent. When the Clayton antitrust laws were being prepared, I carefully went over the rough drafts and submitted my views in redrafts and amendments to Senator Newlands, chairman, having the preparation of these laws in hand, and I pointed out to him at that time that while the laws could be made excellent for their intended purpose, they did not hit the nail on the head. They did not reach the seat of the trouble.

I have advocated for many years that the trouble which exists, and will ever exist under the present system, lies in the fact that there is no restriction on capital engaged in interstate commerce for exorbitant, or what we may call usurious profits, while on the other hand, the working classes are dominated by their employers. No matter how high wages may be placed, the cost of living keeps increasing at a more rapid rate, and this is augmented by the natural increase in education and refinement of the working classes, who expect more of the comforts which they see surrounding the classes who are more successful in life.

After 40 years of constant association with corporations and those interested in corporations, backed by a more or less personal experience in these matters, and also by the preparation of thousands of contracts for such corporations, it is my opinion that the whole trouble lies in the unrestricted usurious profits possible by use of capital. There is no reason whatever for limiting the use of money on a mortgage to 6 per cent and making it a penal offense to charge 7 per cent, while permitting the same money to be juggled in commercial enterprises, and by credits enabled to make a return of 1,000 per cent.

The Massachusetts investigations under the insurance act seemed to show that manufacturers make at least 400 per cent on the cost of the materials entering in manufactures, whereas labor is only paid at about the rate of the cost of the materials entering into the manufacture. It would appear therefore that capitalists were obtaining three times more for the use of their money which enters into the cost of manufactured articles than they allow for the men who do the work. Corporations are undoubtedly entitled to a reasonably large return because of the risks incident to general business, but this should not be unrestricted, because a foolish loan might cause the loss of the loaned money just as well as a foolish business venture based upon an attempt to secure exorbitant profits. After a very careful investigation of different corporation floatations based upon growing businesses, it appears that if a corporation were permitted to make 25 per cent net profit on the actual capital invested without any restriction as to the cost of operation for its plant and workmen, it could grow in enormous proportions by reinvesting its surplus each year into new capital; and yet at all times there would be a constant tendency to better the situation of its workers, as it would have no object whatever in making more than its allowed net profits except for the improvement of its plant and, may be, of its employees. This plan when worked out shows that the tendency would be to increase the skill of the employee, to lower the price of manufactured goods for the public, and to constantly increase the production of goods in fair competition, all of which inures to the benefit of the workers and the public, with more than a handsome profit to the manufacturer.

As professional men, if taken collectively, can not make more than $1,000 a year per man, and as these are the educated people of the country, there should be a restriction to salaries for officers which would prevent a larger salary to a corporation doing interstate business than $2,000 per year.

A system like this would work automatically and eliminate all necessity for unions, strikes, and all the evils growing out of such matters; it would bring the workers and the managers closer together; it would increase legitimate and healthy competition, and would ever tend to lower prices; no matter how high tariffs were placed, unfair advantages against the public could not be taken thereby; and the thousand and one frauds against the public by capitalizing unvaluable alleged assets would be eliminated. We would not have to consider State institutions for the interstate business, as the big business and State concerns would have to fall in line, as they could not exist unless they did so.

Laws which would restrict interstate commerce business, whether confined solely to corporations or to individuals also, in the manner above outlined, would unquestionably solve the constant unrest of the employees and automatically improve the general conditions of the country without restricting big business even though it might prevent multimillionaires being made over night. Laws for carrying out this plan will certainly come to pass sooner or later, but naturally they will never be advocated by such men who come before you representing capital.

These thoughts, I believe, are matters which should not be lost sight of, and I submit them for your consideration.

Respectfully,

R. M. HUNTER.

STATEMENT OF MR. CHARLES BUXTON GOING.

The fundamental question before the commission, as I understand it to be submitted to me, is briefly this: Whether under the present system of corporate organization with thousands of widely scattered stockholders, and with employees who may be without any organization or representation, it is possible to provide machinery which will insure the maintenance of proper labor conditions and the equitable distribution of the products of industry.

The answer, still more briefly, is that it is possible only by the acceptance of true ideals in the philosophy of both employees and employer, and by the use of intelligent and efficient policies of administration and management.

These ideals and policies can be established only through the moral pressure of enlightened public opinion. The hope of the situation lies in the fact that this opinion is at work, and that both its power and its results are increasing visibly. We can not hope for immediate and universal success any more than we can hope for instant universal goodness, or peace, or beauty. But, in spite of many and sometimes violent upheavals that seem to surge the other way, the history of the last 20 years at least, so far as the attitude and conduct of American corporations is concerned, is one of steady spread and growth of the spirit of the fair deal and of continual striving for a better understanding of the science and art of management.

My work for the last 15 years or more has compelled me to focus attention upon these movements, and so far as this observation goes the advances in what is really a great social and economic evolution have much more than offset the losses due to the extraordinary epoch of expansion, of industrial congestion, and financial centralization through which we have been passing. Industry has had to cope with this tremendous, almost overwhelming tendency toward coalescence into larger and larger units, rolling up, to quote a familiar figure, like a snowball. The same forces are seen at work in the Nation, the State, in our political institutions, in society, in the school. Everywhere we have the same problem. For example, we may see the life-savers along our coast doing immensely valuable and very hazardous service for meager pay and discarded without pension when they are superannuated. We may see mail carriers, great and small, compelled to carry enormous added burdens of parcel post without compensation. We may see teacher mothers dismissed for "neglect of duty." Toward all these things we are in much the same relation as that in which the stockholder stands to the individual employee. But Government administration evidently does not of itself enable us to make our individual just impulses bring proper treatment to individual employees. How are we going to keep track of the individual unit, the individual life, and see that it has its place in the sun? Industry has been trying as hard, I think, as any other province of human activities to find the answer. The same answer is given everywhere—organization. But organization must be adapted in its form to the purpose desired, it must be energized by true ideals and principles, and it must be provided with the best methods and devices. It is as yet deficient in all these directions.

The significant thing, however, in American industrial development in the last quarter century has been the earnest inquiry after, and the earnest preaching and growing acceptance of, better ideals and better principles of conduct, better methods of management, and better devices for carrying them into effect. This is perhaps what Miss Tarbell meant by the "silent revolution." So far as my observation goes it has scarcely taken the form of a revolution, but decidedly it has not been silent.

There seems to have been, however, a distinct turning point early in the last decade of the nineteenth century. Just about the time when we saw on one side the keenest and in some instances the worst of activities of trust building there appeared on the other side new, or at least newly active, movements directed toward improving the condition or the circumstances of the individual worker, and especially toward preserving the individuality which the factory system first began to diminish, and the modern industrial system threatened to destroy entirely.

This movement so far as the employee is concerned showed at the outset two very definite phases.

The first was concerned with general conditions of living and working—with the provision of proper light, heat, ventilation, sanitation, very often food, and opportunities for rest and medical attention. This was known at first as "welfare work." It was not altogether altruistic in its motives. It was often frankly undertaken simply because of the belief that the worker who is well nourished and surrounded by good light, good air, and good hygienic conditions can do better work and is a more profitable asset than one who is ill-cared for; but even if selfishness had its part at the outset a better morality crept in. The standards of "reasonable working conditions" were gradually changed. Twenty-five years ago the establishment with well-equipped sanitary wash rooms, rest rooms, lunch rooms, recreational facilities, was a show place, and in the minds of old-time managers, a freak. Now the insanitary shop is on the defensive, and has no defense, even though, deplorably, we must acknowledge that it yet exists in unfortunately large numbers.

The second phase, and the one toward which my study has been chiefly directed, was the practical one of presenting methods by which the distribution and the products of industry should be altered to the advantage of the worker, and especially to the advantage of the worker who would cooperate in reducing the wastes of industry. It appeared to some of the most earnest and practical investigators of the manufacturing problem that progressive increases of wages very soon led around the circle to an increase of prices and an increase in the cost of living, so that the wage worker could buy no more with the larger pay envelope than he formerly bought with the smaller one. The employer, on the other hand, under rising competition, found the cost of doing business constantly rising and at the end of the year had diminished profits and less encouragement to carry on or expand his business.

So, while the trust promoter entered the field on the one side, proclaiming his imperfectly sound doctrine of the economy of consolidation, the industrial engineer entered on the other with the perfectly sound doctrine of reducing the cost of production, not by harder work, but by more intelligent work, by better directed work, by work of which less should be wasted in overcoming preventable difficulties, and of dividing this saving between the worker, the employer, and the customer. This meant a larger volume of production at lower prices, with higher wages, and better profits, out of which more industries might be financed.

This is, briefly, the conscientious aim and the earnest project of the efficiency movement and of the advocates of science in management. Out of their study and practice has been built by degrees, but with increasing rapidity, a new profession, industrial engineering, which is becoming as definite in its outline and as certain in its principles as the long-recognized branches of the profession. It has its differences of school of sect, as other sciences have, but it shows constantly increasing agreement on fundamental doctrines accepted by all practitioners.

Perhaps the first point of agreement is that ordinary "old-line" management will not serve under modern conditions to carry the purpose of the executive faithfully and intact down to the operative or to carry the needs of the operative back to the executive. It will not serve even to assure the control of materials, equipment, and methods in the job on which the operative is working. There are too many divisions and subdivisions all down the long branching line, and the so-called military system of delegating authority from manager to superintendent, from superintendent to foreman, from foreman to subboss, does not assure in any way that character, conscience, skill, knowledge, tact, special fitness for the work in hand, will be distributed to each official in direct proportion to his authority. Many of the most important decisions as to when and how work shall be done, as to choice of methods, choice of materials, use of equipment, are left to the offhand decision of the worker in the rush and hurry of his work. Many of the matters that must affect the worker's personality and future are never brought to the attention or submitted to the decision of anyone above his immediate boss or foreman, the lowest noncommissioned officer in the organization.

All the more advanced methods, therefore, agree in the undertaking to establish a secondary set of activities, interwoven with the old-line organization, leaving to the latter the simpler functions of authority and discipline, but committing to this supplementary force the provision of special skill, expert assistance in the peculiar problems of the work, care of machinery and conditions, maintenance of the well-being of the operative, observation of individual merit, and provision of extra and individual compensation corresponding to superior individual performance. Whether this is done by the institution known as "functional foremanship" or whether it is done by the establishment of special staff or whether it is done under some application of the committee system, the purpose is the same. It is to restore the individual status of the workman and to establish definite channels, always open, by which he can receive special instruction and assistance in improving his position, special protection against loss through struggling with obstacles beyond his control, and special recognition for his individual achievement.

All these advanced methods of management are characterized more or less clearly by most or all of four features.

First. Analysis of existing conditions to find out exactly what is being done and to distinguish what is good and what is bad in the situation.

Second. Standardization, which means generally the establishment so far as is practicable of the best conditions, the best equipment, and the best methods for doing the work in hand.

Third. Instruction where necessary for the purpose of showing the operative how to do the work in the most efficient way, which means only the way involving the least fatigue and the least unnecessary waste of time or material. It does not mean working any harder, but it means making what work is done count toward productive results.

Fourth. Compensation; that is, an increase of the standard or established wage earnings proportionate to the increase of actual productive work accomplished.

In other words, the time or effort formerly lost in labor which, though it may have been equally fatiguing, produced no marketable result is now made profitable both to employer and employed—to the one in increased output and to the other in increased wages.

To establish and emphasize these four features, again dependence is generally placed on one major underlying idea.

This is, that every piece of work shall be planned as to method, equipment, materials, etc., and scheduled as to the time when it shall be done, the machine on which it shall be done, and the workman by whom it shall be done before the order to do it is issued, and that this planning shall be carried out by specially skilled persons, leaving to other and differently skilled persons the simplified duty of supervising the doing of the work.

Secondary to this major idea is the next most important, that the duties of the planning and of doing must either be further subdivided among specialists, each taking entire charge of certain functions, or else must be fortified by the provision of counseling experts, who do not themselves command but advise the officials who do.

Engineers, managers, and thinkers who agree on the main proposition differ decidedly, even caustically, over the secondary ways and means by which the principal purpose is to be carried out. I am perfectly well aware of their differences, which are as bitter and irreconcilable as religious sectarian differences or the quarrels between different schools of socialism. The Taylor group assert that to their system alone should the term scientific management be applied, and that nothing which does not accept its complete ritual should be received into the fellowship of the true believers. On the other hand stand the larger company of "free gospellers," who assert their faith in the same fundamentals but admit large latitude of practice, holding that the great object is to bring more science into management and that any methods which carry the industrial world even a little way along that road are to that extent praiseworthy.

I have been concerned, however, with agreements rather than with differences, because where competing counselors agree we may take it almost for granted we have located the truth; and the general agreement is that to locate the losses and wastes which impoverish both employer and employee, to uncover the facts which will lead to a fairer distribution of the products of industry, to open to every worker that possibility of best self-development which is the essence and aim of true democracy, to establish the physical, economic, and spiritual conditions under which industry can be made most profitable and at the same time most moral, we must recognize and incorporate into our methods of management and administration these fundamentals:

Analysis of conditions, to determine the facts and possibilities.

Standardization, to incorporate in our methods of work the very best practice possible under the circumstances.

Instruction, to give each worker as quickly and easily as possible the benefit of all the knowledge and experience acquired by his predecessors.

Compensation, to reward each man in proportion to his effort and his contribution to the wealth of the world.

Running rapidly over the principal wage and management plans which have been extensively adopted, these elementary features appear with differing degrees of emphasis.

Even in the premium plan, widely familiar to workingmen and employers, and scarcely ever, perhaps, thought of as scientific, we certainly have analysis, to the extent of separating each job for its individual timing; we have standardization, to the extent of agreeing upon some average time record as a reasonable mark for the next man to reach; we have instruction, to the extent, at least, of informing the man what his mates have done before; and we have compensation, in the form of an addition to his wages, equal generally to half the value of any time he may save. All the measures may be crude and imperfect, but the germ of the idea is there. Light has been let in on the conditions and influence is set at work by which the conditions are likely to be improved, although no stated provision is made for any activity other than the workman's own skill and improvement of conditions that are within his control.

The premium plan aroused wide discussion, almost created a sensation, when it was put forth in 1891. I think the opposition with which labor met it at first has been to a great extent relaxed, and it has probably found wider acceptance than any other system, perhaps even than all others put together.

Taylor's differential piece rate, or double piece rate, first advocated in 1896, went a good deal further into the scientific study of conditions surrounding the worker; proposed a rate-fixing committee to supersede the simpler records or less careful guess of the foreman under the premium plan; also carried a very strong suggestion that the management must cooperate in looking after the condition of machinery, the supply of tools, materials, and facilities for working, and other things by which the worker might be prevented from earning a premium through causes beyond his control. It changed the basis of compensation from day wage to piece rate, and also incorporated the harsh feature of penalizing the worker who did not reach the standard output as well as the happier one of increasing the compensation of the worker who did. It is noteworthy, however, because it foreshadowed the system later expanded, highly systematized, and in many respects vastly bettered in the Taylor system of shop management, which has now appropriated to itself the name of "scientific management."

In this latter system, as described in Taylor's paper on Shop Management, in 1903, the duty of the management to provide good equipment and tools, to study out good methods, and to give the workman the best possible opportunities to use his skill and effort productively was immensely emphasized. It was declared that in place of "putting it up" to the superintendent or the foreman or the man to get out the job, the management should cooperate, their share of the work being at least half the total of the work involved. Great stress was laid also upon the importance of standardization, upon elementary time studies, upon recognition of fatigue, and the provision of rest periods as definitely fixed as working times. A whole new scheme of organization was declared to be necessary, and a highly elaborated, or as it has sometimes been called, a highly ritualistic system, was described as essential to the complete and continuous carrying out of the principles. Extra compensation to the employee took the form either of a higher piece rate or a specified bonus added to day wages.

Just before Taylor's Shop Management was published, however, another most notable contribution to the betterment of industrial conditions was made by Mr. H. L. Gantt in the publication of his Bonus System. He rather anticipated Taylor in advocacy of the advanced planning and scheduling of work, but the distinguishing feature of his philosophy is the definite provision made for individual instruction of each individual worker, so that he or she may see exactly how it is possible to perform the "task" and earn the increased pay. Second, even the learner or the worker who fails to accomplish the prescribed task is assured of ruling day wages. These are a guaranteed minimum for each case, while the successful worker receives in addition an added percentage of the day wage. This additional bonus varies according to the character of the work, but is very commonly 40 per cent. As under the premium plan, no one is compelled to try. He may work on in the old way if he so elects, but an opportunity is made and instruction is provided for those who feel their ability to learn the better way and earn the higher wage.

In Emerson's efficiency doctrines, which were first preached about five years after Taylor's Shop Management was published, the emphasis is transferred from the system to the principles. The great economic importance of advanced planning and scheduling of work is recognized, standard conditions are adopted as part of the regular institutions, and the regular "line" of the organization is supplemented by a staff of specialists, expert in the principal problems of the work and adequate to reach and help every worker. Individual performance is recorded and efficiency is measured, not job by job or even day by day, but over longer periods, either two weeks or a month, and is determined by comparing each individual worker's output with the predetermined standard output for the same period. Day wages are undisturbed, as in the Halsey and Gantt systems, but efficiency recompense takes the form of a premium added to the wages and graded on a sliding scale according to the individual record. It is peculiar, however, in that some premium is awarded even to those who do not reach the established standard. It begins, in fact, when a worker reaches even two-thirds of that standard, and increases on a rising scale up to 20 per cent added to wages of the standard worker. Perhaps, however, the most important thing about this efficiency philosophy of Emerson's is that it includes in its foundation principles not only the physical and technical matters characterizing scientific management, but the mental and spiritual ones of right ideals, the fair deal, common sense, competent counsel, and discipline.

Thus there seems to me to have been a steady progression upward in our understanding of good industrial management. Halsey establishes, as between employer and employee, the justice of gain sharing. Taylor introduces the exact scientific determination of standards and the obligation of the management to cooperate in securing right conditions. Gantt elaborates the educational features and opens wide the democratic opportunity for every man to realize the best that is in him. Emerson infuses the moral principles and shows that the whole movement is but part of a process as wide as the universe, responding to universal laws, and subject to the universal obligation to strive for efficiency.

I am perfectly well aware that the application of science to management has been stubbornly resisted by employers—not only those who adhere to the barbarous policies of "hire, drive, and fire," but others more human who distrust new ideas. I know it has been and is opposed by labor, fearing it is some new scheme of exploitation hidden under a sop. Considering labor's bitter experiences such opposition may be easily understood and met with sympathy and patient if earnest explanation. It should, however, be hammered home again and again that neither premium, bonus, nor efficiency scale, disturbs by a hair's breadth the existing minimum or existing rate of wages. This may be and is fixed by collective bargaining. Each of these scales merely opens the way to the maximum wage earnings each worker's capacity can command. The newer advanced methods clear this way by bringing in the most highly skilled experts for the single purpose of removing obstacles and making the same effort by the worker produce larger results in which he shares. They are not plans for "speeding up," they do not depend upon exploiting the worker. The new responsibility and duties they impose rest rather on the management, and the profits they create come not out of labor, but chiefly out of better administration and better use of the same opportunities, materials, and time.

The proportion of the worker's sharing in the gains is for the present experimental. Perhaps, even probably, it should be larger. I believe that can be worked out only as any other price is determined—by the free play of economic forces. But however large it may be, it can never be securely based on anything but such accurate measurement of the work against definite standards as these new systems provide. Large increase of returns, whether to employer or employee, can come only from detecting and correcting wastes of time, of skill, of materials, of facilities, of opportunities which are hidden under the old-line system of organization and management. It is deplorable that the opposition of labor, arising I believe from misunderstanding, has given employers so good and so often used an excuse for refusing to give these new principles and methods a trial, and for clinging to the old fallacies of low wages and strenuous foremanship.

The world at large pays in the end for everything—for what it gets and for what it wastes. It wastes enormously now for lack of knowledge. If labor is the largest factor in the scheme of things, labor is paying most of this loss. It must gain most from discovery and stoppage of the losses which these newer systems detect and disclose.

I have not gone here into Hine's unit system, which is concerned almost wholly with railroad operation, nor into Carpenter's or Knoeppel's factory committee systems, because they deal with the officers rather than the privates in the industrial army, reaching the workman through his foreman. But they are nevertheless of much importance because of their effects in breaking down the lingering feudalism, or would-be feudalism, of the industrial system—in democratizing industrial management to the limits to which democratization apparently can now advantageously go.

Any effort to introduce science into management—even a very little science—is praiseworthy, for science means only recognizing and working in accordance with the highest law and the greatest truth. Even if we should go no further than analysis, we should do for industry and each industrial plant what this commission is doing for industry at large—open up realities, get at the facts, let in the light. Public opinion and the public conscience would go a long way toward doing the rest.

This statement—long for an answer, but all too brief for an exposition of the subject, I hope may make clear some reasons for thinking that the new and rapidly spreading science of management and administration will do much to solve the very difficulty defined in the commission's question—the difficulty of “insuring the maintenance of proper labor conditions and the equitable distribution of the products of industry.”

[Before the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, February, 1915.]

Although now engaged mainly in university teaching and in directing a professional training school, I assume that it is rather because of my 18 years' connection with the charity organization society that you have invited me to appear here; and that the particular topic on which you may want information or opinion from me is that relation, if any, between industry and the kind of philanthropy which that society, and organized charity, generally, represents.

If so, what I would like to point out especially is that this society has been among the first and foremost to realize that poverty is largely due to industrial maladjustments and that charity of itself is no cure, and never can be, for industrial evils.

As recent and pertinent illustrations, it may not be inappropriate to call attention to the fact that the secretary of the charity organization society was a member of that group of social workers and economists to whom Mrs. Harriman referred in a recent newspaper interview, on whose initiative the President recommended, and Congress enacted, the law by which the present commission was created; that I was chairman, in fact, of the improvised committee which prepared a memorandum on the subject at the President's request for use in his message, drafted the bill, interested Senator Borah, Representative—now Senator—Hughes, and Representative—now Secretary—Wilson, and others in the plan, arranged the hearings on the subject, and carried on an active campaign in Congress and in the country at large for the appointment of the commission. Dr. Lindsey, who was also in the service of the charity organization society as a member of the staff of the school of philanthropy, and myself devoted a large part of our time for several months to securing this legislation, and this was done, of course, so far as our part in it is concerned, with the full knowledge and approval and in constant consultation with the president and central council of the society. I do not wish to be misunderstood. This committee of economists and social workers would not, of course, claim any of the credit for the actual work of the commission, but only for its opportunity, for the fact of its existence.

In the next place, it was one of the standing committees of the New York Charity Organization Society which conceived, planned, and carried through the Pittsburgh survey, concerning which Mr. Manly said in Washington in December, 1913:

"Some five years ago the community was rudely awakened by the Pittsburgh survey and shocked into a realization that thousands of human beings were employed under conditions which required them to labor seven days a week. Public feeling was deeply aroused and calls for immediate action for the correction of this evil were many and loud."

It will be admitted that Mr. Manly is a competent witness, not only because of his present relation to this commission, but because he was the expert of the United States Labor Bureau who, immediately after the Pittsburgh survey had, as he says, aroused public feeling on the subject, conducted an official and authoritative inquiry into the steel industry which confirmed the findings of our survey. The general character and results of that survey are too well known to require discussion.

A third evidence of the interest which the society has long taken in industrial conditions and their relation to poverty, is the establishment and publication until some two years ago of the weekly periodical originally called "Charities," then "Charities and the Commons," and now "The Survey." This periodical since October, 1912, has not been published by the charity organization society. It never has been the official organ of the society as that phrase is generally understood. It never has been "controlled," except by its editors, and it has never since its earliest days given particular attention to local relief work. Nevertheless, during the 15 years in which it was published by the society, we had full responsibility for it, moral and financial.

For several years, before this change was made as well as since, the Survey has given continuous and searching attention to industrial warfare and industrial peace, to evolutionary changes in industry on the one hand and to maladjustments and adverse conditions on the other. This had been done fearlessly, without the slightest reference to the interests or investments of the directors, contributors, or members of the society which published it. While the Pittsburgh survey was in progress and its findings were being published, the name of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, who is supposed to have been an important factor in the steel corporation, appeared on the periodical, as required by State law, as the treasurer of the society which published it; and Mr. Andrew Carnegie was a contributor whose name appeared with the amount of his contribution each year in our published annual report.

When the Survey published its first careful and certainly plain-spoken study of conditions in the mines and steel mills of Colorado—February 3, 1912—Mr. Rockefeller was a contributor to the society. I think it absolutely correct to say that no one in the office of the Survey considered this fact or was expected to do so by the officers or central council of the society or, so far as we ever had any evidence, by Mr. Rockefeller or his advisers.

Later, but while the Survey was still published by the society—April 20, 1912—a study was published of the actual operation of the board of conciliation in the anthracite coal industry. In general the machinery established in 1903 had maintained peace, but our study led us to believe that in certain particulars—six different points there were, I believe—it worked hardship to the miners.

Subsequently the conciliation plan was modified to remove most or all of these hardships, but what I wish to point out is that prior to such change, as a result of our own independent study, the grievances of the miners were brought before the general public, and their claims to a modification of the existing agreement supported in the periodical published by the society. In pursuance of our usual custom, we sent the manuscript of the article which we expected to publish to trade-union officials and also to officers of the coal and the coal-carrying companies—among others to Mr. Robert W. de Forest, who is vice president of the Central Railway of New Jersey. We thought that the fact that Mr. de Forest is also president of the society and was chairman of the committee in charge of the Survey should not prevent our getting his criticism. His only suggestion was that we should get the criticism of a gentleman to whom we had in fact already sent it and whose criticisms we had.

The instances which I have cited are entirely typical of the freedom from external control and the moral support which the editors of the Survey always received from organized charity with which they were officially associated.

I would like next to mention our discussion in Charities and the Commons and in the Survey of endowments and foundations. The subject was first taken up seven years ago in an editorial on July 6, 1907, entitled the "Danger of Endowments." Speaking of the Sage Foundation, the General Education Board, and the Carnegie pension fund for college teachers, we said, if I may be permitted to read the concluding sentences:

"The brutal power of concentrated wealth is ever present in these endowments. If used judiciously, wisely, with breadth of sympathy, with sufficient safeguards against abuse and incidental injury, they may be in all ways beneficent. If used carelessly, with class prejudice, or personal favoritism, or in disregard of the social effects of making or withholding grants, then neither the good intentions of the donors nor the possible balance of good accomplished will prevent their becoming also malefactions to the extent of their misuse."

I believed then and I believe now that the present trustees of these funds are intelligent and public-spirited men, who conceive their trust in a broad national sense. I believed then and believe now that if these trustees cease to do this and use their funds in such a way as to discourage honest research, or to encourage the dissemination of particular views on such subjects as the tariff, or control of corporations, trade-unionism, or socialism, merely because these views are acceptable to the founder or to the trustees, they would at once forfeit any claim to be considered philanthropic or educational institutions; and that the democracy of that time, whenever it may come, will find some appropriate way to deal with such abuses.

However, when the Rockefeller Foundation was proposed, some three years later, and a bill for its incorporation was pending in Congress, we subjected that measure to a searching criticism, which was followed by prolonged discussion and the ultimate withdrawal of the bill. While I have always regretted that the foundation did not obtain its charter from Congress, rather than from a State legislature, I have had no reason to regret the criticism. Endowments in perpetuity, managed by closed corporations, accumulating either simple or compound interest as the directors may please, seemed to me then and seem to me now contrary to the spirit of American institutions and fraught with possible danger.

The bill as originally introduced in Congress very properly provided for annual reports with financial statements. The charter later obtained from the State of New York does not, I believe, contain this provision. The bill in its original form made the charter subject, as Federal charters always are made subject, to alteration, amendment, or repeal at the pleasure of Congress. I thought these two safeguards, valuable as they are, did not go far enough. In the Survey of March 12 and of March 26, 1910, and again on January 14, 1911, this last article written after Mr. Rockefeller had caused the bill to be amended so as to incorporate some of our suggestions in a modified form, I gave reasons for believing that the public should have a voice in the selection of trustees; that the indefinite increase of endowments through the accumulation of income should be prevented; and that there should even be provision for the gradual expenditure of any given endowment, principal and interest, within a specified period. The proposed charter then pending in Congress, as amended, though the amendments did not go quite so far as I had suggested, was, I believe, the most enlightened and progressive proposal ever made before a legislature for the management of a great foundation. If enacted it would have created a precedent of the greatest value and influence.

The necessity and desirability for public control of foundations is one of the subjects on which Mr. de Forest, the president of the charity organization society, and myself have not fully agreed. His opinion is that the reserved right to amend the charter includes in effect all of the other restrictions, and that it is therefore useless to specify them. Mr. de Forest never offered the slightest objection to my stating my own views as frequently and emphatically as I liked, but in order to prevent any mistaken inference that I was speaking for him also—since we were intimately associated in many ways—he made a brief statement of his own views, which you will find in the Survey of January 14, 1911. We published several communications on the subject, reprinted one or two editorials from the New York Times replying to our own, and also reprinted from the Congressional Record the statement by Mr. Starr J. Murphy, taking up the points in which we had suggested that the charter be amended.

If it is decided that it comes within the province of the commission to make recommendations on this subject, my suggestions would be that Federal charters are to be encouraged rather than State charters; that, after the donor's death, or before with the donor's consent—and I think the donor should have the right to choose his own trustees during his lifetime if he so desires—the Government should have a voice in the selection of trustees as vacancies occur; that annual reports with financial statements, and an opportunity to audit and test such statements, should be insisted upon; that the accumulation of income should be prevented, subject, of course, to reasonable latitude as to working balances at the end of the year; and that there might be some legal limitations, as in the case of savings banks, over the character of the investments. I think that public supervision and participation is justified not only by the exemption from taxation, which should be continued as long as any educational, religious, and charitable enterprises are exempted, but also by the legitimate public interest in the results of their activities. Such supervision and participation should not be hostile or hampering, but, as in the case of the Smithsonian Institution or the American Red Cross, sympathetic and beneficial. I do not believe that it would discourage large gifts for public purposes, but, on the contrary, that it would encourage them. If there is any one thing which is likely to deter a generous modern giver from establishing a foundation for a particular purpose, it is doubt as to the possibility of foreseeing future needs, a lurking fear lest the good he would do may become an unintended injury, or at least less beneficial than he intended. If he is assured that the future generations will be free to change the terms of his bequest to meet their needs as they see them, not only in case of extreme absurdity but gradually by actually sharing the responsibility for its administration, this will, I think, act reassuringly by the removal of the ground of such doubts.

If such supervision were to become political control, or arbitrary interference with the free exercise of proper discretion by trustees within their own province, the result would undoubtedly be to discourage such gifts. The possibility of hostile public control has no doubt already had such effect in some instances. Any recommendations as to public supervision and representation should therefore be so framed as to make it clear that it is not intended to divert trust funds from legitimate public purposes or from the particular purposes which the donor intends, if such purposes are consistent with the public welfare.

Something can be said in favor of the radical proposal that perpetual endowments should cease altogether, and that all donations or bequests for social and philanthropic purposes should be on a plan by which within a given period—fifty or a hundred years—principal and interest must be expended. If it were a mere question of advising an individual donor, I would not hesitate to urge this form of bequest, but I do not believe that there is justification for restrictive legislation in this direction. Perpetual endowments in education on the whole seem to have justified themselves. We can not say that expenditures of the principal over a term of years might not have brought even better results, but until further experiments have been made in that direction a conservative policy of public supervision and participation would seem better than any legislative restriction of the life or the amount of endowments.

The charity organization society a dozen years ago established a committee on the prevention of tuberculosis. This committee in its earliest years gave particular attention to the industrial aspects of the disease, pointing out the particular trades in which it is most prevalent and the conditions in those trades which were believed to be responsible for the excess. The committee established close relations with the Central Federated Union, and issued educational leaflets bearing the joint imprint of both their committee on sanitation and our own. We worked for the establishment of hospitals and sanatoria, for better factory laws and better housing conditions, and insisted on the bad effects of low wages and high rents as causal factors in this disease of the masses.

Even earlier we had a tenement-house committee, which secured a new and more radical tenement-house law and a municipal department to enforce its provisions.

Earlier still, before my own connection with the society, the plan was inaugurated for a provident loan society, a pawnshop for making loans on pawn pledges at half the legal rate of interest. This agency, although organized by our society and still electing each year one director on the nomination of the society, has been from the beginning—as the Survey is now—because of the character of its work, entirely independent in its operations. It has been an important influence in keeping in check by competition the unquestionable abuses and extortions of the old-time pawnshops.

The subject of a minimum wage is now under investigation by a legislative commission in this State. I have personally appeared before that commission in advocacy of a legal minimum wage to be fixed by special boards in particular industries and localities whenever the conditions are found to be such as to make it necessary.

I have consistently supported child labor legislation, workmen's compensation and insurance, the prohibition of manufacturing in tenements where factory conditions can not be maintained because both official inspection and trade-union influence are absent.

The elimination of strikes and lockouts, boycotts and black lists, by the elimination of their causes, the maintenance of just and mutually satisfactory relations between employing corporations and wage earners, is a problem of the greatest interest to the charity organization society, as to all social agencies. If the commission solves it you will deserve eternal gratitude from all of us. The poverty directly due to industrial controversies is not perhaps as extensive as that due to some other causes. But it is least excusable.

STATEMENT OF MR. CHARLES O. HEYDT.

[In response to questionnaire submitted by United States Commission on Industrial Relations, Feb. 1, 1915.]

26 BROADWAY,
New York, February 1, 1915.

UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS,
New York City.

(Attention of Mr. W. H. Allen.)

DEAR SIR: As requested in your letter of January 30, I submit herewith answers to the questionnaire which you inclosed. Part C of question 10 is not clear and I am unable to answer it. I shall be glad to supply any further information required regarding my connection with the Rockefeller Foundation or with Mr. Rockefeller.

Very truly,

CHARLES O. HEYDT.

Question 1. Please give correct name and place of residence.

Answer. Charles O. Heydt, Montclair, N. J.

Question 2. How long have you been with Mr. Rockefeller? Give date.

Answer. Seventeen years four months. Since October 2, 1897.

Question 3. How long have you acted as private secretary to Mr. John Rockefeller, jr.? (a) What position did you hold with Mr. Rockefeller, jr., before becoming his private secretary? (b) Please state if you take stenographic notes?

Answer. Have acted as private secretary to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., for 17 years 4 months, since entering Mr. Rockefeller, sr.'s employ on October 2, 1897. (b) Yes.

Question 4. What business or secretarial position did you hold before going to Mr. Rockefeller?

Answer. From April 6, 1896, to October 1, 1897, private secretary to Messrs. William Barclay Parsons and Harry DeB. Parsons. The former was at that time chief engineer of the Rapid Transit Commission, the latter a consulting engineer and professor of engineering at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, N. Y. From February 15, 1894, to April 4, 1896, one of the junior secretaries to Mr. Thomas Powell Fowler and Mr. John B. Kerr, respectively, president and vice president of the New York, Ontario & Western Railway. During the same period substituted at times for the secretary of the general manager of the same railway. From September 27, 1891, to February 15, 1894, clerk with Messrs. Kountze Bros., bankers.

Question 5. Of what college or university are you a graduate? (a) In what subjects do you specialize? (b) What postgraduate work did you do? Give dates. (c) What special investigations did you make?

Answer. Not a college graduate. A special student for three years at the New York University School of Commerce and Finance, 1910-11, 1911-12, 1912-13. (a) Accounting. (b) Answered in question 5. (c) Answered in question 5.

Question 6. Are you a member of the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.? (a) Have you ever been a member of the staff? Give dates. (b) Do you attend meetings of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff?

Answer. Not a member of the staff of advisers of Mr. Rockefeller, sr. (a) No. (b) No.

Question 7. Of what voluntary bodies, civic, charitable, educational, religious, political, (a) are you a trustee of officer? Please state position held.

Answer. Trustee, the Rockefeller Foundation; member, the International Health Commission; member, Bureau of Social Hygiene (Inc.).

Question 8. Of what political or governmental body or department or bureau are you member or officer? Please name office, correct title, and date of appointment. (a) Please name any previously held position in connection with governmental.

Answer. None.

Question 9. Are you a member of the executive committee? (a) Have you been since the foundation was established? (b) Is there a quorum of the executive committee? (c) Will two votes control action of the executive committee when only a quorum are present?

Answer. Yes. (a) Yes. (b) Yes. (c) Yes.

Question 10. Has the executive committee formulated rules for its government as per Article I of the by-laws? If so, please send copy. (a) Is it true that at 9 of the 20 meetings thus far held by the foundation's executive committee the number attending was three? (b) Has the executive committee the power to fill vacancies? (c) Has given at meetings of the board all of the powers of the corporation? (d) Is it responsible for auditing bills?

Answer. No formal rules have been prepared for the government of the executive committee. (a) Yes. (b) Article I of the by-laws provides that "The executive committee may fill vacancies in its own number or in the finance committee in the interim of the corporation meetings, reporting its action at the next meeting." (c) The question is not clear. (d) The by-laws, Article I, provide, among other things, that the executive committee shall direct and control the audit of all bills.

Question 11. What investigations have you individually made since working with Mr. Rockefeller as to—(a) Labor problems? (b) Widows' pensions? (c) Workingman's insurance—(d) Workingman's compensation acts? (e) Industrial education board? (f) Conditions of laboring factors? (g) The world's experience in governing foundations. Please indicate the scope of investigation, time required, so far as these have been in bodies or publication in formal reports; please send copies or refer to commission two copies.

Answer. None.

Question 12. Did you, in any capacity, attend meetings of—(a) Trustees of the Carnegie Institute for Medical Research? (b) The general education board? (c) The executive committee of the general education board?

Answer. No.

Question 13. Please suggest any questions which you think the commission should ask regarding foundations or any persons—subjects which you feel should be investigated.

CHARLES O. HEYDT.

FEBRUARY 1, 1915.

STATEMENT OF MR. J. P. P. KELLY.

26 CLIFF STREET, January 25, 1915.

HON. THOMAS P. WALSH,
Chairman Industrial Relations Commission,
City Hall, New York City.

DEAR SIR: I have attended a few of your meetings, and have listened particularly to Mr. Ford and Mr. Gompers. Have also read quite a number of the articles reporting the doings of your commission, and think one of the most serious problems to be considered has yet to be mentioned; that is, the employment of female labor.

My business takes me along Broadway for a distance of about one-half a mile during lunch hour every day, and one can not help by being impressed by the proportions of women over men. It seems to my mind that in a great many cases—would say 60 per cent—the women are holding the positions that might be held by their own husbands. In other words, if the positions now held by these women were held by men, and the man earning a decent wage, he would be supporting the woman he displaced, and in some instances a family. What set my mind thinking on this particular subject was the observance of a bread line at Broad and South Streets, and in talking to an officer on duty there he told me of a particular instance in which his neighbor was employed by a manufacturing corporation, and earning a salary of $26 per week, and how he was displaced by the employment of two girls at $12 per week each. Personally I know of similar cases, and I think it is a matter to be seriously considered by your commission.

Trusting you will consider this letter in the same spirit in which it is written, I remain,

Yours, truly,

J. P. P. KELLY.

STATEMENT OF MR. ADOLPH LEWISHON.

1. In what corporations are you a director?

Answer. Miami Copper Co., General Development Co., Kerr Lake Mining Co., Naumkeag Copper Co., Crocker Wheeler Co., Mechanics & Metals National Bank, Importers & Traders National Bank, and the United States Mortgage & Trust Co.

2. In what other corporations do you own or represent any considerable amount of stock?

Answer. I do not own or represent any considerable amount of stock in other corporations.

3. Please outline briefly the character of your connection with the corporations in which you are interested.

Answer. I am president of Miami Copper Co., General Development Co., and Kerr Lake Mining Co., the latter is a Canadian company, and a director in the others. I own a considerable amount of stock in each of these corporations; the Miami Copper Co. is the one company among these that employs a very considerable amount of labor.

4. What information do you, either as a stockholder or as a director, possess concerning the labor conditions in corporations in which you are interested?

4A. Do you receive reports from any of the corporations which give you any information regarding the labor conditions?

Answer (4 and 4A). I receive reports regarding labor conditions in letters from the local manager and through interviews with the consulting engineer and vice president and the other officers of the company, including my son, who visit the mines and plants from time to time.

4B. Do you make it a practice to visit the plants of the corporations in which you are interested and make personal inquiries and observations regarding conditions?

Answer. I do not visit the mines personally, but my son and other associates and officers of the company do so as my personal representatives.

4C. What factories, mines, or railroads have you personally inspected during the past year? During the past 10 years?

Answer. As before stated, I have not personally visited the factories or mines either during the past year or during the past 10 years, but, as before said, have my personal representatives, including my son, make these personal inspections for me.

5. In your opinion, to what extent are the directors and stockholders of corporations responsible for the labor conditions in them?

Answer. The majority of the stockholders elect the directors. In my opinion, the stockholders should not be held directly responsible for the labor conditions of a corporation, except that they should be expected to cast their votes in favor of such directors as they have every reason to believe would carry out matters in the right way.

Directors should hold office only in such companies in which they believe the business is carried on in the right way, and that labor is properly treated. The details of the business are attended to by the executive officers, together with the local manager, who is appointed by the executive officers, subject to the approval of the directors. The directors should be kept posted at the regular meetings, which ought to be held at least once a month, and at special meetings in case anything special occurs which makes it necessary or advisable to hold such meeting.

6. If the stockholders and directors are not responsible whom do you consider to be responsible?

Answer. The executive officers who act under the instructions of the board of directors. In the companies in which I am interested, like the Miami Copper Co., we have a general manager; that is Mr. Channing, who is vice president and consulting engineer, and who spends part of his time at the mine and part at New York, and is acquainted with all the details. If he is in New York he attends the directors' meetings, and if there is anything special he reports it.

7. If executive officials are responsible—

7A. What scope of authority do you give them to establish and maintain proper labor conditions?

Answer. The local manager should have considerable authority. As said before, Mr. Channing, the consulting engineer, spends part of his time at the mines, part in New York, and if any change occurs consults with the other executive officers and sometimes refers matters to the directors.

7B. Do you give such officials equal scope without an accounting in financial matters or in other phases of plant operation?

Answer. Probably not in financial matters; that part I attend to personally, at least keep fully posted about constantly and direct finances myself, while all the technical work, including labor, is attended to by the local manager under the direction of Mr. Channing, the vice president and consulting engineer, who advises with the other executive officers and directors in all special cases or when changes take place.

7C. What instructions, if any, have been given executive officials in the corporations in which you are interested that proper labor conditions must be maintained?

Answer. I have always given general directions to see to it that all safeguards should be provided and everything done to make conditions first rate, also that the men be kept satisfied as far as possible as to their scale of wages. I have here a memorandum showing the welfare provisions and safeguards provided at Miami Copper Co.'s works and mines.

(See "Welfare report" herewith.)

8. As a matter of fact, are not labor conditions the only matters under the control of executive officials which are not subject to an audit or check of some kind? Do you not require—

A. A balance sheet of profit and loss accounts, showing in detail disposition of all financial matters?

B. Cost of production sheets, showing comparative costs at different plants and in different years?

C. Periodical inspection of machinery?

D. Periodical inspection of materials?

E. Periodical inspection of inventory of all assets?

Answer (A to E). Not entirely. As I have already expressed, we do keep more or less of an audit check on labor conditions, though, of course, there is at present no method worked out of putting labor conditions in the exact statistical form in the manner outlined in your question. I think it is most desirable that proper laws be enacted to cover all these matters, stating exactly what safeguards should be provided, the hours of labor, the minimum wage, and everything pertaining to labor. The passage of proper laws for the protection of labor is most important. It, in fact, can be of great assistance to the executive officials and even to the directors in keeping a check upon the local management as to its proper treatment of labor, and in a way provides the audit that is suggested by your question. It has been our policy (and I think is the policy of most well-run corporations) to make the local management live strictly up to the labor laws and inquire whenever there is any evidence of violation of such laws. Such laws can provide a general standard. The best practice in such matters is thus determined, and the directors can be sure that the management is following the best known practice.

9. According to your own standards, what would you consider to be proper labor conditions as regards the following points:

9A. Length of working-day.

Answer. Eight hours.

9B. Yearly income for an unskilled workman.

Answer. This depends upon the conditions and the locality of works or mines. At Miami the lowest grade labor is paid $2.50 to $3 per day.

9C. Compensation for industrial accidents involving: (a) Loss of arm; (b) loss of both eyes; (c) loss of life; (d) permanent disability.

Answer. In Arizona the State laws provide for these matters. In the case of total disability the man receives 50 per cent of his wages, and in case of partial disability 50 per cent of the difference between the wages he was receiving and what he is capable of earning. There is a maximum of $4,000. We have it understood that the laws, such as are in existence, should be liberally construed. I believe these matters should be fixed by law, and would be pleased if ample protection were given to all workmen by law.

9D. Age and conditions under which children should be employed.

Answer. I do not think there should be any children employed at manual labor under 16 years of age, and have never been connected with any industry where child labor was employed.

9E. Discharge of workmen who have become inefficient after long service with the corporation.

Answer. I would like to see laws enacted providing pensions for such men.

9F. Refusal to employ unskilled workmen who are over 35, or skilled workmen over 45 years of age.

Answer. We do not make such conditions.

10. If you were convinced that labor conditions in any of the corporations in which you are interested were such that workmen were unable to support their families without putting their wives and younger children to work, or if the nature of employment resulted in industrial diseases, or if the accident rate was excessive as compared with other corporations, what action would you take?

Answer. I would try to mitigate such condition or try to see that they are helped out or have the conditions changed so that there should not be any of these hardships.

11. Have you ever been present at meetings of directors or of the executive committee of a corporation at which the labor policies to be pursued by the corporation, either during strike or during normal times, were being discussed?

Answer. Yes; I have.

11A. Upon what information were the conditions determined in such cases?

Answer. Upon the reports of the manager and reports by officers and directors and personal representatives who had visited the mine and kept in close touch with these questions.

11B. Would a decision upon any financial policy be made the basis of a similar amount of information?

Answer. I think I have practically answered this question. I do attend to the finances and only indirectly to the technical part of the work, including the labor question.

12. In which of the corporations in which you are interested are the employees organized?

Answer. The labor at the Miami Copper Co. is not generally organized, except the mechanics and engineers.

12A. What have been the effects of such organization, in so far as you are informed?

Answer. As far as I am informed, there has been no difficulty in treating with the organized mechanics and engineers. We have also been able to treat with the rest of the labor, although not regularly organized, through the spokesmen whom they select.

13. What is your attitude toward the organization of employees for their protection and for the advancement of their interests? Upon what information or experience is this attitude based?

Answer. I believe that workmen should have a right to organize if they desire to do so, as they should have the right to bargain collectively. I am willing to treat with organized labor where it is organized.

15. What is your attitude toward permitting union organizers who are not employed by your corporation to address employees and otherwise carry on their work without interference?

Answer. My attitude is to allow them full liberty to address my employees, as I do not wish to impair the liberty of employees in any way.

17. As a result of your observation and experience, do you believe that industrial discontent in America is increasing?

17A. If so, why?

Answer (17 and 17A). It is very difficult to make a general answer to this question. It varies in different localities. I think, on the whole, there is a better feeling generally; perhaps not a very great change.

17B. In your opinion, along what general lines should action be taken to remove the causes for such discontent?

Answer. As I said before, I should be pleased to see necessary laws enacted to protect labor in every respect; have a minimum wage, pensions, and all sorts of protection; Government inspection and Government supervision.

18. What have you personally done to mitigate existing social evils?

A. Contributions to philanthropic organizations and institutions?

B. Active personal interest in philanthropic organizations as officer, director, or trustee?

C. Personal philanthropy?

D. Action to improve industrial conditions?

E. What have been the results?

Answer (A to E). I have been more or less active in public-welfare work since a good many years. My gifts are generally made without conditions. I am a director of the Hebrew Sheltering Guardian Orphan Asylum, National Child Labor Committee, United Hebrew Charities, International Child Welfare League, National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor, Hebrew Technical School for Girls, Mount Sinai Hospital, Westchester County committee of the State Charities Aid Association. I am particularly interested in the care of dependent children and education generally, all kinds of welfare work, and the proper treatment of the prisoner. I think all this work is good and believe much good has resulted from these activities. I have made contributions to various philanthropic, educational, and social work since a good many years.

19. What is your opinion regarding the social desirability of heavily endowed foundations, with self-perpetuating boards of trustees, as a method of dealing with social conditions?

Answer. I think that foundations should be under some method of control and supervision by the Government; if Federal in scope, the Federal Government.

ACTIVITIES OF MIAMI COPPER CO. WITH RESPECT TO THE SOCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL WELFARE OF ITS EMPLOYEES.

The following is an outline of the activities of the Miami Copper Co. with respect to the social and industrial welfare of its employees:

The industry of the Miami Copper Co. comprises the mining of copper ore by underground methods and concentrating it by the process of milling. I think I may safely say that our mine ranks well among large underground mines with regard to the working comfort and safeguarding of its employees. All modern mechanical devices for replacing or lessening the muscular labor of the miner and for assuring the safety of his transport are included in its equipment.

All surface industrial buildings are spacious in design and of fireproof construction. In the concentrating mill wet surroundings are avoided by concrete floors, sloped to provide a central drainage. The maintenance of cleanliness is preeminent, specially assigned laborers being provided for this purpose.

The property of the company adjoins the town of Miami, which is a new mining town that has sprung up with the industrial activities of the company about five years ago. The town having no local government housing conditions, sanitation, and environments are generally of low order, thereby imposing difficulties for carrying out plans of sanitary welfare for employees on the company property.

HOUSING.

Dwellings.—With the object of providing better housing accommodations for employees than are obtainable in the town, and also to isolate employees from the drinking and gambling environments characteristic of most mining towns as much as possible, several groups of dwelling houses have been constructed by the company upon its property. These houses are located on hills overlooking the town and about one-half mile distant from it. Except for some dormitory quarters for single men all houses are built in individual units, separated from each other not less than 25 feet. All window openings are completely screened. Drinking water lines are conveyed into all houses and electric current is furnished for lighting. Garbage disposal is provided for free of charge by a collector hired for this purpose.

Sewage system.—Dwellings erected during the early period of the mine are provided with outhouses. These are continuously disinfected by chloride of lime and equipped with seat covers, spring doors, and screened ventilators for excluding flies. All recent houses are provided with interior flush toilets, the disposal of which is connected with sewer lines to a three-compartment concrete septic tank.

SANITATION.

Drinking water.—Water for all domestic purposes is obtained from underground flows accumulated in mine reservoirs located outside of the zone of the workings. This accumulation is pumped daily to surface through pipe lines provided exclusively for its use to steel-covered supply tanks. Herefrom it is piped into all dwellings and buildings for domestic use. With the extension of the mine workings this supply has become inadequate for the needs of the camp; so it has become necessary to obtain the deficiency from a local well not under the sanitary control of the company. However, to guard against an insanitary supply bacterial analyses of the drinking water are frequently made.

Toilet facilities.—Underground: Portable toilet cars, the use of which is compulsory, are provided for underground employees. These are continuously disinfected by chloride of lime and are brought to surface daily for cleansing.

Surface: Where it is feasible to connect with the sewage system flush toilets are provided. Outhouses are continually disinfected by chloride of lime, and seat covers, spring doors, and screened ventilating windows are provided to exclude flies. The pits of abandoned privies are covered with a layer of at least 3 feet of soil.

Change house.—The bathing facilities provided for miners are contained in a two-story steel change house of fireproof construction, located within close range of the mine exit. This building is equipped with the following conveniences:

Individual sheet metal lockers.

A pressure steam heating system for heating the interior and drying work clothes.

A ventilating system. Lockers are provided with perforated bottoms and louvered doors to effect ventilation of clothes, and main floors are equipped with Burt ventilators for conveying foul air out of the building.

Bathing facilities: Shower baths fed by hot-water heaters, with a minimum ratio of one shower per four men; washing faucets, also hot-water fed, with a minimum ratio of one faucet per 10 men. Contaminated water flows directly into a disposal trough.

Daily janitor service for maintaining cleanliness of the building and wash apparatus.

Hospital.—Because of the lack of a local hospital a building having a normal capacity of 40 patients has been erected jointly with a neighboring company for the benefit of employees and their families. An elevated, airy, and seclusive site, aesthetic design, and general elegance of construction constitute its building features.

Equipment: The conveniences of this hospital consist of the following: A dispensary; 4 main wards and 13 private wards; two canvas porches and one sun porch; a main operating room and a minor operating room; an operating sterilizing room; an X-ray room; a delivering room and a recovery room; a doctor's room; a surgeon's room; a matron's room; a laboratory and drug room; a morgue; a kitchen and a diet kitchen; patients and nurses' dining rooms; a women nurses' room; a bedding sterilizing room; laundry, ironing, and sewing rooms; a nurses' home.

Staff, etc.: One surgeon, three physicians and assistant surgeons; matron, three women nurses, and two men nurses; three orderlies, cook, dishwasher, and waitress.

Benefits: Employees are entitled to dispensary and home treatment and to hospital treatment. Members of families of married employees are entitled to dispensary and home treatment.

First-aid lecture courses and practice is given to all underground bosses, and all bosses are provided with first-aid material for applying first-aid bandages to injured employees.

Educational lectures by the chief surgeon on sex hygiene and on precautions to be taken to prevent contagious diseases.

Free vaccination against smallpox and typhoid fever.

Sanitary inspection of the camp by a sanitary inspector under the direction of the chief surgeon.

MINE VENTILATION.

For the purpose of adding to the comfort of underground employees, and also to increase their working efficiency, forced ventilation by fans is practiced in this mine for cooling the workings and carrying off the noxious gases produced by blasting.

FIRE PROTECTION.

Underground.—The mine is protected from fire disasters by the following provisions: Three exit shafts; underground fire lines, fire hoses, and hand extinguishers; fire doors; sprinkler systems on all timber-head frames; helmet crews.

Surface.—Spacious design, fireproof construction, many exits, and uncrowded working conditions guard all main work buildings against fire catastrophes.

For dwelling houses and other frame structures the camp is equipped with a high-pressure fire pump, fire lines, fire monitors, chemical engines and hose carts, a fire-signaling system, and a voluntary fire brigade.

RECREATION.

Social hall.—For the diversion of employees during leisure hours, and also to detract them from the unwholesome pastime indulgences catered to in the mining town, a social building has been erected in the dwelling-house community. This building is equipped with a reading and lounging room, pool tables, and shower baths, and is conducted under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. Social entertainments are given periodically herein for the benefit of the workingmen's families. The cost of construction, as also the running expenses hereof, is borne by the company.

Club house.—Further to provide for wholesome recreation there is now under consideration the erection of a club house which is to incorporate features not existent in the aforementioned social hall built during the early non-productive stage of the property. The added features comprise a ballroom, card room, bowling alleys, and swimming pool. The cost of the building will be donated by the company, its equipment furnished by a fund obtained through an initiation fee of $25 by members, and running expenses are to be provided by monthly dues.

Tennis club.—The use of tennis grounds, comprising two courts, is available by employees for a membership fee of $5 and nominal dues for upkeep of courts.

Band.—A bandmaster is employed by the company for the development of local talent and a band house has been erected for its use. Concerts are rendered by the band to the community during the summer season, and it also furnishes music for the social entertainments of the social hall.

FINANCIAL WELFARE.

Profit sharing.—At designated periods all employees have the privilege of subscribing to the company's stock at a nominal quotation, to an extent optional with the employee, but with a prescribed maximum limit proportional to the wage or salary earned. The salient features of this plan are as follows:

Rights and interests of the subscriptions rest with the decision of the board of directors of the company.

Payments are made in monthly installments not exceeding 25 per cent of the wage or salary earned.

Declared dividends are credited as subscription payments and interest on deferred payments is charged at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

When the subscription is fully paid the stock is issued to the subscriber and he therefore obtains the same rights of disposal as the ordinary stockholder. As an inducement to retain the stock, a bonus of $1 per share per year for a period of five years is offered him while he remains in the employ of the company.

Subscriptions are canceled: (a) At the request of the subscriber; (b) by subscriber leaving service of the company; (c) whenever subscription payments have been discontinued without the consent of the company for a period of three months.

Upon cancellation of the subscription the payments by the subscriber are returned with interest at 5 per cent per annum, but the dividends credited to the subscription are reclaimed.

Mutual savings.—With the object of fostering the habit of saving and also teaching the policy of sane investment, a mutual savings society was formed for employees. Herein a member makes a committed monthly deposit, the sum of which is invested in bonds of proven merit. When the deposits of a member have accumulated to $1,000 he withdraws a bond of $1,000 denomination.

Accident compensation.—Compensation is paid all employees incapacitated by injuries resulting from accidents, in compliance with a workman's compensation law enacted by the State legislature. Thereby a remuneration of 50 per cent of the workman's earnings is provided for injuries causing disability exceeding 14 days, with a maximum compensation of $4,000. In carrying out the provisions of this law, compensation is paid to employees of this company for all disabilities, including those of less duration than the prescribed 14 days.

MINIMUM-WAGE LAW.

I believe in the minimum-wage law, but all these matters should be worked out by experts. I have not studied it in detail, but have given some thought to the general problem and, therefore, only care to state my general views. I think it is a sound policy if confined at the start to certain underpaid industries. It seems to me that if the minimum is not made too high it may in those cases be possible to secure wages more adequate to the needs of the workers without reducing the consumption of goods produced by such workers and thus indirectly throwing a large number out of work. Any too radical provisions might prejudice such legislation by causing serious economic readjustments, whereas if done in a conservative way it might work quite some benefit. I understand that experience has shown pretty thoroughly that where minimum-wage legislation has been enacted conservatively and with a view to proper economic necessities, it has been quite effective and successful in standardizing wages in the industries covered by such legislation and protecting those wage earners that are unable to bargain collectively.

STATEMENT OF MR. JAMES MORGAN.

CHEYENNE, WYO., March 12, 1914.

UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS,

Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

GENTLEMEN: At the hearing of your commission recently in the city of New York I was asked to make answer to a questionnaire submitted to me to be used in connection with testimony I expected to give. The hearing concluded without my testimony, but I am informed that you desire the submission of the answers responsive to the questions. Herewith please find the same inclosed. If further answers are desired I shall be glad to respond to your request.

Respectfully,

JAMES MORGAN.

Question. State your name, residence, and occupation.

Answer. James Morgan, Cheyenne, Wyo., secretary-treasurer of district No. 22, United Mine Workers of America.

Question. How long have you been secretary-treasurer for the United Mine Workers of America?

Answer. Ten years.

Question. How long has the organization of the United Mine Workers of America been in existence in Wyoming?

Answer. Organized in April, 1903; nearly 12 years.

Question. Can you state the circumstances under which the United Mine Workers organized in Wyoming, and what the attitude both of labor and of capital was toward such organization?

Answer. There were really two periods of organization in Wyoming, the northern, or what is called "the Sheridan field," was organized in 1903, and the necessity for an organization among the miners was the same there as in every other coal field. Individually the miner could not hope to have any of the grievances he complained of adjusted, nor could he enjoy the liberty guaranteed to every citizen in an economic or political way. Too much activity in favor of certain political parties was, if persisted in, likely to result in his discharge, as was equally true of spending money in stores outside the mining camp, and the only store in the camp was the company store. The grievances were, we might say, those that are common to unorganized fields, 10 hours and 12 hours were the day's work, wages were low, practically nothing was paid for dead work, there was no check weighman, and the weights were always a source of complaint. After several attempts at various times the men organized and the company which operated the mines at that time discharged or rather closed down the mine in which the men worked. Fortunately at this time the company changed hands, and the new management recognized the organization, agreed to hear and adjust complaints through the organization, and in January, 1904, entered into the first written contract.

In the southern field, where two-thirds of the miners of the State are employed, the organization was effected in 1907. The wage scale of the organized miners of the northern field was higher and the conditions of employment better, so, naturally, the men desired organization, and this was finally accomplished, and, while it resulted in a two weeks' suspension in this field, due to the fact that the management in charge at that time were opposed to organization among their employees and discharged all men who joined, a new manager was selected who had dealt with the organization in other fields, and he agreed that men could join the organization without discrimination on the part of the company. This was in May, 1907. In August, 1907, a joint conference was held and an agreement reached for the entire State, in which the operators of both the northern and the southern part of the State took part. This agreement granted an increase in wages, the eight-hour day, recognition of the union, the check off, and laid down the basis for all future agreements.

Question. Are the coal operators of Wyoming working under contract with the United Mine Workers of America; and if so, how long have these contractual relations been in effect?

Answer. Yes; contracts have been made in the northern field since 1904, and in the southern field since 1907.

Question. Under what conditions are the contracts agreed upon? State the customary procedure when the terms of the written contract are discussed.

Answer. Each contract provides a certain time, prior to the expiration of the agreement then in effect, when the representatives of the operators and of the miners shall meet to discuss the terms upon which another contract may be based. The miners meet in their own convention, where delegates from every mining camp take part in the drafting of the agreement they desire to have go into effect. The operators likewise meet together, and when each conference has finished its work there is a joint meeting, at which the propositions are submitted and a joint scale committee is selected, the miners selecting their own representatives and the operators doing the same. This joint committee meets and they go over the scale and eventually report back to the joint meeting the scale they have agreed upon. If this is ratified by each side, then the officers are empowered to sign. If the scale is not satisfactory, the joint committee again takes up the objectionable features and attempt to work out a proposition that can be mutually agreed to, until finally a proposition is evolved that meets with the approval of the majority of representatives of both sides, each acting in their own convention separately.

Question. Has there been any trouble, industrially speaking, between the operators and workers over wages or other conditions in the coal mines of Wyoming?

Answer. The only general trouble occurred in 1908, when there was a three weeks' suspension. In that year the operators' association demanded a reduction in wages. This was opposed by the miners, and after three weeks' idleness a new contract was negotiated, the old agreement in every particular with the exception of the wage of tippie men. There has been no general trouble since, and, with but two exceptions, no serious local trouble, and both cases were adjusted strictly on the agreement then in effect.

Question. Are you familiar with the activities of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in Wyoming? If so, state what they are.

Answer. Yes. They own and operate the iron mines at Sunrise, which produce many thousands of tons of iron ore each year which they ship to the smelters at Pueblo.

Question. Are you familiar with any record for evading the payment of taxes existing among the public records of the State of Wyoming with reference to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? If so, have you copies of those records?

Answer. Yes. In the issue of October 23, 1914, the Wyoming Labor Journal (Exhibit A) called attention to the fact that this company had, according to the report of Tax Commissioner McGill, represented that the gross value of their iron ore produced was to a cent the exact cost of production, and as the Wyoming law provides that working properties shall be assessed by the ton of gross output, "after deducting the expense incurred in production," this left no value to assess. I am submitting a copy of the report of Tax Commissioner John McGill (Exhibit B), of Wyoming, made to the board of equalization on July 31, 1912. This report shows up clearly the policy of tax evasion and in no uncertain terms says "that either the board of directors are deliberately and willfully making false and erroneous statements to the shareholders or that the company's agents in Wyoming, by their affidavits as to the value for taxation of the company's property in Wyoming, are guilty of the grossest kind of perjury."

Commissioner McGill also says in this report "that as the law requires him to make an appraisal of this property, that after deducting the expense incurred in operation, he appraises it at $2.07 per ton and recommends that it be assessed at not less than $2.07 per ton."

I also submit a statement of the taxes paid by this company (Exhibit C) and the amount that would have been paid had the recommendations of Mr. McGill been followed. The comparison is for the years of 1912, 1913, and 1914. This statement, however, also shows what this ore was assessed at since 1907, and the statement that it was assessed at but 22 cents per ton for the year 1908 and 33 cents per ton for the years 1909 and 1910 speaks for itself as to the manner in which taxes were paid to the State on ore as valuable as their Wyoming ore. Prior to 1908 the assessment was even as low as 11 cents per ton for certain years.

Question. Are you able to compare the Wyoming scale of wages under contract with the operators of that State with the Colorado scale of wages, where there is no contract?

Answer. I do not know what the scale is in Colorado for the various wage classifications, but believe that even the Colorado operators will acknowledge that the Wyoming contract is higher than they pay; in fact, one of the miners' demands in Colorado was that they be paid the Wyoming day-wage rate.

Question. What is the length of the working-day in Wyoming and in Colorado in their respective coal mines?

Answer. The Wyoming miners have worked under the eight-hour agreement since September 1, 1907. The Colorado operators, I believe, inaugurated the eight-hour day only after the recent strike started in that State in the southern field.

Question. Have you any figures showing the relative death rate in the coal mines of Wyoming under union conditions and in Colorado under nonunion conditions?

Answer. The reports of the United States Geological Survey for the years 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, and 1913 show that in those six years there were 773 men killed in the coal mines of Colorado and 242 men killed in the Wyoming coal mines. This would compare as follows: Number of men killed each year, average, in Colorado, 128½; in Wyoming 40½. Number of tons of coal produced for each fatal accident, average, in Colorado, 103,501 tons; in Wyoming, 197,305 tons. Number of men killed for each 1,000 employed, average, in Colorado, 9.07; in Wyoming, 5.37.

Question. Have you any figures showing the relative production of coal per man per year under union conditions in Wyoming and under nonunion conditions in Colorado?

Answer. The reports of the United States Geological Survey referred to above and for the same six years show that the production per man employed in and around the coal mines in the States of Wyoming and Colorado was, average for six years, in Wyoming, 883 tons per man; in Colorado, 779 tons per man.

Question. Do you know whether the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is holding valuable mineral lands in Wyoming without developing the same?

Answer. The Colorado Industrial Co., a subsidiary company of the C. F. & I. Co., is the owner of 8,199 acres of undeveloped coal land in Carbon County, classed by the United States Geological Survey as being among the most valuable coal lands of that county. And in connection with this company I desire to again quote from the report of State Tax Commissioner McGill: "Mr. Burdick appeared before the board of county commissioners of Carbon County on December 7, 1910, and made affidavit that 5,596 acres were grazing lands and should be assessed as such, and asked for and was granted a rebate of $103,526, making the value $60,454 instead of $163,980, as it should have been. These coal lands are near the old town of Carbon and, according to the United States Geological Survey, are among the most valuable in Carbon County."

Question. Do the miners of Wyoming desire the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to extend its activities in the Wyoming field?

Answer. We can only judge individuals or corporations by past records, and in passing judgment on the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. as a corporation men must work for we must necessarily look to the plants it has in operation and the condition of the men there employed to form an opinion as to whether it would be a desirable addition to the industrial corporations of this or any other State, and, considering the history it has made in its treatment of its men, its disregard for constitutional rights, its open and flagrant violation of laws, this company is itself a powerful and highly organized institution, employing thousands of men, with more than $100,000,000 of assets, and, considering its policy toward the desire of its employees to themselves organize for their mutual protection, and the brutal and illegal methods used to stamp out every vestige of organization among its men, I believe every miner in Wyoming would answer the question most emphatically in the negative. They would, in making this decision, consider all the matters mentioned above. They would also consider that for many years they had maintained their organization in this State; that their employers had recognized it, and through the medium of the joint agreement a means had been agreed to whereby every grievance could be heard and considered and, if just, rectified, because of the agreement, while industrial war had waged in the State of Colorado, where the C. F. & I. Co. dominated the mining situation. In this State industrial peace has been in effect. The entrance of this powerful corporation into the coal-mining industry of Wyoming with its attitude toward the miners' organization as proven by the two great coal strikes in our sister State of Colorado leaves no doubt in the mind of any thinking man that it would spell the end of peace in the mining industry and with the bloody history of Ludlow fresh in our minds we do not wish to see the women and children of our State subjected to the horrors of another Colorado war. That this company has no more regard for law here than in other States is proved by the report of the tax commissioner; and in their mines at Sunrise and Chicago while the State law provides that eight hours is the legal work day underground and the coal miners of the State work but eight hours at their iron mines the 10-hour day is still in effect. This proves that the leopard has not changed its spots. In connection with this statement I am submitting extracts from the Wyoming Labor Journal of the issues of October 23 and 30, 1914 (Exhibit A), dealing with the evasion of taxes and the wages and hours of the miners employed in and around the iron mines at Sunrise and Chicago.

I also submit a copy of the report of Tax Commissioner John McGill, made to the board of equalization, July 31, 1912 (Exhibit B), and statements of taxes paid for the years of 1912, 1913, and 1914 and what those taxes should have been on the basis of the report of the tax commissioner, and this statement further shows the miserably low value assessed against this iron ore for the years of 1906, 1909, and 1910 (Exhibit C). Also attached is extracts from the minutes of the State board of equalization, in their meetings on April 11, June 8, July 1, and July 9, 1914 (Exhibit D). These meetings cover the period whereby the taxes on iron ore was raised to $1.15 per ton and again reduced to $1 per ton.

IRON AND STEEL INTERESTS OF MONEY KING PLAY FAVORITE GAMES OF "GOUGE THE WORKERS" AND "SKIN THE PEOPLE"—A TRAIL OF PERJURY AND DECEIT.

CHAPTER I.

[Wyoming Labor Journal, Oct. 23, 1914.]

Large corporations are a necessary accompaniment of the development of industry. It is as idle to howl at corporations, as such, as it would be to howl at the machine in industry. Corporations are as different as individuals, however. Some corporations will abide by the laws of the State and Nation, relying on their size and ability to produce and market in large quantities any given product for their profitable operations. Others are like those mentally dwarfed individuals who are opposed to the regulations of society, and from their very beginning are active in setting aside all laws and defying all customs. The only point of difference is that lawless aggregations of capital engage the services of capable lawyers, whose duty it is, not to see that they keep within the law, but that they can keep out of its clutches while disobeying its mandates.

To this class of corporations belongs the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., that gigantic industrial holding of the Rockefellers whose activities in Colorado and Wyoming are listed among the largest operations in these fast-growing States. With a far-sightedness common to those who covet the great natural resources of the land, they early "allotted" to themselves the choicest acres of Colorado's coal and iron deposits, till it is safe to say that at a reasonable appreciation of the value of these holdings it would aggregate into the hundreds of millions of dollars. Intrenched behind their control of these resources for countless years, they will continue to levy tribute on all society. The individual or corporation that is in control of the great natural resources of any State is in control of that State.

They have not alone harvested great wealth by reason of their ownership of the large area of coal and iron lands, but have been aided in this by the criminally low wages they have paid in mine as well as in their steel works at Pueblo, where wages range from $1.55 for a 10-hour day "up." Also having fortified themselves with friendly officials in the counties in which their largest properties are located they pay but little taxes. By these devious ways that are common knowledge to those gentlemanly pirates of the law who delve in the law for the purpose of defying its purposes they succeed in evading payment of the major portion of their assessments.

The small property owner, he or she who has by many sacrifices gathered together a little home (with a rear yard large enough to accommodate a dozen hens and a small coal house) perchance are burdened by their heavy assessments. But for these there is little relief, for the hands of a blind justice, while it deals tardily with the malefactor, and views with a lenient mind the plant of these for a tax reduction, pays but scant heed to the "small fry." To refuse to pay these taxes means, for the small holder, future grief and inconvenience in the way of tax sales and final dispossession. In what contrast to this system is the method employed by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in their tax cases.

The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. operates the iron mines at Sunrise and Chicago iron mines, both located in Platte County, Wyo., as well as the Colorado & Wyoming Railroad, connecting the mines with the Colorado & Southern at Hartville Junction. Besides these very profitable properties this company also owns 8,199 acres of desirable coal lands in Carbon County. This coal land is not under development as yet, for their Colorado holdings lying closer to the steel plant are more available. But coal land will keep, and some day in the future the company can open these rich veins, which will have cost them next to nothing, and all the time that intervenes will but add to the value of this holding.

We will now show you that with all this tangible evidence of wealth this company does not, nor will it unless compelled to, pay a tithe of the tax it should pay. To begin with the ore that is mined at Chicago mines and Sunrise is known as the highest grade of iron ore; its nearest rival in this respect being the ore from the Mesabi Range in Minnesota, also owned by the Rockefellers. The Mesabi Range ore runs 1 per cent less in metallic moisture, to all intents and purposes being worth less by considerable than their Wyoming ore.

For the year ending December 31, 1911, this company's mines, then located in Laramie County, showed a total production of 565,082.90 tons of ore, the gross value of which they represented to be $375,142.79, and "by strange coincidence," as Tax Commissioner McGill says in a report to the State equalization board, "The expense incurred in production is exactly the same amount to a cent; a fraction less than 67 cents a ton."

Why did they go to the trouble to commit this perjury? In an attempt to evade the payment of State taxes?

The Wyoming law provides that working properties shall be assessed by the ton of gross output, "after deducting the expenses incurred in production." If their statement had been taken at its face value, there would have been no taxes paid. It was finally assessed at 60 cents a ton, or a total value, for taxation purposes, of $203,698.44. They paid total taxes of $4,231.34 for that year.

Tax Commissioner McGill tried to have the State board of equalization place the value of ore at $2.07 a ton, a very reasonable rate when it is considered that Mesabi ore of an inferior grade has had a market value at the eastern steel mills since 1905 at $4.34 a ton.

In 1913 the equalization board, responsive to public demands (and the inconsistency of Tax Commissioner John McGill) raised the value of iron ore from 60 cents a ton to 90 cents, and it was on this basis that they paid their taxes. This was not adequate, and demands were still being made for a higher rate. Finally, at a meeting of this board, held on April 11, this year, when the board met to place an assessment for valuation purposes on the mine and oil-well output of the State, on a motion by Houx, seconded by Forsyth, iron ore was assessed at $1.15 a ton. This was still far too small for justice, but too large for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., for at the meeting of the board on June 8, they were represented in force by C. W. Burdick, their Wyoming lawyer, and a Mr. Gilchrist.

At this meeting Burdick vainly tried to get the newspaper men and others excluded, and an executive session of the board. Houx refused his consent to any "star chamber" session on what was the people's business, so Burdick was compelled to see the rates sustained till another meeting of the board, set for July 1. Tax Commissioner McGill served notice at this June meeting that if there was to be a meeting on July 1 for the purpose of taking up the protests over dissatisfied assessments he wanted to appear for the people. We are not surprised to hear then that a majority of the board found it convenient to be absent on July 1. On the 9th, however, McGill having been called to the north part of the State, in the meantime we find the board in session as usual. At this meeting (no protestants being marked present, they having evidently fixed their grievances beforehand) Forsyth moved a reduction of the C. F. & I. iron schedule to $1 a ton, Houx voting "No." Cambria Fuel to 60 cents a ton and oil to 50 cents a barrel (we will have something to say of these two reductions in a later issue). So we see that, because the C. F. & I. is Rockefeller, their $2.07 ore is worth only $1 for purposes of taxation.

In plain terms the people are being defrauded out of 50 per cent of the taxes this company should pay, because the majority of the board of equalization favor such reduction. We are not partisan to this matter. The statement is based on the minutes of this board.

Now, we will see what this company is doing in Platte County, the company's mines being in the newly created county. Last week the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. tendered $3,400 in full payment of their taxes for which they stand assessed $8,400, and have instituted action for an injunction restraining County Treasurer Agnew from taking the usual action for collection. This $3,400 is their assessment on a production of 601,564 tons of iron ore based on a value, as set by the State, of $1 per ton.

In their protest directed at Platte County officials, this company states that the actual value of their ore is 82 cents a ton (this same ore they reported as valueless in 1912), but that they will pay only a value of 41 cents, or one-half of their own valuation. Surely this gall is without precedent, and their defiance of law is unparalleled. They commit perjury without any hesitation for they know (and they know that the people know) that their ore is equal in value, at least, to the Mesabi Range ore of less metallic value, and this ore they paid $6.75 a ton for in the quantity of 70,000 tons at their Pueblo plant.

This company should be compelled to pay, not on a value of $1.15, as set by the board and later lowered, but on the actual commercial value of the ore at the mine, which is $2.07. The specious plea was made that these reductions in value were made to "encourage inside capital." If the State is to be impoverished, its resources exploited, and the people to get nothing in return, let outside capital stay out. Wyoming is rich in undeveloped resources, rather ten thousand times that they remain undeveloped than that our children and their children should be robbed of their fruitage.

The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. states that they always abide by the law, and they are defying even a modest assessment through their Wyoming mouthpiece lawyer, Burdick. They are actually stealing from the children of to-morrow with the aid and connivance of State officials sworn to uphold the law.

Regardless of the fact that the new law raised the taxable value of the State from $69,000,000 to $186,000,000, or 270 per cent, while—again referring to Commissioner McGill's statement—the net increase on the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. holdings was 18 per cent, and still they kick.

On their Carbon County coal lands, assessed at $20 an acre, Burdick secured an abatement on 5,596 acres of the 8,199 as "grazing land"—a rebate of $108,526 in value on this rich coal area, leaving the State a paltry valuation of $60,454 for taxation purposes. Can you blame the people for accusing the company of perjury in this connection? If misrepresentation is in accordance with law, this company is law-abiding.

There is a law on the statute books of the State that provides an eight-hour day for all underground works, yet this company works its miners and laborers at Sunrise and Chicago mines a 10-hour day; is this obedience to the law?

There we see the Rockefeller C. F. & I. not only evading taxation by misrepresentation and perjury, but we also see them working men from $1.75 to $3.50 a day of 10 hours—10 hours in the case of some $2.75 men—that coal miners are paid a minimum of from $2.50 to $3.30 an eight-hour day for doing. Are they law-abiding? Are they real builders of the State?

We are confronted with the same greed for profits, the same illegal operation and evasion of legal taxes that has made them rich and powerful—and hated—in Colorado.

CHAPTER II.

[Wyoming Labor Journal, Oct. 30, 1914.]

For the year ending December 31, 1911, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. mined and shipped a total of 565,082.90 tons of iron ore from its Wyoming mines at Sunrise and Chicago mines, then in Laramie County. On this the company returned a production cost of the same amount or a fraction less than 67 cents a ton, maintaining by reason of this showing that there existed no net value for taxation purposes! On this ore they were assessed at the rate of 60 cents a ton. This rate is inequitable, as it could well be and not incite the people to mutiny.

A lengthy investigation by Tax Commissioner John McGill convinced him that a value of $2.07 at the mines was a fair value to place on the ore for taxation purposes. The majority of the State equalization board were made to see different by Mr. Burdick, legal representative of this Rockefeller corporation, for we find that the following year, when they raised the value it was worth but 90 cents a ton. In April of this year McGill had the rate raised to $1.15 a ton, a rate that was reduced at a July meeting when this same McGill was away.

Now about your State board of equalization. It is presumed to be the final arbiter on matters affecting taxable values. Composed of the State treasurer, auditor of state, and secretary of state, it is presumed to represent the majesty of the people and to adjudge a fair value for taxation purposes. In the construction of any department the people assume that State officials holding membership on any board, by virtue of their office, will be "on the job" to see that justice is done to the most humble individual, but that the largest aggregation will not be allowed privileges beyond what can be defended as just.

This is the theory of all government.

The State board of equalization is an administrative board and it is also judicial in its character inasmuch as it is given latitude in determining what is equitable under the law in the matter of appraisements. It is presumed no individual or corporate body will be compelled to bear more than a just share of the burden and, inferentially, that no such individual or corporation bears less than its share of taxation.

In Wyoming we are confronted with the fact that this State board has been more than lenient in the case of the Rockefeller holdings.

Taking the output for this company during 1911, for example: 565,082.90 tons should have been assessed for taxation purposes at $2.07 a ton, or $1,169,721.60. They were really assessed at 60 cents, or $339,049.65. A total value for which they were not taxed of $830,671.95.

In 1913 they produced 501,564 tons valued at, based at $2.07 a ton, $1,245,237.48. Value raised by board to $1, or $601,564. Ore values produced in excess of those taxed, $643,673.48. This is a total of $1,474,345.43 in values, based on a conservative estimate, for only two years of its operation, that this corporation has defrauded the people of the State out of taxes on.

And even this miserably inadequate value of $1 per ton they are contesting in the courts of Platte County. They say now that the ore has a value of 82 cents a ton and that they will only pay on a value of one-half, or 41 cents a ton. They can well say that so long as they can manipulate the courts and control elected officials they care not who elects them.

Also, there should be added the rebate of $103,526 that was lifted off the value of their Carbon County coal lands by the county commissioners of that county for 1910, a proceeding that has made them another neat little sum by the saving of taxes on this sum for the last four years on $414,104. This makes a total amount for the years specified of $1,888,449.43 of tangible property that has not paid taxes. Who can say what the total amount would be for all the years they have been in business?

Do you blame them for being in politics when the pickings are so rich? Can you blame them for retaining Mr. Burdick and their able counsel when their eloquence can produce such results? Nor has the half been told. There are the valuable realty holdings in Chicago mines and Sunrise, for which they collect ample rent and for which they pay a miserably low tax. There are the miners and laborers working at Sunrise and Chicago mines for from $1.75 to $3.50 a 10 and 12 hour day.

The operating coal companies working under agreement with the mine workers of Wyoming pay a minimum wage of $2.50 outside and $3.30 inside for an eight-hour day. In other words, the coal operators pay a minimum of 31.25 cents an hour outside; the C. F. & I. iron mines pay a minimum of 17.5 cents an hour outside; C. F. & I. minimum lower than coal mines, 13.75 cents for outside labor; the coal operators pay a minimum of 41.25 cents an hour inside; the C. F. & I. pay a minimum of 22.50 cents per hour inside; C. F. & I. minimum lower than coal mines, 18.75 cents for inside labor.

In other words, company employees in the coal mines of Wyoming receive as much per hour as one underground worker and one top laborer at the iron mines.

Nor is this all. The C. F. & I. iron camps are "closed" camps. No unions are allowed, deductions are made for hospitals and doctors, and the men have nothing to say about the matter of disbursing the fund. A company store caters to the wants of the miners at a rate not dictated by outside competition. Mr. L. M. Bowers, himself an ex-divine, Rockefeller director in the C. F. & I. directorate, hinted in an article in Leslie's that his company paid particular attention to their employees' advantages, educational and spiritual. For this reason we suppose no word of protest escapes the camps at the methods.

There is a law on our statute books that eight hours shall constitute a day's work in all underground workings. There are underground workings at Sunrise and Chicago mines, and the shortest day is 10 hours. Is this law obedience?

EXHIBIT B.

CHEYENNE, WYO., July 31, 1912.

To the honorable State Board of Equalization.

GENTLEMEN: The report of the output of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.'s Sunrise and Chicago iron mines in Laramie County for the year ending December 31, 1911, shows a total of 565,082.90 tons, the gross value of which is represented to be $375,142.97, and, by a singular coincidence, the expense incurred in production is exactly the same amount to a cent; a fraction less than 67 cents per ton. As the law provides that the gross value of the output, after deducting the expense incurred in production, shall be assessed, according to their statement there is absolutely no value left to be assessed. I don't believe the taxpayers of the State would think we were doing our duty if we accepted their report and allowed this valuable property to escape its just proportion of taxation.

As there are no other iron mines in operation in the State to compare values with, in order to be able to place a fair valuation on this ore, it will be necessary to find the selling price of iron ore of a like character elsewhere. The Mesabi Range ore of Minnesota comes nearest of any to being the same kind of ore that is mined at the Sunrise and Chicago mines in Wyoming. At our conference on June 8 we learned from Mr. Gilchrist, the general manager of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., that the Wyoming ore that was shipped averaged 56 per cent metallic iron and the moisture contained in it was 6 per cent, while the selling price of Mesabi Range ore was on a basis of 55 per cent metallic ore and the percentage of moisture 11.39 per cent; so that, while the percentage of metallic iron in the ores was about the same, the moisture contained in the Wyoming ore is about 6 per cent less than the Mesabi ore, making the Wyoming ore that much more valuable. So that it is not unfair to the C. F. & I. Co. to place their ore on the same base as Mesabi ore. In the hearings before the committee of investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, it is shown that the average price of Mesabi or, half Bessemer and half non-Bessemer, delivered at the iron and steel works in the Pittsburgh district, for the seven years from 1905 to 1911, inclusive, was $4.34 per ton of 2,000 pounds. The Engineering and Mining Journal of April 29, 1911, and the Mining and Engineering World of January 27, 1912, give the same price ($4.34) per ton, for the years 1911 and 1912. The Wyoming ore costs 67 cents per ton on cars at the mines, and the freight from the mines to Pueblo is $1.60 per ton; a total of $2.27 per ton delivered at their works, as against $4.34 per ton for not quite so good a quality of ore delivered in the Pittsburgh district. It will be easily seen that $2.27 does not nearly represent the value of the ore. In comparison with Mesabi ore, the value of Wyoming ore would be as follows:

	Per ton.
Net value at mine.....	$2.07
Operating expense, or expense incurred in production.....	.67
Gross value at mine.....	2.74
Freight from mine to Pueblo.....	1.60
Total value delivered at iron works at Pueblo.....	4.34

By the foregoing table the net value or value at which it should be assessed is $2.07 per ton, instead of no net value whatever, as their report shows. In 1905 the C. F. & I. Co. shipped over 70,000 tons of Mesabi iron ore from Minnesota that cost them $6.75 per ton delivered at their works in Pueblo, but as that was a case of emergency, it would not be fair to take that price as a basis, but a net value of $2.07 per ton at mine, and a total value of $4.34 delivered at Pueblo is very conservative.

At one of our conferences Mr. Burdick, the company's agent, made the statement that the company in reporting their output included the amount of ore that runs less than 50 per cent iron and is not shipped, but piled in huge heaps near the mine, a statement that was contradicted by reports from the general freight agents of the Burlington & Missouri and Colorado & Southern Railways, showing that for the year ending December 31, 1910, there was shipped over these roads 291 tons of ore more than the C. F. & I. Co. report as their output for that period, showing conclusively that not a pound of that immense tonnage is included in their report. At our conference held on June 8, Mr. Burdick acknowledged he was mistaken, but I deem it my duty to mention the circumstances in this report, so that it may become a matter of record, and, when the company by concentration or otherwise is able to use it, it may be properly assessed as it should be.

I insert the following clipping from the Denver Times of March 29, 1912, to show the prosperous condition of this company:

"The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Colorado's biggest industrial and manufacturing corporation, has landed from the Rock Island system another big rail order, amounting to $300,000. The big rail mills at Pueblo are now running with full force, night and day, with double shifts of men, giving employment to thousands of laborers in this State and Wyoming.

"An officer of the company is authority for the statement that the corporation is maintaining its record for the past two years under the ownership of John D. Rockefeller, and is accumulating a big surplus. Its assets showed a greater increase in the six months ending on December 31, last, than they did for the entire year ending on June 30, 1911.

" OLD DEFICIT OVERCOME.

"The company had assets worth $62,254,005.86 at the close of business on June 30, 1911. This amount was increased to $63,653,159.42 during the next six months, a gain of $1,399,153.56. The company showed a surplus of $3,260,641.91 at the beginning of this year, a gain during the six months of $1,023,490.03. The full meaning of this showing is apparent when it is known that when Rockefeller took over the property it was showing a deficit."

I submit the following extracts from the reports of the board of directors to the shareholders of the C. F. & I. Co., to show the constantly increasing values of their mines in Wyoming. In the report for the year ending July 30, 1905, is the following:

"The value and extent of the Sunrise Iron mine is constantly improving under liberal prospecting with diamond drills, shafts and drifts, and the current production is steadily increasing. A still greater increase will be made possible, prior to October 1, by the completion of a branch railroad by the Burlington system to the north end of these properties, to what is known as the Chicago mine, where large bodies of both Bessemer and non-Bessemer ores have been proven, and from which shipments will be made in such quantities as transportation may be provided and the progress of the underground work will permit.

"Pending the full development of these valuable properties it has been found desirable to procure a quantity of iron ore from Lake Superior to enable your company to operate a sufficient number of its blast furnaces to meet the very generous demand for steel rails."

In the report for 1906 the following appears:

"The development at the iron ore properties at Fierro, N. Mex., and Chicago and Sunrise, Wyo., has progressed very satisfactory, and the quantity of ore now blocked out and in sight is in excess of that at any period in the history of the company. The work of expanding the supply of this class of raw material will continue, and it is now expected that enough iron ore will be shown to meet the growing demand for many years."

In the report for 1907 the following appears:

"The additional iron ore blocked out during the past year at the New Mexico and Wyoming properties greatly exceeds the consumption during that period and insures a larger supply than has heretofore been known to exist, thus removing all cause for doubt or anxiety about the ore reserves of the company."

In the report for 1909 the following appears:

To the stockholders:

Your executive officers decided early in the present year to have an appraisal of all the mines, lands, and property of the company and its subsidiaries, regardless of the original cost or book values, for the following reasons:

Much of the ore and coal lands were secured by the several companies now merged into the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., from 15 to 25 years ago and largely undeveloped. The valuation was mainly based upon outcroppings and at figures that were almost entirely speculative. Most of the properties that have been developed during these 25 years have proven to be immensely valuable.

When these properties were secured by purchase or merger there was but little demand for iron ore, and this now great industry was of but trifling importance. As late as 1900 the iron-ore properties developed at that time showed but about 6,000,000 tons, while in 1909 there is developed more than 35,000,000 tons. Estimates made by competent experts of your undeveloped iron properties give a tonnage which, with that already developed, is sufficient to supply the steel plant, running at its present capacity, for 50 or 60 years at least.

Since the entries made on the books during the past 25 years the iron industry has developed to enormous proportions and iron-ore properties are considered among the most valuable of minerals in the United States.

The development of your coal and coke properties during the same period of years shows a large increase in tonnage over former estimates. The large acreage of undeveloped coal lands warrants their being appraised at many millions more than the old book valuations. They are valuable assets for coal operations alone and a very important one in connection with the iron industry.

We have for reasons above stated proceeded to have valuations made without reference to the almost worthless entries made on the books so many years ago, and under conditions that have entirely changed between 1880 and 1909. While the old valuations have been in most instances increased we have cut down and wiped out for depreciation and for poor abandoned coal mines a very large amount. The estimated value of these properties by experts is more than that now placed upon them and submitted herewith.

We have for reasons above stated proceeded to have valuations made with your executive officers believe to be a conservative and proper valuation in 1909.

The report for 1910 shows, for that year, the total production of all the company's iron mines was 879,630 tons. Of this amount 735,423 tons, or over 83 per cent of the total, was mined in Wyoming.

These quotations are made to show how valuable these properties appear to be to the directors of the company. Your attention is particularly called to the quotation from the report for 1909. By the reappraisal $19,308,327.40 was added to the value for that year, but, so far as Wyoming is concerned, when it came to listing the company's property for taxation, we did not get a raise of 19 cents. On the contrary, Mr. Burdick appeared before your honorable body and asked that the value of the output for the year 1910 (the year following the $19,000,000 raise) be placed 10 per cent lower than the year 1909. And in Carbon County, after the coal lands (8,199 acres) of the Colorado Industrial Co., a subsidiary of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., had been listed by the assessor for the year 1910 at $20 per acre, making a total valuation of $163,980, Mr. Burdick, on December 7, 1910, made affidavit before the board of county commissioners that 5,506 acres were grazing lands and should be assessed as such, and asked for, and was granted, a rebate of $103,526, making the value $60,454 instead of $163,980, as it should have been. These coal lands are near the old town of Carbon and, according to the United States Geological Survey, are among the most valuable in Carbon County.

For the year 1910 the C. F. & I. Co. paid for State, county, and school purposes a total tax of less than 0.56 of a cent per ton on their output. It is easily seen that this valuable product must be greatly undervalued when it only pays a total tax of the ridiculously small sum of 0.56 of a cent per ton for each ton of ore that is taken out of our State, and while there may have been other reasons, I have no hesitancy in stating in this public manner that they have been able to evade taxation by reason of false and perjured statements of their agents as to the valuation of this property, and an effort should now be made to compel this Rockefeller corporation to pay more nearly its just proportion of the taxes of the State. When Mr. Houx requested them to furnish your honorable body with information as to the amount of iron ore, coal, coke, and limestone used and the cost of labor in producing a ton of steel rails, in order that your honorable body might be enabled to place a fair valuation on this ore, they refused, on the pretext that that would be giving their business secrets to their competitors.

In my report to you of June 2, 1911, it is shown that in 1908 the total assessed valuation of the State was $69,000,000; in 1909, under the new assessment law, it was $186,000,000; an average increase in value of 270 per cent on all the property of the State, while the net increase on this property was only about 18 per cent. The same report shows that since 1905 the freight from mines to Pueblo has been reduced 95 cents per ton, making the net value that much more.

In considering the reports of the board of directors to the shareholders of the company and the affidavits of Mr. Writer, the auditor of the company, and Mr. Burdick, the company's agent or attorney, there is only one of two conclusions that can be properly arrived at. Either the directors of the company are deliberately and willfully making false and erroneous statements to the shareholders, as the United States Steel Co.'s directors were accused of doing and for which that company is now being investigated by a special committee, or Mr. Writer and Mr. Burdick, by their affidavits as to the value for taxation of the company's property in Wyoming, are guilty of the grossest kind of perjury.

It is in obedience to law that I make you this report, and as the same law requires me to make appraisal of this property, I hereby appraise the value of the gross output (565,082.90 tons), after deducting the expense incurred in operation, at $2.07 per ton, and recommend that it be assessed at not less than $2.07 per ton.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN MCGILL,
Commissioner of Taxation.

EXHIBIT D.

[Extracts from minutes of meetings of State Board of Equalization, State of Wyoming.]

CHEYENNE, WYO., April 11, 1914.

The board met on above date pursuant to adjournment of April 4 for the purpose of placing a valuation for assessment purposes on the mine and oil-well output of the State.

Full board present.

A full discussion of values followed and among numerous other of above-named industries the valuation on iron and copper ore and the oil-well output.

Colorado Fuel & Ore Co.: Iron ore, $1.15 per ton; copper ore, $42.75 per ton.

After discussion of the valuations of the oil-well output, it was, by motion, decided to place the valuation for taxation purposes at $1 per barrel.

CHEYENNE, WYO., June 8, 1914.

President of the board stated the meeting was called to give a hearing to all parties who might protest on valuation of oil, coal, etc.

Numerous protests were read, also a number of affidavits in regard to the valuation of oil.

The board was then addressed by Mr. Schuyler, representing the Midwest Oil Co.; by Judge William Metz, representing the Wyoming Crude Oil Co., the Castle Creek Oil Co., and the California Oil Co.; by Mr. E. J. Sullivan, representing the Basin Oil & Gas Co.; by Mr. Fisher, consulting oil expert; by Mr. C. W. Burdick, representing the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.; by Mr. Gilchrist, representing the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., who by tables and analysis showed the valuation of iron ore compared with other ores of the Michigan and other mines.

The board adjourned without taking any action until July 1, 1914.

CHEYENNE, July 1, 1914.

No quorum being present, the meeting was adjourned subject to call of the president.

CHEYENNE, July 9, 1914.

The president stated that at this meeting the question of the valuation on the product of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and the oil output of the State and others on which protests had been made should be settled, and the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That after full consideration of the showing made by the producers of coal, oil, and iron, the petitions of many citizens of the State, and affidavits filed by operators and by experts relating to valuation of coal, oil, and iron, that the ends of justice and the best interests of the State will be subserved by the board reconsidering the action on April 11, 1914, as regards valuations of the Cambria Fuel Co., Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and the oil output of the State, and that the same be placed as follows:

Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., $1 per ton; oil output, $0.50 per barrel.

A vote on the above resolution was—yes 2 and no 1.

So far as known, the above resolution was based on statements made before the board on June 8 by men representing the different companies interested. Read what the State tax commissioner has to say in regard to these valuations.

You may also refer to this report of the tax commissioner for proof of statements made in the article printed in the Wyoming Labor Journal under dates of October 23, 30, and November 26.

STATEMENT OF MR. BENJAMIN C. MARSH.

FEBRUARY 4, 1915.

Mr. BASIL M. MANLY,
United States Commission on Industrial Relations,
Metropolitan Building, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. MANLY: Inclosed please find a copy of the statement which I shall give before your commission to-morrow or Saturday, if I am given the opportunity.

Very truly, yours,

BENJAMIN C. MARSH.

The most important task before this country is to exterminate those forms of privilege for the few which mean inevitably poverty and misery for the many, no matter how sober and thrifty those many may be. The chief privileges of the country are land monopoly, control of credits, high protective tariffs, and franchises. That there are other secondary forms of legalized graft, such as patents, proprietary medicines, etc., is freely admitted.

All "foundations" in this country were secured from one or more of these chief privileges; and it is not in the nature of things that the Sage, Carnegie, and Rockefeller Foundations should seek to terminate the legalized robbery by which their founders have amassed their fortunes, although of course they might do so. They have not, however; and on the contrary, at least the sage Foundation, has, through its dominating director, Mr. Robert W. De Forrest, opposed any effort to exterminate fundamental privilege. The avowed purpose of the Sage Foundation is false and misleading. It does not exist "for the improvement of social and living conditions in the United States of America."

Neither the Sage nor the Rockefeller Foundations dare attack any fundamental economic evil; they prefer to mislead and fool the public as to the causes of poverty, which they regard, or pretend to regard, as personal.

For several years I have been working to secure a referendum on heavier taxation of land values in New York City—called by the land speculators themselves the "Paradise of land speculators. In 1912 Mr. Lawrence Veiller, the director of the tenement house committee of the charity organization society of which Mr. Robert W. De Forrest is president, appears against the proposal at a legislative hearing in Albany, while that committee also refused to indorse the proposal in 1911, as being of no importance. In the spring of 1912 I called upon Mr. De Forrest at his office, and asked him why the charity organization society and the Russell Sage Foundation opposed untaxing buildings and taxing land values. He replied that it was a very dangerous thing to do, and that he would fight it. I assured him that I would fight him then, if he were seeking to perpetuate privilege. What methods he has adopted to oppose breaking up land monopoly, I do not know.

Foundations, such as the Carnegie, Sage, and Rockefeller, have no place in a democracy. They are attempting to usurp the functions of government. That the Government should wait for a private foundation to investigate hook worm, cancer, or loan sharks is a worse indictment of our democracy than the most flagrant boodling of Tweed or Quay.

I believe that the effect of these foundations has been most harmful in two respects:

First. They have misled the public as to fundamental causes of poverty.

Second. They have detracted attention from the fact that these causes of poverty must be removed by governmental action, and that voters must require government to remove these causes.

Incidentally, they have taken much of the manhood out of the agents of private charities. What do any of the great foundations claim to have done or what do they plan to do to exterminate privilege?

Fortunately, however, the malign influences of these and similar foundations is passing away, as the public realizes that they are merely the stool pigeons of privilege. The people are turning to the proper power to secure economic justice—government.

I want to urge upon the commission that the most important measure to secure more employment, and automatically to shorten the working day and improve the conditions of labor generally, is to tax land, mines, etc., into proper productive use. The immediate establishment of a national labor exchange is, of course, vital, but when land speculators are forced to use their land or let others do so, necessity will be a very effective mother and devise ways of getting the jobless man on the job.

We should have relatively little desititution of the grinding sort, constantly recurring in our cities and even small towns, if three-quarters or even two-thirds of the country's population were self-sustaining on small farms.

STATEMENT OF MR. CONRAD RENO.

PARTNERSHIP EQUALITY OF REWARD BETWEEN CAPITAL AND LABOR.

A SCIENTIFIC DIVISION OF PROFITS OR JOINT EARNINGS, BETWEEN CAPITAL AND LABOR.

[Reply to Mr. Brandeis.]

In reply to the statement of Mr. Louis D. Brandeis before the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations on January 23, 1915, that a scientific division of profits between capital and labor was not feasible because it was necessarily a matter of bargaining, allow me to outline a plan of capital-and-labor partnership, which, I believe, would result in a scientific division of the joint earnings between the capital partners and the labor partners, and which would be entirely feasible.

The feasibility of the proposed plan has been indorsed by President Emeritus Eliot, of Harvard, and by Sir George Livesay, of London, and many others. Will the plan effect a scientific division of their joint earnings between capital and labor?

The partnership plan is to make all the net earnings in excess of living wages for the labor partners and living dividends of, say, 6 per cent for the capital partners, the joint partnership property of all the industrial partners of each industrial partnership, and to divide such joint partnership property between labor and capital in the ratio of living wages to living dividends.

Thus, if the living wages equal in amount the living dividends for the same time, the joint partnership property will be divided between labor and capital in the ratio of 1 to 1, or equal shares to the two classes of partners. If the living wages amount to more (or less) than the living dividends, the division of the joint partnership property between labor and capital in the same ratio of living wages to living dividends would also result in partnership equality of reward, and thus effect a scientific division of the joint earnings.

Partnership equality of reward for capital and labor is the ideal condition in industry toward which we are gravitating. Such partnership equality of reward would make for a larger output of goods by the labor partners because it recognizes their equality of right with the capital partners in their joint product. A larger output would make it feasible to increase the reward of labor without decreasing the reward of capital and without increasing the cost of living.

Mr. Brandeis is right in saying that a condition of inequality between the two forces of capital and labor exists, and that even strong labor unions are not equal to the industrial trusts in bargaining power. If the division of the joint earnings between labor and capital is to be left entirely to bargaining between the parties, partnership equality of reward will be difficult if not impossible of achievement, because the side which possesses the greater bargaining power will get the best of the bargain and thus produce inequality of reward. Where great inequality of bargaining power exists the law has found it necessary to aid the weak side and to fix living wages for women and children and to fix the maximum workday and other terms of the relation between capital and labor.

The next step toward equality of reward between labor and capital should be a law enacting that the capital and labor employed in our public service corporations shall constitute an industrial partnership, whose joint earnings shall be the joint partnership property of the industrial partners, and after the payment of living wages to labor and living dividends to capital, such joint partnership property shall be divided between labor and capital in the ratio of partnership equality of reward stated above. At the same time such industrial partnership for public service should be exempted from the operation of the Sherman Act of Congress and like State laws, for the reason that such capital-and-labor partnerships are not trusts or monopolies, but are co-operative partnerships based upon the fundamental principle of social justice called partnership equality of reward.

In the case of the industrial trusts such a partnership act of Congress should be permissive and should declare that upon the voluntary adoption of the partnership plan by the capital and labor of any trust the Sherman law shall cease to operate with respect to the capital and labor composing such industrial partnership.

The efficiency of such capital and labor partnerships will be greater than the efficiency of the trusts, because the labor partners will be converted from employees, with no share of the profits, into partners with a fair share of the profits. Greater efficiency means larger production per unit of industrial service. With partnership equality of reward, it means higher wages, higher dividends, and lower cost of living—or prosperity.

Labor has strong objections to scientific management without scientific division of the joint earnings, because it makes for greater inequality of reward against labor instead of evening up wages with dividends.

To restore equality of bargaining power the law has pursued the course of breaking the trusts into small units ever since the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890. The efficiency of large units has thus been destroyed and prosperity lessened. If freedom and equality have been brought nearer to the door of the average man, it has not been the freedom and equality of prosperity, but the freedom and equality of poverty. Wages have fallen with dividends.

The best practical means of putting new hope and courage and energy into both capital and labor, and of restoring general prosperity, seems to be to compel monopolies and to encourage the trusts and other large units of industry to adopt the principle of partnership equality of reward for the social services of labor and capital.

It is the master-and-servant relation of inequality which lies at the root of our social unrest. The workman has ceased to regard himself as a servant or the capitalist as his master. He regards himself as the equal of the capitalist and demands equality of reward between the two social factors in industry in proportion to the value of their respective services to society at large. He claims the whole fruit of his labor and denies the right of any master or employer to take part of the fruit of his labor.

To restore equality of bargaining power between master and servant will not cure social discontent, therefore, as long as the relation of master and servant exists, the remedy must cut to the root of the relation between capital and labor and must change this relation into one of industrial partnership with equality of reward for their social services.

EXHIBITS.

ROCKEFELLER JR., EXHIBIT NO. 1.

INFORMATION FURNISHED BY THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION IN RESPONSE TO QUESTIONNAIRE SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

ORGANIZATION.

Question 1. Please furnish copies of constitution and by-laws.

Answer. Copies of the charter, being chapter 488 of the Laws of 1913 of the State of New York, and of the constitution and by-laws are hereto annexed, marked, respectively, Schedules A, B, and C.

Question 2. What boards, funds, commissions, and other organizations have been included under the Rockefeller Foundation?

Answer. None. The Rockefeller Foundation is not a consolidation of pre-existing organizations, but is a separate and distinct creation with its own funds.

Question 3. Who are the members of the present board of directors? (a) For what terms do they serve?

Answer. For the term expiring 1915: Harry Pratt Judson, Simon Flexner, Starr J. Murphy. For the term expiring 1916: John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, jr., Frederick T. Gates. For the term expiring 1917: Charles W. Eliot, Wickliffe Rose, Charles O. Heydt, Jerome D. Greene, A. Barton Hepburn.

Question 4. How and by whom will the future directors be chosen? (a) For what terms will they serve?

Answer. "New members, whether as successors to those named in the act of incorporation or otherwise, and such additional members as they or their successors shall see fit to associate with them, shall be elected by ballot, either at the annual meeting of the corporation or at a special meeting duly called for that purpose, by vote of a majority of the members of the corporation attending such meet. Any member may withdraw from the corporation by a notice in writing to the president or secretary. The members shall be at all times divided into three classes, equal numerically as nearly as may be, and the original members shall at their first meeting, or as soon thereafter as may be convenient, be divided into three classes, the members of the first class to hold their membership and office until the first annual meeting, the members of the second class until the second annual meeting, and the members of the third class until the third annual meeting, and in every case the member shall hold office after the expiration of his term until his successor shall be chosen. At each annual meeting the successors to those members whose term of office then expires shall be chosen for the term of three years and until their successors shall be chosen." (Constitution, Art. 1.)

Question 5. Who are the present officers of the foundation and its subsidiary organizations? (a) How are they chosen? (b) For what terms do they hold office?

Answer. The present officers of the foundation are: John D. Rockefeller, jr., president; Jerome D. Greene, secretary; Louis G. Myers, treasurer; Lefferts M. Dashiell, assistant treasurer.

These offices, with the exception of the assistant treasurer, were chosen by ballot at the first meeting of the foundation, held May 22, 1913, and reelected at the first annual meeting of the foundation, held January 21, 1914, in accordance with Article IV of the constitution, which is as follows:

"OFFICERS.

"The officers of the corporation shall consist of a president, secretary, and treasurer, together with such other officers as may be determined by the by-laws. These officers shall have the duties and exercise the powers assigned to them by this constitution or by the by-laws, or by resolutions adopted pursuant to the authority of this constitution or the by-laws. At each annual meeting of the corporation, or in default of election at such meeting, then at an adjournment thereof, or at any meeting duly called for that purpose, the corporation shall elect by ballot a president, secretary, and treasurer, and it may choose such other officers as the by-laws shall from time to time provide. All the officers, whether elected or appointed, shall hold office at the pleasure of the corporation, but in no case beyond the time when their respective successors shall be elected and accept office."

The assistant treasurer was appointed by the executive committee at its meeting on March 18, 1914.

The foundation has created as a subsidiary organization the International Health Commission, the purpose of which is to extend to foreign countries and peoples the work of eradicating hookworm disease as opportunity offers, and so far as practicable to follow up the treatment and cure of this disease with the establishment of agencies for the promotion of public sanitation and the spread of knowledge of scientific medicine. The members of the International Health Commission are the members of the executive committee of the Rockefeller Foundation, viz: Simon Flexner, Jerome D. Greene, Charles O. Heydt, Starr J. Murphy, John D. Rockefeller, Jr.; and Messrs. Charles W. Elliot, Frederick T. Gates, William Crawford Gorgas, David V. Houston, Walter H. Page, Wickliffe Rose, William H. Welch.

The officers of the International Health Commission are: John D. Rockefeller, Jr., chairman; Wickliffe Rose, director general; John A. Ferrell, assistant director general.

These officers were elected by the members of the International Health Commission at its annual meeting held January 20, 1914, for the term of one year, or until their successors are elected.

FUNDS, CHARACTER, AND CONTROL.

Question 6. Please furnish a statement showing in detail the funds, securities, and other sources of income now held by the foundation or by any subsidiary organizations.

Answer. See Schedule D.

Question 7. By what committee, board, or person are the funds of the corporation controlled? (a) Who controls the character of investment or place of deposit of the funds? (b) On whose authorization and in what manner are funds appropriated? (c) On whose warrants are funds paid out? (d) What regulation governs the expenditure of the interest or limits the accumulation of the fund? (e) What regulation controls the expenditure of the principal?

Answer. (a) The finance committee controls the character of the investments. (By-laws, Art. II.) The executive committee controls the place of deposit of the funds. (By-laws, Art. V.)

(b) Appropriations are made by the board of directors or the executive committee on the report and recommendation of the secretary or any other officer or member of the foundation.

(c) "No bills shall be paid except those which have been incurred pursuant to a resolution of the corporation or under the authority of the executive committee, and such bills shall be paid only on a voucher approving the same for payment and referring to the specific resolution or authorization pursuant to which they were respectively incurred, which voucher shall be signed by the president and the secretary or such of the assistant secretaries as shall be designated by resolution of the corporation or the executive committee, or in the case of the absence or disability of either the president or secretary, by such other member of the corporation as such absentee shall designate in writing for that purpose.

"A current-expense account of not to exceed $5,000 on deposit at any one time may be opened with such depository as may be designated by the executive committee, which shall be subject to draft upon the signature of the cashier of the corporation, who shall be bonded at the expense of the corporation for such sum as the executive committee shall fix." (Art. V of by-laws, pars. 2 and 3.)

(d) As regards the accumulation of the fund, the charter of the foundation provides:

"The corporation * * * shall have the power to take and hold by bequest, devise, gift, purchase, or lease, either absolutely or in trust for any of its purposes, any property, real or personal, without limitation as to amount or value, except such limitation, if any, as the legislature shall hereafter specifically impose; to convey such property and to invest and reinvest any principal and deal with and expend the income, and principal of the corporation in such manner as in the judgment of the trustees will best promote its objects. It shall have all the power and be subject to all the restrictions which now pertain by law to membership corporations created by special law so far as the same are applicable thereto and are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act."

(e) As regards the expenditure of the principal and income, the only restrictions are:

1. The following provision in Mr. John D. Rockefeller's letter of March 6, 1914:

"It is a condition of this gift that from the income of the foundation the sum of $2,000,000 annually, or as much thereof as I shall designate, shall be applied during my lifetime to such specific objects within the corporate purposes of the foundation as I may from time to time direct. If at the close of any fiscal year there shall remain any balance of the $2,000,000 which I have not thus designated during that fiscal year, such balance shall be transferred to the general unrestricted income of the foundation, to be used as the foundation shall see fit. Subject to the foregoing provision, the principal as well as the income of this gift may be used in your discretion for any of the corporate purposes of the foundation."

2. By-laws, Art. VIII, as follows:

"No part of the principal of the funds of the foundation shall be distributed except pursuant to a resolution passed by the affirmative vote of two-thirds of all those who shall at the time be members of the foundation at a special meeting held on not less than 30 days' notice given in writing to each member of the foundation, which shall state that the meeting is called for the purpose of considering a resolution to authorize the distribution of the whole or some part of the principal of its funds."

Question 8. From what sources have the funds of the foundation hitherto been derived?

Answer. The foundation has received from Mr. John D. Rockefeller gifts of securities of the aggregate market value at the time of the gifts of $100,000,000. It has also received securities aggregating $48,000 from Laura S. (Mrs. John D.) Rockefeller, in trust, for certain specific purposes within the corporate purposes of the board.

Question 9. From what sources are the future funds of the foundation expected to be received?

Answer. The foundation has no expectation with regard to future funds, but under the terms of its charter it can receive gifts from any source.

Question 10. In the divisions of the foundation which have already been in operation (e. g., General Education Board), how, by whom, and for what periods have appropriations been made? (a) Are such appropriations made as a lump sum to be used at the will of the directors or responsible head, or is there an appropriation for each specific line of work?

Answer. This question is evidently based upon a misunderstanding. As stated above, the Rockefeller Foundation is not composed of organizations which previously existed. The General Education Board is an entirely independent corporation, with funds of its own. In the case of the International Health Commission lump sums have been from time to time appropriated for the use of the commission, to be expended in accordance with appropriations duly made by the commission or its executive committee.

Question 11. By whom and in what manner are the estimates for necessary appropriations made?

Answer. The major part of the work of the foundation consists in making contributions to other agencies carrying on various philanthropic activities. Applications are made by these agencies, and appropriations are made by the board or the executive committee on the report and recommendation of the secretary or any other officer or member of the foundation. In cases where estimates are necessary they are made by the persons recommending or presenting the matters.

Question 12. After an appropriation for any particular purpose has been made, to what restrictions or review is its expenditure subject, other than the ordinary business and legal procedure to insure honesty in its control?

Answer. The appropriations are in general made in the form of pledges to particular institutions for definite amounts, and when once made each pledge becomes a contract which is not subject to review by the foundation. The expenditure of other appropriations is subject to the ordinary business and legal procedure.

AGREEMENTS AND CONTRACTS.

Question 13. What agreements or understanding, verbal or written, exist between the foundation and Mr. King, regarding the scope of the work which is to be done under his direction, and the method of investigation which is to be pursued? (a) By whom was the arrangement with Mr. King made?

Answer. Mr. King was appointed pursuant to a resolution adopted at the meeting of the executive committee of the Rockefeller Foundation held August 13, 1914, of which the following is a copy:

"Resolved, That William Lyon Mackenzie King be, and he is hereby, appointed to make a comprehensive study of the problem of industrial relations at a salary of $—— a year from October 1, 1914."

"It was, on motion, further

"Resolved, That the secretary be authorized to approve all bills for necessary traveling expenses and all other expenses incurred by Mr. King in the pursuance of his work under the direction of the executive committee. The secretary presented a recommendation from Mr. King for the employment of Robert F. Foerster, Ph. D., to prepare a catalogue of individuals and organizations, and a bibliography concerning the general subject of industrial relations.

"Whereupon it was, on motion,

"Resolved, That Dr. Foerster be appointed to perform the service above described, the same to be completed on or about October 1, 1914, for a total compensation of $——.

"It was also further

"Resolved, That Dr. Foerster be authorized to employ as his assistant Mr. L. C. Staples, at a salary of $—— a month, and to employ such further clerical assistance and incur such further expense incident to the preparation of the proposed catalogue and bibliography as should meet the approval of Mr. King."

The amounts of salaries have been omitted as being information of a confidential nature not material to this inquiry.

The action at this meeting had been preceded by conferences and correspondence between Mr. King and members of the executive committee of the foundation, principally the president and secretary, Messrs. John D. Rockefeller, jr., and Jerome D. Greene. In brief, Mr. King was invited to conduct "an investigation of the great problem of industrial relations, with a special view to the discovery of some mutual relationship of labor and capital which would afford to labor the protection it needs against oppression and exploitation, while at the same time promoting its efficiency as an instrument of economic production." Mr. King was also invited to outline a method of work and organization for the proposed investigation which would enable him to make the largest possible contribution to the solution of the problem. The wish of the foundation was expressed as follows:

"It is our desire that the scope should be as broad and comprehensive as possible, for only as a result of such an intensive investigation can we hope to be in a position to make helpful suggestions looking toward the improvement in industrial relations."

There is no formal written contract between the foundation and Mr. King, other than the resolution appointing him. There are no verbal agreements or understandings.

Question 14. Is there any provision in the agreement or understanding to assure Mr. King's ability to go on with his plans, even if his policy should be divergent from that of the directors?

Answer. This and several subsequent questions appear to be based upon an entire misconception of the spirit and purpose of the investigation which Mr. King has been retained to direct. Having in mind that hardly any relation in life is more far reaching than the industrial relation, and particularly having in view the growing tendency to misunderstanding and lack of harmony between employers and employees, resulting in great injury to both as well as to the general public, the foundation has felt that no subject could be more worthy of study, and that if it could work out sound and substantial improvements in the relation of capital and labor it could hardly do anything better calculated "to promote the well-being of mankind," for which purpose the foundation was created. In no sense will the inquiry be local or restricted, or carried on with particular reference to any existing situation, or to conditions in any one country. The experience of the several countries of the world will be drawn upon. Mr. King has been selected as a person whose broad sympathies and wide experience peculiarly qualify him to assist the foundation in this endeavor. As indicated in the statement of the foundation at the time the investigation of industrial relations was announced, the work in spirit and method will be akin to that of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. In so far as Mr. King's inquiries have to do with industrial controversies, his attitude will be that of a physician who investigates the nature and causes of the pathological conditions with which he has to deal, with a view, if possible, to the discovery of effective remedies. It can not be too clearly understood that the purpose of this inquiry is not to apportion blame in present or past misunderstandings, nor to justify any particular point of view; the sole purpose is to be constructively helpful. The final and only test of the work will be the degree to which the constructive suggestions growing out of the investigation actually improve the relations between capital and labor. In a work conceived and undertaken in such a spirit, any question of divergent policies or of partiality in the investigation can have no place. Mr. King has from the outset indicated to the foundation his desire to avoid any form of organization which may cause it even to appear that his work is intended to rival or encroach upon the work of existing organizations, and in particular the work properly assignable to Government departments and agencies. It is his intention from time to time to retain experts and seek expert advice in different fields included within the scope of his study, and to employ such clerical assistance as may be necessary. In view of Mr. King's experience, the conduct of the work will be left in his hands, subject merely to such conference with the officers of the foundation as may be desirable, and to a general control by the foundation of the extent of the expenditure.

Question 15. Upon what conditions can the agreement with Mr. King be terminated?

Answer. At Mr. King's expressed wish, the period of his relationship to the foundation was limited to one year, beginning October 1, 1914, with the hope and expectation expressed by the foundation that his connection with it might continue thereafter indefinitely.

Question 16. What person, board, or committee controls the field, scope, and method of investigation?

Answer. Mr. King, as director.

Question 17. Has the foundation or its subsidiary and affiliated organizations refused at any time to continue appropriations for any piece of work or for any investigation which had been agreed upon?

Answer. No.

PURPOSE AND PLAN.

Question 18. What were the fundamental reasons and purposes which led to the consolidation and incorporation of the various Rockefeller benefactions?

Answer. There has been no consolidation of the various Rockefeller benefactions.

Question 19. Please outline briefly the work which is now being carried on by the subsidiary departments or organizations which make up the foundation, and indicate, as far as possible, their general plans.

Answer. As previously stated, the major part of the work of the foundation consists in contributions to other agencies carrying on various philanthropic activities. The work and plans of the International Health Commission and of the industrial relations investigation are described in answer to previous questions. The former is now carrying on work in the British West Indies, Central America, Egypt, Ceylon, the Malay States, and the Philippines.

Question 20. What were the facts, reasons, and considerations which led to the establishment of the industrial relations division of the foundation?

Answer. For several years past Mr. John D. Rockefeller and his advisers have had under consideration the establishment of an organization for social and economic research. Upon the establishment of the Rockefeller Foundation one of the first matters which it considered was the possibility of the organization of such an institution, and a committee of leading economists and business men was created to consider whether such an organization could wisely and profitably be established. This is referred to in the testimony of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., given April 6, 1914, before the subcommittee of the Committee on Mines and Mining of the House of Representatives. (See p. 2892 of their printed testimony.) While the general subject of economic research was under consideration, the industrial disturbance in Colorado impressed the president of the foundation with the great need and public importance of finding an effective means of preventing such conflicts, and caused him to urge a far-reaching study of industrial relations as the most important immediate inquiry to which the foundation could direct attention. In view of the passion aroused in Colorado and the many divergent interests involved there, it was felt that the foundation itself should not interfere in that situation, but that it was of the utmost consequence that the root causes of that and similar disturbances should be ascertained, and, if possible, removed, not only in Colorado but elsewhere. The Rockefeller Foundation is, moreover, a large owner of corporate securities, and in that capacity is itself directly concerned in maintaining harmonious relations between the companies in which it is interested and their employees. It was, therefore, felt that if the foundation could work out, on a basis compatible with sound economics, a substantial improvement in the relations between capital and labor, it would not only discharge its obligation as indirectly a large employer of labor but would also perform, for the general public, a greater social service than it could render along usual philanthropic lines. Realizing that the success of such an endeavor would depend almost entirely upon the character and experience of the person conducting the work, it examined the field to see whether a suitable person could be found. In this connection its attention was directed to Mr. King, and the officers determined that, in view of his broad experience and high character, if his services could be secured, they would recommend that the foundation undertake a study of this subject.

Question 21. If the industrial relations division was authorized by resolution, please furnish a copy of the resolution. If not, please state by whom, at what time, and under what circumstances its establishment was suggested and provided for.

Answer. A copy of the resolution is set forth in answer to question No. 13.

Question 22. Please outline, as far as possible, the questions in the field of industrial relations to which the investigations of the foundation may be directed.

Answer. This has been left to Mr. King to decide.

Question 23. What results does the foundation expect to secure from its industrial relations division?

Answer. As already stated in answer to questions Nos. 14 and 20, it is hoped that by a careful study of world experience there may be disclosed methods of adjusting industrial relations which, if applied, will prove of permanent value.

Question 24. Will the work of the industrial relations division be limited to investigation?

Answer. Being solely concerned with the accomplishment of the practical aim of this undertaking, namely, to improve the relations between capital and labor, the foundation has purposely avoided assigning any definite limits either to the method of procedure or to the scope of the work.

Question 25. If not, what means other than the publication of its investigations are likely to be used to make effective the findings of the investigations?

Answer. Answered by the answer to the preceding question.

Question 26. In what form and to what authority will the annual reports of the foundation be made?

Answer. The statute of New York does not require the publication or filing with any public authority of annual reports. The foundation has already decided, however, to publish annual reports of its activities.

Question 27. To whose supervision or approval will the reports of the investigations be subject prior to publication?

Answer. To the foundation or the executive committee.

Question 28. In what way will the impartiality of the foundations investigations and reports be assured?

Answer. This is covered by the answers to questions Nos. 14 and 20.

Question 29. When will the plans of Mr. King be ready?

Answer. It is not expected that plans of a formal or conventional kind will be prepared, but rather that Mr. King will proceed along such lines as may from time to time appear to offer greatest promise of practical results.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION,
JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr., President.
_____, Secretary.

DECEMBER 4, 1914.

SCHEDULE A.

[Chapter 488.]

AN ACT To incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation.

[Became a law May 14, 1913, with the approval of the governor. Passed, three-fifths being present.]

The people of the State of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, junior, Frederick T. Gates, Harry Pratt Judson, Simon Flexner, Starr J. Murphy, Jerome D. Greene, Wickliffe Rose, and Charles O. Heydt, together with such persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name of The Rockefeller Foundation, for the purpose of receiving and maintaining a fund or funds and applying the income and principal thereof to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world. It shall be within the purposes of said corporation to use as means to that end research, publication, the establishment and maintenance of charitable, benevolent, religious, missionary, and public-educational activities, agencies, and institutions, and the aid of any such activities, agencies, and institutions already established and any other means and agencies which from time to time shall seem expedient to its members or trustees.

2. The corporation hereby formed shall have power to take and hold by bequest, devise, gift, purchase, or lease, either absolutely or in trust for any of its purposes any property, real or personal, without limitation as to amount or value, except such limitation, if any, as the legislature shall hereafter specifically impose; to convey such property and to invest and reinvest any principal and deal with and expend the income and principal of the corporation in such manner as in the judgment of the trustees will best promote its objects. It shall have all the power and be subject to all the restrictions which now pertain by law to membership corporations created by special law so far as the same are applicable thereto and are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act. The persons named in the first section of this act, or a majority of them, shall hold a meeting and organize the corporation and adopt a constitution and by-laws not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this State. The constitution shall prescribe the manner of selection of members, the number of members who shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business at meetings of the corporation, the number of trustees by whom the business and affairs of the corporation shall be managed, the qualifications, powers, and the manner of selection of the trustees and officers of the corporation, the manner of amending the constitution and by-laws of the corporation, and any other provisions for the management and disposition of the property and regulation of the affairs of the corporation which may be deemed expedient.

3. No officer, member, or employee of this corporation shall receive or be lawfully entitled to receive any pecuniary profit from the operations thereof except reasonable compensation for services in effecting one or more of its purposes, or as a proper beneficiary of its strictly charitable purposes.

4. This act shall take effect immediately.

STATE OF NEW YORK,

Office of the secretary of state, ss:

I have compared the preceding with the original law on file in this office, and do hereby certify that the same is a correct transcript therefrom, and of the whole of said original law.

Given under my hand and seal of office of the secretary of state, at the city of Albany, this 21st day of May, in the year one thousand nine hundred and thirteen.

[L. S.]

JOSE G. RIDGEON,
Second Deputy Secretary of State.

SCHEDULE B.

CONSTITUTION OF THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

ARTICLE I.—Members.

The members of the corporation shall consist of the persons named in the first section of the act to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation, being chapter 488 of the Laws of 1913 of the State of New York, viz, John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, jr., Frederick T. Gates, Harry Pratt Judson, Simon Flexner, Starr J. Murphy, Jerome D. Greene, Wickliffe Rose, and Charles O. Heydt, together with such persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors.

New members, whether as successors to those named in the act of incorporation or otherwise, and such additional members as they or their successors shall see fit to associate with them, shall be elected by ballot, either at the annual meeting of the corporation or at a special meeting duly called for that purpose, by vote of a majority of the members of the corporation attending such meeting.

Any member may withdraw from the corporation by a notice in writing to the president or secretary. The members shall be at all times divided into three classes, equal numerically, as nearly as may be, and the original members shall at their first meeting, or as soon thereafter as may be convenient, be divided into three classes, the members of the first class to hold their membership and office until the first annual meeting, the members of the second class until the second annual meeting, and the members of the third class until the third annual meeting, and in every case the member shall hold office after the expiration of his term until his successor shall be chosen. At each annual meeting the successors to those members whose term of office then expires shall be chosen for the term of three years and until their successors shall be chosen. In case any member shall, by death, resignation, incapacity to act, or otherwise, cease to be a member during his term, his successor shall be chosen to serve for the remainder of his term and until his successor shall be chosen. If and when the number of members shall be less than nine, the members remaining shall have power to add, and shall add to their number, until the number shall be not less than nine, but no act of the corporation shall be void because at the time such act shall be done the members of the corporation shall be less than nine.

All the powers of the corporation shall be exercised by its members, and they may, by general resolution, subject to the provisions of this constitution and the by-laws to be adopted, delegate to other officers or to committees of their own number such powers as they see fit, in addition to the powers specified in this constitution and in such by-laws.

ARTICLE II.—Quorum.

A majority of the members of the corporation shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business at meetings of the corporation.

ARTICLE III.—Trustees.

The number of trustees by whom the business and affairs of the corporation shall be managed shall be the same as the number of members, and all of the members of the corporation shall be its trustees, and the election of any person as a member of the corporation shall constitute him a trustee.

ARTICLE IV.—Officers.

The officers of the corporation shall consist of a president, secretary, and treasurer, together with such other officers as may be determined by the by-laws. These officers shall have the duties and exercise the powers assigned to them by this constitution or by the by-laws, or by resolutions adopted pursuant to the authority of this constitution or the by-laws. At each annual meeting of the corporation or, in default of election at such meeting, then at an adjournment thereof, or at any meeting duly called for that purpose, the corporation shall elect by ballot a president, secretary, and treasurer, and it may choose such other officers as the by-laws shall from time to time provide. All the officers, whether elected or appointed, shall hold office at the pleasure of the corporation, but in no case beyond the time when their respective successors shall be elected and accept office.

ARTICLE V.—President.

The president shall sustain an executive and advisory relation to the work and policies of the corporation similar to that usually sustained by the chairman or president of commercial bodies. He shall preside at all meetings of the corporation at which he shall be present. He shall appoint all committees unless otherwise ordered by the corporation. In his absence the members of the corporation present shall appoint one of their own number to preside. The president, ex-officio, shall be a member of all committees, except as herein otherwise provided. He shall sign for the corporation all deeds and other agreements and formal instruments.

In the absence or disability of the president he may, by written instrument, appoint a member of the corporation to discharge such of his functions as he may assign to such appointees.

ARTICLE VI.—Treasurer.

The treasurer, subject to such regulations as may from time to time be prescribed by the corporation, shall have the custody of the funds and securities of the corporation, including all bonds, deeds, and other papers and documents relating to such property, and shall also have the disbursement of its money. He shall keep proper books of account and other books, showing at all times the amount of funds belonging to the corporation, which shall be at all times open to the inspection of the members of the corporation. At each meeting he shall present an account showing in detail the receipts of the property belonging to the corporation and of all disbursements thereof since his last report. He shall not pay any money except in the manner prescribed in the by-laws, or as provided by resolution of the members of the corporation, or the authority of the executive committee.

ARTICLE VII.—Secretary.

The secretary shall conduct the correspondence of the corporation, except as otherwise provided in the by-laws or by resolution of the corporation. He shall be the medium of communication with the corporation. He shall be ex-officio a member of all committees, except as herein otherwise provided.

He shall give notice of and attend all meetings of the corporation, taking minutes of the proceedings and transcribing them in a book provided for that purpose, and attesting the same. Immediately upon the election and appointment of members he shall give notice to them of their election or appointment. He shall have the custody of the corporate seal. He shall keep the records of all committees of which he is a member.

ARTICLE VIII.—Meetings.

--

The annual meeting of the corporation shall be held on the Wednesday next preceding the fourth Thursday of January in each year. At this meeting the trustees of the corporation shall present a report, verified by the president and treasurer, or by a majority of the trustees, showing the whole amount of real and personal property owned by the corporation, where located, and where and how invested; the amount and nature of the property acquired during the year immediately preceding the date of the report, and the manner of the acquisition; the amount applied, appropriated, or expended during the year immediately preceding such date, and the purposes, objects, or persons to and for which such applications, appropriations, or expenditures have been made, and the names and places of residence of the persons who have been admitted to membership in the corporation during such year, which report shall be filed with the records of the corporation and an abstract thereof entered in the minutes of the proceedings of the annual meeting.

In addition to the annual meeting stated meetings of the corporation shall be held on the Wednesday next preceding the fourth Thursday of May and October in each year.

All meetings shall be held at such time and place in the city of New York, or elsewhere, as the corporation shall from time to time order or direct. In the absence of such direction the meetings shall be held at the office of the corporation in the city of New York.

The president or any three members of the corporation may call a special meeting of the corporation by not less than five days' written notice given by the president or the secretary or the members calling such meeting.

If any member of the corporation, other than Mr. John D. Rockefeller, shall be absent from three consecutive stated meetings, such absence, inexcused, shall ipso facto be deemed a resignation of membership of the corporation, and the vacancy so caused shall be filled as herein provided. Any member of the corporation may by writing or telegram appoint any other member of the corporation to act as his proxy at any one or more specified meetings of the corporation.

ARTICLE IX.—Committees.

The corporation may by by-laws provide for such committees and may delegate to such committees such powers as it shall deem wise.

ARTICLE X.—Amendments.

This constitution may be altered or amended by a majority vote of the members present at any duly called meeting of the corporation, provided that written notice has been sent to every member of the corporation at least 10 days in advance of the date of meeting, stating specifically the proposed

SCHEDULE C.

BY-LAWS OF THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

ARTICLE I.

There shall be a standing committee of three members of the corporation who, with the president and secretary, shall be the executive committee. The executive committee shall be elected by the corporation at the annual meeting by ballot. The executive committee may fill vacancies in its own number or in the finance committee in the interim of the corporation meetings, reporting its action to the corporation at the next meeting.

This committee shall have and may exercise all the powers of the corporation when the corporation is not in session, except those specifically vested in the finance committee as herein provided. A quorum for the transaction of business shall consist of three members. The committee shall elect its chairman and shall make such rules and regulations as, from time to time, it may deem proper for its own government and for the transaction of business of which it may have charge, which are not herewith otherwise provided for. It shall direct and control the purchase of all supplies and the audit of all bills.

ARTICLE II.

There shall be a finance committee consisting of three members of the corporation, to be elected by the corporation at the annual meeting by ballot. The president and secretary shall not be ex-officio members of this committee. This committee shall have power to make investments and to change the same, and may from time to time sell any part of the bonds, shares, notes, or other forms of investment held by the corporation, or any rights or privileges that may accrue thereon. In making investments or changes of investments all the members of this committee shall be consulted when this is reasonably practicable, but the committee shall be deemed to be in continuous session, and may act without formal notice of meeting, and the joint action of any two members shall be valid and binding. The committee shall elect its chairman and shall make such rules and regulations as from time to time it may deem proper for its own government and for the transaction of business of which it may have charge. It shall keep regular minutes of its meetings and shall make report to the members of the corporation of all investments and changes of investments made by it.

ARTICLE III.

There shall be a nominating committee consisting of three members of the corporation, to be elected by the corporation each year at the October meeting by ballot. The president and the secretary shall not be ex-officio members of this committee. It shall be the duty of this committee to make recommendations regarding members, officers, and elective committees who are to be elected at the annual meeting next ensuing, and also regarding members or officers to be chosen to fill vacancies which may occur during the year.

ARTICLE IV.

The corporation at any stated meeting, or at any special meeting called for that purpose, or when the corporation is not in session the executive committee, may by resolution appoint one or more assistant treasurers, one or more assistant secretaries, a cashier, and such other officers as may be deemed necessary. The same person may be appointed to hold two or more of said offices. All such officers shall hold office at the pleasure of the corporation, but in no case beyond the time when their respective successors shall be elected and accept office, and shall have such powers and be subject to such restrictions as shall be set forth in the resolution appointing them.

ARTICLE V.

The treasurer shall deposit the funds of the corporation in such banks or trust companies as may from time to time be designated by the executive committee. Such deposits of funds shall be made subject to draft only on the signatures of two persons, one of whom shall be the president, the secretary, or some member of the corporation designated by the president or secretary, and of the treasurer, and the other shall be the treasurer, or in case of his absence or disability, such member of the corporation as shall from time to time be designated by resolution of the corporation or of the executive committee.

No bills shall be paid except those which have been incurred pursuant to a resolution of the corporation or under the authority of the executive committee, and such bills shall be paid only on a voucher approving the same for payment and referring to the specific resolution or authorization pursuant to which they were respectively incurred, which voucher shall be signed by the president and the secretary or such of the assistant secretaries as shall be designated by resolution of the corporation or the executive committee, or, in the case of the absence or disability of either the president or secretary, by such other member of the corporation as such absentee shall designate in writing for that purpose.

A current expense account of not to exceed $5,000 on deposit at any one time may be opened with such depository as may be designated by the executive committee, which shall be subject to draft upon the signature of the cashier of the corporation, who shall be bonded at the expense of the corporation for such sum as the executive committee shall fix.

The securities of the corporation shall be deposited in some suitable safe deposit vault. Access to the vault may be had by the members of the corporation, the treasurer, the assistant treasurer and such of the assistant secretaries as shall be designated for that purpose by resolution of the corporation or the executive committee, provided that there shall always be two of the foregoing present. Such securities may be withdrawn from the vault only on a written order directing the delivery of the same to the person or persons therein specified, which order shall be signed by two members of the finance committee or by one member of the finance committee and one other member of the corporation.

ARTICLE VI.

The president, treasurer, or secretary is hereby authorized and directed, upon the written request of any two members of the finance committee, to execute under seal such form of transfer and assignment as may be customary or necessary to constitute a regular transfer for the delivery of such securities as and to whomsoever may be designated in such request.

Either the president or the treasurer may execute and deliver on behalf of the corporation from time to time proxies on any and all stock owned by the corporation, appointing such person or persons as they shall deem proper to represent and vote the stock owned by the corporation at any and all meetings of stockholders, whether general or special, with full power of substitution, and to alter and rescind such appointments at such time and as often as they see fit.

ARTICLE VII.—Notices.

All notices required by these by-laws, or otherwise, for the purpose of the corporation, shall be in writing and shall be either personally delivered or mailed to the members of the corporation at their addresses as entered in the office of the secretary of the corporation.

ARTICLE VIII.

No part of the principal of the funds of the foundation shall be except pursuant to a resolution passed by the affirmative vote of two-thirds of all those who shall at the time be members of the foundation at a special meeting held on not less than thirty days notice given in writing to each member of the foundation which shall state that the meeting is called for the purpose of considering a resolution to authorize the distribution of the whole or some part of the principal of its funds.

ARTICLE IX.—Amendments.

These articles may be altered or amended by a majority vote of the members present at any duly called meeting of the corporation, provided that written notice has been sent to every member of the corporation at least 10 days in advance of the date of meeting, stating specifically the proposed amendment.

INFORMATION FURNISHED BY THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION IN RESPONSE TO SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTIONNAIRE SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS UNDER DATE OF JANUARY 7, 1915.

Question 1. (a) Where were the present treasurer and assistant treasurer employed at the time of election of officers of the foundation? (b) Do they give full-time service to the foundation? If not, what portion of their time is given to the foundation?

Answer. (a) The present treasurer, L. G. Myers, was formerly office manager in the private office of George Foster Peabody, the treasurer of the General Education Board, and Mr. Myers acted as assistant treasurer of that board. Upon the retirement of Mr. Peabody, Mr. Myers succeeded him as treasurer of the General Education Board and was afterwards appointed the treasurer of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research and the Rockefeller Sanitary Commission for the Eradication of Hookworm Disease, in which positions he was serving at the time of his appointment to the treasurership of the Rockefeller Foundation. The present assistant treasurer, L. M. Dashiell, was at the time of his appointment cashier and office manager in the office of Messrs. Simmons & Slade, bankers and brokers, 5 Nassau Street, New York City. (b) Mr. Myers is now treasurer and Mr. Dashiell assistant treasurer of the General Education Board, the Rockefeller Institute and the Rockefeller Foundation.

Their salaries are allocated to the respective boards on the basis of the proportion which the income of each board bears to the total income of the three boards.

Question 2. (a) Has the foundation-a complete file of the publications issued by the International Health Commission and its predecessor, the sanitary commission, including publicity matter furnished to newspapers, departments of health, departments of education, etc.? If so, is this matter in form that it may be sent to the Industrial Relations Commission? (b) May it be consulted at the foundation's office?

Answer. (a and b) The foundation has complete files of the publications issued by the Rockefeller Sanitary Commission for the Eradication of Hookworm Disease, and of the few publications of the International Health Commission, and these are available for consultation at the office of the Rockefeller Foundation. No other publicity matter has been issued by either commission, though much effective publicity has been given to the work of each by State, county, and local authorities.

Question 3. What studies has the International Health Commission made of industrial diseases or of sanitary conditions of different industries?

Answer. The International Health Commission, since its organization, has confined its activities almost entirely to the eradication of hookworm disease in different parts of the world. It must be mentioned, however, that the reports of the sanitary commission whose work in the Southern States has now been taken over by the International Health Commission show that the ravages of hookworm disease have a most important effect upon the economic efficiency of infected persons.

Question 4. Who are the members of the foundation's finance committee?

Answer. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Starr J. Murphy, and Jerome D. Greene.

Question 5. (a) Regarding applications from various philanthropic agencies for contributions by the foundation, is it possible to state briefly the foundation's procedure in considering such applications? e. g. (1) What applications come to the attention of the executive committee? (2) What applications come to the attention of the full board? (3) What officer or employee of the foundation has authority to reject an application without submitting it to the executive committee or to the full board? (b) What is the nature of the record which explains the grounds on which applications are thought not deserving consideration, or, after being considered, are rejected?

Answer. (a) The answer to this question will be clearer if preceded by a general statement of the foundation's attitude in what must still be called, after a little more than a year of work, the initial stage of its activities. From the outset the members of the foundation, having in mind its chartered purpose "to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world," were agreed that the foundation could probably render a more enduring service if, instead of making contributions to a large number of miscellaneous objects, its funds were primarily devoted to promoting the study of some of the more fundamental human needs, with a view to achieving results that might not be so well accomplished by agencies more limited in scope. The members of the foundation have felt that a departure from this general policy would be amply justified by the utilization of a part of the funds of the foundation to assist in meeting emergencies where the urgency of the need appeared to render such aid imperative. The Belgian relief necessitated by the European war is a case in point. The following activities upon which the foundation has embarked will illustrate how this general principle is being applied: The organization of the International Health Commission for a world-wide campaign against hookworm disease; the promotion of medical education and public health in China, a work upon which the foundation is now entering; the investigation of industrial relations, a field of study so vast as to require in all probability years of study. During the first year of its existence the foundation has responded favorably to a limited number of applications, affirmative action upon which seemed likely not only to meet a real need, but also to provide experiences which it was believed would prove illuminating and of assistance to the foundation in determining future policies; e. g., a pledge of $10,000 a year for 10 years to the American Academy in Rome; a pledge of $20,000 a year for 10 years to the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, for widows' pensions; the purchase of a large tract of land in Louisiana as a reservation for wild fowl at a cost of about $225,000. (1 and 2) Meetings of the full board of the foundation are generally devoted to discussion and determination of important matters of general policy; action is also taken on such recommendations as are presented. Between meetings of the board applications are acted upon by the executive committee in accordance with the policies of the board. (3) Applications are usually made through the president or the secretary of the foundation. In the majority of instances, it is possible for either officer to tell whether or not the proposition comes within the scope of the foundation's policies and he acts accordingly. It is the duty of the secretary to study the data submitted with applications, to secure additional data if necessary, to prepare recommendations and to submit them for formal action. Matters are sometimes acted upon at meetings of the executive committee at which only a quorum are present. In such cases the matters have usually been presented to and approved by members not expecting to be present. (b) There is no formal record explaining the grounds on which applications are thought not deserving of consideration.

Question 6. Is it possible to tell from the foundation's records how many applications have been received since the establishment of the foundation in the interest of different proposals for studying or improving labor conditions?

Answer. The records show but one such application.

Question 7. About how many conferences had members of the foundation had with Mr. King before the resolution of August 13 appointing him to make a comprehensive study of industrial relations?

Answer. Three.

Question 8. Has the outline of the method of work and organization for the proposed investigation mentioned in the answer to our question 13 been submitted? If so, may we have a copy?

Answer. Mr. King has suggested in conversation with members of the foundation the method of work he proposes to adopt, but has not submitted a formal outline or report. Intensive study rather than extensive investigation perhaps best describes the character of Mr. King's work as thus far indicated by him. He is proceeding as a student who is carefully surveying a special field of work, with a view to ascertaining in the first instance how far investigation of the great problem of industrial relations has been already profitably carried out by others and determining as to wherein further investigation may be made to advantage under such auspices and with such resources as the foundation is in a position to provide. When Mr. King was invited to enlist in this work the purpose of the foundation was set forth in the following words in a communication to him:

"The problem is so vast and the difficulties are so largely inherent in human nature that a complete solution is not to be had in five years or in a generation. On the other hand, it might be expected that hard study for a year or two could yield much light on the problem and particularly on the very question whether such studies could be profitably pursued for a longer or an indefinite time under such auspices and with such resources as the Rockefeller Foundation could provide."

To facilitate his studies Mr. King's first step was to retain Prof. Foerster, of Harvard University, to prepare a bibliography of the literature on the subject of industrial relations as found in the libraries of Harvard University, also a directory of societies, organizations, and individuals who have carried on or may at the present time be carrying on research work in the field of industrial relations. The author and subject catalogue prepared by Prof. Foerster has over 5,000 different titles, including references to publications in all parts of the world; the directory, which is also in the form of a card catalogue, is confined to America and has between seven and eight hundred references. With the literature of the subject thus indicated before him Mr. King has been engaged upon the preparation of a chart of the field of industrial relations, which when completed he hopes to have opportunity of discussing with informed persons of all classes and many points of view. Having completed a preliminary survey in this way he then proposes to develop the work along such lines as may from time to time appear to offer the greatest promise of practical results.

As regards organization, just as Dr. Foerster was appointed to do a specific piece of work, so Mr. King expects as time goes on occasionally to retain expert advice and assistance, but it is not his intention to attempt the organization of any staff such, for example, as exists in Government bureaus or commissions. With the exception of the appointment of Dr. Foerster and a secretary, Mr. King has not thus far made any request for appointments. He has engaged temporary stenographic assistance as he has required it. The foundation places every confidence in Mr. King's judgment, and no attempt has been or will be made to influence him in the selection of persons whom he may wish to retain, the questions he may wish to ask, or the course he may wish to follow in pursuing the work he has undertaken for the foundation.

Question 9. (a) Have the catalogue and bibliography which were to be prepared by Dr. Foerster by August 1 been completed? (b) Are they in form for submission to this commission, or to be consulted by it at the foundation's office?

Answer. (a) Yes. (b) They are at Mr. King's residence at the Roxborough, Ottawa, Canada, and should the commission desire to consult them Mr. King will gladly either bring the catalogue and bibliography in whole or in part to New York or place them at the disposal of such officers as the commission may desire to have consult them in Ottawa.

Question 10. (a) Before deciding to engage Mr. King, what study did the foundation make of literature concerning industrial relations? (b) What examination was made of the work then in progress or planned by State and National bureaus and commissions? (c) With whom besides Mr. King did it consult regarding its plan for study?

Answer. (a and b) None. Mr. King's services were enlisted, amongst other reasons, with the very thought in mind that he could make just such preliminary surveys as are here implied. (c) While members of the foundation talked informally with personal friends concerning a suitable person to make a study of industrial relations there were no consultations with anyone other than Mr. King regarding a plan of study.

Question 11. (a) Referring to your answer to our question 14, how many formal interim reports have been made by Mr. King since October 1? (b) What formal reports of progress, if any, have been called for?

Answer. (a) There have been no formal interim reports made by Mr. King. (b) Formal reports of progress have not been called for. These questions are perhaps best answered by the answer to question 8.

Question 12. (a) How large a staff has Mr. King at the present time? (b) Please indicate how many and which are experienced investigators and how many clerical?

Answer. (a and b) These questions, also, are best answered by the answer to question 8.

Question 13. Will you summarize the previous experience of Mr. King in dealing with labor problems, to which at two or three points in your letter, e. g., answer to question 14, you refer?

Answer. A summary of Mr. King's experience in dealing with labor problems is attached to this reply. (Exhibit A.)

Question 14. (a) Were notices sent to all members of the foundation before the meeting of August 13, stating the purpose to consider the engagement of Mr. King for the study of industrial relations? (b) How far in advance of the meeting were such notices sent? (c) How many and which members of the foundation were present at the meeting of August 13?

Answer. (a, b, and c) The meeting of August 13, 1914, was a meeting of the executive committee, notice of which was sent by the secretary to all members on July 30, 1914. No formal statement of the purpose of the meeting was made, but all the members were familiar with the project under consideration. The following members were present: John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Simon Flexner, Charles O. Heydt, and Jerome D. Greene, members of the executive committee, and Wickliffe Rose, a member of the foundation, by invitation. These constituted the executive committee, except Starr J. Murphy, who was absent on his summer vacation.

Question 15. (a) What is the foundation's procedure in considering reports of investigators and in examining responsibility for such reports; i. e., is a separate copy sent to each member? (b) Is written confirmation, or suggestion, or criticism invited—received? (c) Are reports submitted to any persons not members of the foundation? (d) Has any procedure been decided upon with reference to the final consideration of Mr. King's report?

Answer. (a, b, and c) During the very short period of the foundation's existence it has not set on foot many investigations such as the question seems to refer to, nor has it adopted any procedure in considering reports. Before undertaking so important a work as medical education in China, the foundation appointed a commission of three persons, who were sent to China and spent about four months in that country. Upon its return the commission took a month for the preparation of a very full and comprehensive report, copies of which were printed and sent to the members of the foundation. In the case of the hookworm work in foreign countries, the director general, Mr. Wickliffe Rose, was sent around the world to visit the countries where the greatest infection was known to exist. Upon his return he presented written recommendations for the inauguration of work in certain countries, reported orally upon his observations and experiences during the journey, and filed with the secretary his detailed notes in such form as to be available for reference by members of the foundation. In any case where it might seem desirable to get outside expert opinion on a report made to the foundation, such an opinion would undoubtedly be sought, as was the case with the report on medical work in China, which was shown to a number of persons interested in China, whose opinions were considered valuable. In all such cases of reference to competent critics the freest comment is invited, but no form, either written or oral, has been prescribed for the communication of such comment. (d) No procedure has been decided upon with reference to the final consideration of Mr. King's report.

Question 16. (a) Regarding the committee of leading economics and business men, mentioned in your answer to our question 20, may we know the names, when appointed, the number of meetings held, the number of meetings attended by each member, the number and name of investigators, whether interim reports were sent to each committee member, and how long in advance of the meeting at which it was first considered? (b) May we have a copy of any plans that were adopted in advance of the study and of the final report, or interim reports, which had been rendered at the time the industrial disturbances in Colorado caused the president of the foundation to urge the present far-reaching study of industrial relations?

Answer. (a) The question as to the desirability of establishing an institute or bureau for the study of economic questions had been informally discussed among members of the foundation, both before and after its establishment. Personal conferences were also had with the following individuals: Dean Edwin F. Gay, of Harvard University; Prof. J. Laurence Laughlin, of the University of Chicago; Mr. John Koren, president of the American Statistical Association; President Charles W. Eliot, and Prof. Wesley C. Mitchell, of Columbia University. Authority to hold these personal conferences was given by a vote of the foundation of October 22, 1913, directing the secretary "to invite suggestions as to the desirability of establishing an organization for the study of important social and economic questions vitally affecting the welfare of society at the present time." The result of these conferences, all of which were favorable to the establishment of some sort of agency for the scientific investigation of economic subjects, was reported to the executive committee at the meeting of December 20, 1913, and it was understood that further conferences would be held. Acting upon this authority, the following gentlemen were invited to a conference at the office of the foundation on March 18, 1914: Dean Edwin F. Gay, of Harvard University; Prof. J. Laurence Laughlin, of the University of Chicago; Prof. J. B. Clark, of Columbia University; Prof. Henry C. Emery, of Yale University; and Prof. W. C. Mitchell, of Columbia University. Messrs. John D. Rockefeller, jr., Frederick T. Gates, and Jerome D. Greene represented the foundation at this conference. The opinion of the economists present was that there were fields of inquiry on economic subjects, such, for example, as would require the accumulation of a large body of statistics or the extension of research in different parts of the world, which a private agency, adequately supported for as many years as might prove necessary, could undertake advantageously. Acting upon this advice, the executive committee of the foundation, in session immediately after the conference, authorized by resolution the appointment of Messrs. Edwin F. Gay (chairman), J. Laurence Laughlin, Thomas W. Page, Victor Morawetz, and Harry A. Wheeler, as a committee "to consider further the desirability of establishing an institute for economic research, to make a selection of such problems of economic importance as would in their judgment be advantageously studied through such an agency, to recommend a method of organization, and to present an estimate of the approximate cost of initiating and carrying on the work to be first proposed." This committee reported, under date of August 4, 1914, unanimously recommending that studies be initiated and be carried on for a year in some chosen field, with a view to discovering whether such studies, if continued and adequately maintained, would offer a sufficient prospect of fruitful results to justify the establishment of a more permanent bureau or institute. Four of the committee recommended the subject of prices as lying at the threshold of a great many important economic problems, while the fifth recommended a more limited and concrete problem, such as profit sharing. The committee, having been asked merely for advice as to the desirability of an agency for research and the best way of demonstrating both the need and the way of meeting it, did not feel called upon, and indeed were not asked, to make any research themselves. Consequently, there was no occasion for the committee to do more than hold two meetings and to confer among themselves by correspondence, in formulating the report which was submitted under date of August 4, 1914. The report came up for consideration at the stated meeting of the Rockefeller Foundation on October 21, 1914. After a discussion in which the advantages of a separate organization for economic research and the possible objections thereto were considered at length, the opinion prevailed that no action should be taken at present, especially in view of the fact that since the question of establishing an institute for economic research had been under consideration, an investigation of industrial relations had been instituted under the direction of Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King. (b) It will be apparent from the answer to part (a) of this question that no written plans or reports had been rendered at the time referred to in part (b) of this question.

Question 17. (a) Regarding your answer to our question 21, when did Mr. King actively begin work? (b) Have questions formulated by Mr. King yet been submitted to the foundation or its executive committee? (c) Does your statement that the question of an outline has been left to Mr. King to decide mean that the foundation does not yet know in outline, or specifically, the questions to be asked by Mr. King?

Answer. (a) October 1, 1914. (b) This is answered by the answer to question 8. (c) This also is best answered by the answer to question 8.

Question 18. (a) What procedure is followed when engaging investigators to assist Mr. King; e. g., does Mr. King employ directly without describing qualifications to the foundation? (b) Have minimum experience qualifications been formulated by the foundation? (c) If there are certain questions asked regarding all who are considered for investigators, may we see copies of questions which call for evidence of special ability to conduct investigations in this field?

Answer. (a) This question is perhaps best answered by referring to the procedure adopted in the appointment of Dr. Foerster. Mr. King made his own selection of the person whom he desired to have prepare the bibliography, and, after estimating the time and assistance required for the work, made his recommendation, with reasons therefor, to the secretary of the executive committee, who submitted Mr. King's recommendation to the committee for approval. (b) No. (c) There are no such questions. These questions are perhaps best answered by the answer to question 8.

Question 19. Will it be possible to secure in time for the hearings, if not in advance, a statement showing how it is planned to draw upon world experience in adjusting industrial relations, and what steps have already been taken to study the experience of other countries?

Answer. As intimated in the answer to question 29 of the first questionnaire and question 8 of this questionnaire, plans of a formal nature have not been prepared by Mr. King who intends to proceed along such lines of inquiry in any part of the world as may from time to time appear to offer the greatest promise of practical results.

Question 20. (a) How many meetings of the foundation have been held since its establishment? (b) How many meetings have been attended by each of its members?

Answer. (a) There have been eight meetings of the foundation and 20 meetings of the executive committee. (b) The attendance of individual members is recorded in Exhibit B.

Question 21. What, if any, members or officers of the foundation receive compensation from the foundation?

Answer. The secretary, the treasurer, and the assistant treasurer.

Question 22. If the annual report is to be ready for the annual meeting of the foundation on the Wednesday preceding the fourth Thursday in January, will it be possible to submit to this commission by January 18, or earlier, a copy of this annual report?

Answer. A draft of the annual report is now being prepared for submission to the annual meeting of the foundation, but is subject to modification by this meeting. Upon its adoption the foundation will be happy to forward a copy to the commission.

Question 23. Who are the nominating committee?

Answer. Harry Pratt Judson, Frederick T. Gates, and Starr J. Murphy.

Question 24. Can you easily place in our hands three copies of the two chapters of Mr. Rockefeller's autobiography which have to do with principles underlying the foundation established by Mr. Rockefeller?

Answer. Three copies of the book referred to are herewith presented to the commission. (Exhibit C.)

Question 25. Regarding the various applications for national and State charters for the Rockefeller Foundation, will you send us: (a) Copies of the various successive applications and amendments? (b) Memoranda explaining the purpose of the proposed foundation, as submitted to the committees of Congress? (c) Such publicity matter as was issued in the interest of the foundation, suggesting the purposes it would serve, methods it would use, etc.?

Answer. The following material, consisting largely of file copies, is open to inspection at the office of the foundation. (a) The various drafts of bills and committee reports in connection with the application of the Rockefeller Foundation for a Federal charter. (b and c) Information and statements given publicly in connection with the application for a Federal charter.

Question 26. Please furnish copies of any bulletin, statements, or notices issued to the press by the foundation.

Answer. A complete list of statements issued to the press is furnished herewith. (Exhibit D.)

EXHIBIT A.

SUMMARY OF MR. KING'S EXPERIENCE WITH LABOR PROBLEMS.

I. Academic record.

1895. Honor graduate in political science of the University of Toronto. Study of labor problems begun while an undergraduate.

1896-97. Fellow in political economy, University of Chicago, resident at Hull House Social Settlement. Articles published in the Journal of Political Economy: (1) "Outline of the history of trade-union organization in the United States"; (2) "The International Typographical Union: A study in trade unionism."

1896. Author of series of special articles in Toronto Mail and Empire on the sweating system, the housing of the working classes, the growth of slums, foreign colonies in cities, etc.

1898-1900. Townsend Scholar and Henry Lee memorial fellow in political economy, Harvard University. Labor problems special field of study, as post-graduate student, and for degree of Ph. D.

1897-98. Prepared report for postmaster general of Canada on methods of carrying out Government clothing contracts in Canada and the sweating system. This report became the basis of the fair wages policy subsequently adopted by the Government of Canada.

1898. Report prepared for the Consumers' League of Boston, Mass., for presentation to the legislature, on the condition of working women in shops and stores in Boston and Cambridge, Mass.

1899-1900. Abroad, in Europe, as traveling fellow of Harvard University, studying labor problems. While in London, resident at Passmore Edwards Settlement. Also commissioned by the Canadian Government to report on methods adopted by European Governments in carrying out of Government contracts, with a view to preventing subletting and sweating.

August, 1900. Offered the position of organizing a department of labor as a new department of the Federal Government of Canada, under Sir William Mulock, the postmaster general of Canada.

II. Official record in connection with the department of labor, Canada.

October, 1900. Appointed deputy minister of labor for Canada, a position corresponding to that of Commissioner of Labor in the United States. This position was held from 1900 to 1908. It was as deputy minister of labor that Mr. King organized the different branches of work now carried on by the Federal department, including its statistical, conciliation, fair wages, library, and other branches; also prepared, or supervised the preparation of, annual and special reports on labor matters; and acted as Government conciliator in several of the largest industrial disputes arising in Canada during that time; also, while in this position, he drafted much of the legislation on labor matters enacted by the Parliament of Canada.

1900. Appointed editor of the Labor Gazette, a monthly journal issued by the department of labor, corresponding to the Labor Gazette issued by the Board of Trade in England, and somewhat similar to the Bulletin of Labor in the United States. This position held until September, 1908.

1900-1908. Acted successfully as conciliator and mediator representing the Government of Canada in the following strikes:

Year.	Locality.	Province.	Industry and employees involved.
1900	Valleyfield.....	Quebec.....	Cotton mill employees. (Militia called out during strike.)
1901	Oshawa.....	Ontario.....	Cornmakers.
	Dundas.....	do.....	Machinists.
	Grand Mere.....	Quebec.....	Fulp company employees.

March, 1907. Canadian Parliament enacted the industrial disputes investigation act. This act was drafted by Mr. King and was based, in part, on experience gained in active intervention in above disputes.

March, 1907, to September, 1908. Registrar of boards of conciliation and investigation under the industrial disputes investigation act.

1902-1908. Served on following royal commissions, in capacity indicated: 1902-3—Secretary of royal commission appointed by the Government of Canada to inquire into industrial disputes in the Province of British Columbia. 1907—Chairman of royal commission appointed by the Government of Canada to inquire into condition of telephone operatives. Other commissioner, Mr. Justice Winchester, Toronto. This commission's work resulted in important changes in conditions of labor of telephone operatives. 1907—Appointed royal commissioner by the Government of Canada to inquire into anti-Asiatic riots in Province of British Columbia; also appointed commissioner to assess and pay losses to Japanese residents in British Columbia and to assess and pay losses to Chinese residents in British Columbia arising out of said riots. 1907—Appointed by the Government of Canada royal commissioner to inquire into methods by which oriental laborers had been induced to come to Canada from India, China, and Japan. 1908—Appointed by the Government of Canada royal commissioner to inquire into conditions of cotton operatives in cotton mills of Province of Quebec. This inquiry resulted in enactment of stricter legislation in Quebec regarding employment of children in factories.

1905-1908. Special inquiries and important missions dealing with conditions affecting labor and resulting in important legislation: 1905—Conducted special investigation into fraudulent practices to induce men to come to Canada from England to take place of others on strike. This investigation resulted in the enactment of legislation drafted by Mr. King respecting false representations to induce or to deter immigration, enacted July 20, 1905. 1905—Special inquiry into methods by which Italian laborers were induced to come to Canada, and fraudulent practices of employment agencies. 1906—Special mission to England as the representative of the Government of Canada to confer with members of the British Government respecting the enactment of legislation by the British Parliament to prevent fraudulent representations being made in Great Britain to induce immigration to Canada. The result of this mission was the enactment of legislation along the lines desired, which appears as part of the merchants' shipping act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII, chap. 48). 1907—Conducted investigation and prepared report for Government of Canada into need for suppression of opium traffic in Canada. Drafted legislation which was subsequently enacted by the Parliament of Canada. 1908—Special mission to England as representative of the Government of Canada to confer with members of the British Government on the subject of immigration to Canada from India and to negotiate an agreement with the British and Indian Governments with respect to the same. An arrangement restricting immigration from India to Canada effected. 1908—Appointed by Government of Great Britain one of the British members of the international opium commission, which met at Shanghai, China. While going to China to serve on this commission Mr. King was intrusted with a further mission by the Government of Canada to the Government of India respecting immigration between that country and Canada; also with a special mission to the Government of China restricting immigration from China to Canada.

1900-1908. During this period Mr. King attended different conventions of Association of Officials of Bureaus of Labor Statistics of America and was for a time one of the vice presidents of this association.

III. Parliamentary record.

September, 1909. Elected a member of the Parliament of Canada.

June, 1909. Department of labor, Canada, created as a separate portfolio in the ministry, and Mr. King appointed a member of the privy council of Canada and minister of labor in the cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a position corresponding to that of Secretary of Labor in the United States.

1909. Introduced in the Canadian House of Commons amendments to the industrial-disputes investigation act, shown by experience to be desirable. Amendments enacted by Canadian Parliament.

1909-10. Appointed chairman of special committee of the House of Commons to investigate the eight-hour day. Supported in Parliament on behalf of the Government, as minister of labor, a bill introduced by Mr. Alphonse Verville, president of the Dominion Trades and Labor Congress, respecting the hours of labor on public works; bill passed by House of Commons.

1910. Introduced in Parliament an act to provide for the investigation of combines, trusts, monopolies, mergers. This legislation was drafted by Mr. King and introduced by him in the House of Commons January, 1910; it was enacted May 4, 1910, and has been in force since and is known as the combines-investigation act. Advocated in Parliament and, as minister of labor, secured the appointment of a royal commission on industrial training and technical education, and outlined the scope and work of this commission. Commission was vested with authority to study conditions in the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, and other countries. Its comprehensive report is a most important contribution to this subject. As minister of labor instituted an inquiry into prices in Canada. Appointed chairman of committee of House of Commons on proportional representation. While minister of labor, personally intervened to settle strike between Grand Trunk Railway Co. and employees. (Mr. Garretson, one of the members of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, present representing Brotherhood of Railroad Conductors in negotiations regarding settlement.) Represented Government of Canada at following international conferences in Europe: (1) Conference on technical education, Brussels, Belgium; (2) conference on unemployment, Paris, France; (3) meeting of International Association for Labor Legislation, Lugano, Italy.

1911. Introduced in Parliament a bill to prohibit importation and use of opium and other habit-forming drugs, which measure was enacted by Parliament. Introduced in Parliament a bill to prohibit the manufacture and importation of matches made with white phosphorus. This measure passed the House of Commons, but did not succeed in passing the Senate, owing to dissolution of Parliament at reciprocity election. The same bill, however, was reintroduced by Mr. King's successor, the present minister of labor, at a subsequent session and enacted. This measure followed an important investigation, under Mr. King's direction, into the spread of Phosphorus necrosis (phossy jaw) in Canada.

1912. Visited England, on official invitation of British Government through the Rt. Hon. Sydney Buxton, president of the board of trade in British Cabinet, to confer respecting industrial problems and legislation.

STATEMENTS ISSUED TO THE PRESS.

[Statement issued by Jerome D. Greene, secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation, Oct. 1, 1914.]

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION INAUGURATES A FAR-REACHING INVESTIGATION OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND HAS APPOINTED AS DIRECTOR HON. W. L. MACKENZIE KING, FORMER MINISTER OF LABOR IN CANADA, AUTHOR OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES ACT, AND EXPERIENCED MEDIATOR IN LABOR DISPUTES.

The trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation have decided to inaugurate an extensive investigation into the problem of industrial relations and have secured the services of the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, C. M. G., former minister of labor for Canada, as director of the investigation.

In spirit and method the investigation of the problem of industrial relations will be like that carried on by the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research and other inquiries instituted by the Rockefeller boards. All alike are practical in aim and scientific in method. In the institute for medical research the knowledge of the world is being sought by experts and brought to bear upon a limited number of human diseases. Investigation has not been deterred by the circumstances that the diseases dealt with are a part of a common inheritance through generations and that a limited knowledge sometimes pronounces them incurable.

In the anomalies which modern industrial conditions disclose there is plenty of evidence of social disorder. Labor and capital, in their relations to each other, too often suggest the bitter enmities and destructive capacities of opposing and contending forces and too rarely suggest the possibilities of harmonious and united action conforming to the laws of individual and social need. The present inquiry will seek to reveal the causes of the former and the means of promoting the efficient, practical application of the latter.

In facing the problem of industrial relations the Rockefeller Foundation is deliberately attempting to grapple with what it believes to be the most complicated and at the same time the most urgent question of modern times, and it is precisely for this reason that the investigation has been instituted. The foundation is not baffled at the outset by the knowledge that the task hitherto has seemed will-nigh hopeless and that the literature on the subject and the tried experience of the world is so vast as to be overwhelming. These may be reasons for a gradual approach and for counseling patience in the matter of results, but they afford no excuse for inaction. It is hoped that an investigation instituted on the scale and impartially and persistently pursued in the spirit and with the facilities which the foundation affords will gradually win for itself the cooperation not alone of employers and workmen, of industrial organizations, of individuals, and institutions interested in social reform, but also of universities and governments throughout the world.

In no sense will the investigation be local or restricted or carried on with particular reference to any existing situation or, for that matter, with reference to conditions in any one country. The experience of the several countries of the world will be drawn upon. In the words of the charter of the foundation, it is intended for "the well-being of mankind throughout the world," and the means taken to further this end, both as regards the subjects to be investigated and the methods of inquiry, will be in keeping with the high purpose thus expressed.

In going to another country and selecting as the person to have the direction of this most important work, one whose public services have gained for him an outstanding position as a leading authority on industrial problems, the trustees have shown their desire not only to free the foundation from any suspicion of interest or prejudice in the investigation of the most controversial of all problems, but also their readiness to enlist the services of the best men available, no matter where they are to be found. It is no small guaranty of the spirit in which the work of this investigation will be carried on that Mr. Mackenzie King, after years of public service in the handling of labor problems has, by his known impartiality and disinterested purposes, retained the good will, confidence, and respect of employers and representatives of labor alike.

The following outline of his career may serve to illustrate to what a degree Mr. King is specially qualified for the important work he has undertaken. It illustrates wherein he brings to the task the mind of a scientific investigator, the sympathy of the social worker, and the practical experience of a man of affairs.

Mr. Mackenzie King is a graduate in arts and law of the University of Toronto. From 1896 to 1900 he pursued post-graduate studies in the United States, first as fellow in political economy at the University of Chicago and later as fellow at Harvard, from which university he received the degree of master of arts and doctor of philosophy and was awarded a fellowship to travel abroad. Later he was appointed instructor in political economy on the Harvard staff, but resigned this position to organize in Canada a department of labor, as a new department of the Canadian Government. For eight years he held the position of deputy minister of labor for Canada, a position corresponding to that of Commissioner of Labor in the United States. During that time he established and was editor of the Dominion Labor Gazette, was registrar of boards of conciliation and arbitration, and the author of numerous reports on labor problems. As the result of investigations personally conducted by him the sweating system was abolished in Government contracts and a "fair-wages" policy introduced; laws for the protection of labor against false representations leading to the importation of strike breakers and unwarranted immigration, placed on the statutes, the laws respecting the employment of women and children in textile factories modified, conditions of operatives in the telephone exchanges improved, and the opium traffic in Canada abolished. During several years Mr. King acted as a conciliator in strikes in the Dominion, the number exceeding 40 and embracing the most serious disputes in Canada at the time. Experience gained in this way led to the provisions of the industrial disputes investigation act, of which Mr. King is the author, and which has reduced the number of strikes in mines, transportation companies, and public utilities by between 80 and 90 per cent in seven years. In 1908 Mr. King resigned the position of deputy minister of labor and entered Parliament as member for North Waterloo. He was taken into the cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as minister of labor, the first in Canada to occupy this position as the holder of a separate portfolio in the Government. He remained a member of the Laurier administration until its defeat in September, 1911. As minister of labor he instituted several far-reaching and important investigations, including an inquiry into prices and the cost of living, the appointment of a royal commission on industrial training and technical education, and the enactment of important legislation respecting the control of the opium traffic and the sale of morphine and other habit-forming drugs. He also secured the enactment of the Canadian combines investigation act, of which he is the author, and under which the monopolies, trusts, mergers, and combines in Canada are regulated.

A large part of Mr. King's work has had to do with the important question of oriental immigration. He has served on many royal commissions in this connection, having settled on behalf of the Government of Canada claims on the part of the Japanese and Chinese arising out of losses occasioned by the anti-Asiatic riots in British Columbia some years ago, and having conducted an extensive inquiry into the whole question of immigration from the Orient. He negotiated the agreement between England, India, and Canada regarding immigration from India. His investigations in Canada were supplemented by personal visits to the countries concerned and by direct negotiations with the Governments of India, China, and Japan.

In 1906 Mr. King was made companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George by the late King Edward VII in recognition of public services. Later he was chosen by the Imperial Government as one of the British delegates to the international opium conference, which met at Shanghai, China, in 1908. In 1910 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society of Canada, and in 1911 was made the president of the Ontario Reform Association, which position he still holds. He also organized and is chairman of the Canadian Association for International Conciliation. Having been a cabinet minister in a Canadian administration, Mr. King remains a member of the privy council of Canada for life.

FOR THE PRESERVATION OF BIRD LIFE ON THE NORTH AMERICAN CONTINENT THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION HAS PURCHASED 85,000 ACRES OF LAND ON THE GULF OF MEXICO AND HAS PLACED IT UNDER THE PROTECTION OF THE LOUISIANA CONSERVATION COMMISSION.

NEW YORK, October 3, 1914.—For the purpose of establishing another wild-fowl refuge on the northern shore of the Gulf of Mexico the Rockefeller Foundation has purchased the Grand Chenier tract containing 85,000 acres in the parishes of Cameron and Vermillion, La., at a cost of approximately $225,000. An announcement to this effect was made by the secretary of the foundation to-day, upon the execution of a deed from the Rockefeller Foundation placing the land for an initial term of five years under the protection of the Louisiana Conservation Commission. The commission, on its side, has formally accepted the tract and has undertaken to protect it by game wardens.

This purchase, the arrangements for which have consumed more than a year and a half, is another step in the program to establish throughout the winter feeding and resting grounds of birds, and along their migration routes, suitable preserves where they can be protected at all times of the year and be safe from persecution. It is due to the intelligent and public-spirited activity of Mr. E. A. McIlhenny, of Avery Island, La., who brought the matter to the attention of the Rockefeller Foundation through Mr. Starr J. Murphy, one of its trustees. Mr. McIlhenny has already been distinguished among the defenders of bird life in America by his promotion of bird preserves in different parts of the country.

The Grand Chenier tract is full of shallow ponds, lakes, and bayous, abounding in cover for the protection of birds against storms. It produces an enormous quantity of natural food, sufficient to provide for the vast number of birds from the north which winter along the Gulf coast.

The great tract purchased by the Rockefeller Foundation is an integral part of the "wild life preserve system" for which persons interested in the welfare of birds have been working for years. It is only a few miles from Marsh Island, purchased, upon the recommendation of Mr. McIlhenny, in 1912 by Mrs. Russell Sage for a bird refuge, at a cost of about $150,000. Marsh Island was for many years the greatest slaughtering ground for ducks in North America.

The Grand Chenier tract and Marsh Island are a part of a preserve of 500 square miles with a frontage of 75 miles on the Gulf coast, which it is proposed to acquire. Included in this preserve will be the 60,000 acres previously dedicated to wild life preservation by Mr. McIlhenny.

The purchase by the Rockefeller Foundation constitutes the greatest gift ever made to the preservation of bird life in America, with the exception of the bequest of David Wilcox to the National Association of Audubon Societies. This bequest amounted to $332,000. Bird lovers believe it will mark one of the most important steps ever taken for the preservation of migratory fowl, because they expect it to stimulate interest in establishing preserves in other sections of the United States and Canada.

The wild-fowl preserve on the Gulf shore of Louisiana affords winter shelter for myriads of migratory song birds, woodpeckers, and shore birds, all of which are of great service in the north when insects are busy in field, orchard, and garden.

For half a century countless thousands of ducks and geese have been shot there for the markets of New Orleans, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Chicago. The species most commonly taken were mallards, black duck, teal, and canvasback. Under the new conditions the birds which are preserved each winter on this great tract will spread out every spring in a great fan-shaped flight reaching all the way to Manitoba and spreading out in every direction.

The tract is not far from New Iberia, where it is estimated 50,000 robins are killed for food every winter. It is also near the famous McIlhenny heron rookery at Avery Island, where fully 20,000 egrets and heron breed their young in absolute security. These birds are expected to colonize the other tracts which have been acquired for their use.

NEW YORK, October 31, 1914.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., as president of the Rockefeller Foundation, authorize the following statement:

"It having become clear that one of the most terrible and appealing effects of the war will fall upon the noncombatants—those most innocent of any part in the cause or the conduct of the conflict—the Rockefeller Foundation has determined to exert itself to the extent, if necessary, of millions of dollars for the relief of noncombatants in the various countries involved.

"This action is taken as a natural step in fulfilling the chartered purposes of the foundation, namely, 'to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world.'

"I have written the American ambassador in London that 'we foresee the probability that large resources will be very much needed for rehabilitation at a time when the resources now being drawn upon for immediate relief will be perhaps very nearly exhausted. Under the circumstances we feel the need of further advice.'

"In order to obtain expert opinion as to the time, place, and means of rendering aid most effectively, the foundation has arranged to send to Europe within the next few days a commission which shall visit the countries affected and advise us first hand. The chairman of the commission will be Mr. Wickliffe Rose, director general of the International Health Commission, whose successful experience in organizing the campaign against hookworm disease in various parts of the world peculiarly fits him for the task.

"We are also seeking to enlist the cooperation of one or two others, experienced in the administration of relief to those in need.

"The sending of such a mission will not render unnecessary the efforts of other agencies of relief, for the need is widespread and millions of people are suffering. All steps which the Rockefeller Foundation takes will, of course, be absolutely neutral.

"To avoid delay and to provide relief at the earliest possible moment for the suffering people of Belgium, the foundation has chartered the largest neutral ship available in New York Harbor, and purchased a full cargo of supplies to be dispatched immediately.

"This action will but supplement the public spirited efforts of the Belgian relief committee, of which Mr. Robert W. DeForest is chairman. That the necessity is vital and worthy of the heartiest support is indicated by the following cablegrams, which, in reply to inquiries, we have received from Mr. Page, the American ambassador at London:

"'Belgians on verge of starvation. I emphatically regard it most opportune to help. I have never known such a case of need. Committee to distribute food consists of prominent Americans here and influential Belgians in Belgium, and American minister and consuls in Belgium, all under my direction. British Government forbids export of food and no food can be bought on continent. Help needed is food and clothing for women and children.

"'It will require a million dollars a month for seven or eight months to prevent starvation. In fact, many will starve now before food can reach them. No food can be bought and exported from any country in Europe. Every dollar you choose to give will save or prolong a human life if you give it quickly enough. No other time will come in any land when there can be greater need. Do not send money. Buy six parts wheat, two parts rice, two parts beans, and ship in neutral ships consigned to American consul at Rotterdam. Inform me when you ship and I will arrange all diplomatic requirements for landing, for transit to Belgium, and for distribution in small quantities by the commission of relief, which as a means of reaching all the people have taken over all grocery stores.'

"Immediately upon receiving these messages, the Rockefeller Foundation enlisted the cooperation of the shipping department of the Standard Oil Co. of New York in securing the vessel, and at the same time gladly availed itself of the voluntary services of Mr. Lionel Hageaers, a Belgian, now resident in New York and member of the Belgian relief committee, in purchasing the cargo. The foundation encountered considerable difficulty in finding a capacious vessel, and the pressure upon the market for foodstuffs was such that it was impossible to comply exactly with Ambassador Page's suggestions as to proportions. To fill and dispatch the ship called for an expenditure of about $275,000.

"On next Tuesday morning, therefore, the Massapequa, of the New York & Porto Rico Steamship Co., will sail direct to Rotterdam, Holland, laden with 4,000 tons of supplies, consigned to the American consul. The cargo will consist of 28,500 barrels of flour, 14,000 packets (100 pounds each) of rice, 3,000 bags (200 pounds each) of beans, and 1,000 boxes (100 pounds each) of bacon.

"The British consul has kindly agreed to certify that these supplies are absolutely for the aid of noncombatants and should not be delayed in transit.

"The extraordinary need in Belgium is further indicated by the following cablegram received from Mr. H. C. Hoover, of the American relief committee, in London:

"Have received reports from members of our commission, from the American minister in Brussels, and from local officials that within three weeks the last vestige of foodstuffs in Belgium will have been exhausted and the entire population of over 7,000,000 people will be faced with starvation. The minimum supply of foodstuffs required amounts to about 90,000 tons of cereals per month, together with bacon or lard. The minimum monthly expenditure required is from four to five million dollars, of which some part returnable through sales. It therefore appears that the problem of feeding the people of Belgium transcends other Belgian relief. The one function of Americans in Belgian relief is the purchase and dispatch of food. We have expended every dollar that we have received in the purchase and dispatch of foodstuffs already, and it will take all the funds we can raise here to take care of emergency pending arrival of stuffs from America."

"It is obvious that no philanthropic exertion will be too great to relieve the acute suffering of those victims of the war who are innocent of any participation in it."

NEW YORK, November 8, 1914.

In order that there may be the greatest dispatch in collecting foodstuffs for the relief of the noncombatant people of Belgium, the Rockefeller Foundation, in addition to the measures of relief initiated by itself, has arranged to provide a steamship pier, to charter ships, and to convey free of charge from New York to Belgium such supplies as the public may wish to contribute.

This plan is in cooperation with the Belgium relief committee of New York, of which Mr. Robert W. de Forest is chairman. The purpose is that through the facilities provided by the foundation and the activities of the committee in collecting funds and supplies, various individuals and agencies throughout the country who desire such cooperation may make their assistance most timely and effective.

To this end Mr. Robert W. de Forest and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., on behalf of the foundation and the committee, have joined in an appeal to the public of the United States to give either in money or supplies for Belgium relief.

Arrangements have been made with the Bush Terminal in New York to act as a receiving depot. The Rockefeller Foundation is negotiating to obtain as quickly as possible another large neutral ship. As rapidly as a cargo is collected it will be forwarded direct to Belgium.

The facilities thus provided insure that any contribution in money will be expended solely for supplies, and in no part for organization or distribution charges. Any person who gives either in money or in food can be certain that the whole of his contribution will reach some one in Belgium who needs help.

Following the announcement that the Rockefeller Foundation would send a commission of experts to Europe to advise as to time, place, and means whereby relief can be best provided for needy noncombatants in all the warring countries, that commission has now been constituted as follows: Mr. Wickliffe Rose, chairman, director general of the International Health Commission; Mr. Ernest P. Bicknell, national director of the American Red Cross, whose supplies to Belgium, and as to whether the placing of mines in the North Sea who has had exceptional experience in the conduct of relief after the San Francisco earthquake in 1906, and in other disasters.

In reference to the war relief commission, the plans for sending cargoes of supplies to Belgium, and as to whether the placing of mines in the North Sea would interfere, Ambassador Page, of London, has cabled as follows:

"Hurry Rose. North Sea adds no difficulty or danger. British Navy will convoy your ship. The International Commission for Relief here organized committees in Holland and Belgium under diplomatic arrangements made by Governments of the United States, Spain, Holland, and Belgium, and have secured guaranty of safety from German military authorities, and made a perfect system for distribution by Belgians in every neighborhood in Belgium. This does not call for the sending of money to England. It calls only for food to be sent to starving women and children in Belgium, and this is the only channel."

The war relief commission will sail for Europe on the steamship Lapland next Wednesday. They will go direct to Liverpool, and then to Belgium. As rapidly as their recommendations are received the Rockefeller Foundation will take steps to carry them out. The public will be fully advised of the conditions as reported, for the cooperation of all Americans will be required if this vast problem is to be solved.

BELGIAN RELIEF—FOOD SUPPLY.

AN APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

The Belgian relief committee in New York appeals to the people of the United States to relieve the distress of the unfortunate people of Belgium whose homes have been devastated by the war, and who are now in desperate need of food. We are advised by the American committee in London that, in order to meet the absolute necessities, food must be imported in very large quantities from America. The Belgian relief committee, with the cooperation of the Rockefeller Foundation, has made the following arrangements:

Chambers of Commerce, boards of trade, trade associations, women's clubs, and other organizations or individuals throughout the United States wishing to make contributions may do so in either of two ways:

1. By sending contributions of money to the Belgian Relief Committee, No. 10 Bridge Street, New York City. Checks should be drawn to the order of Belgian relief committee. All receipts will be acknowledged and credited to the organizations, committees, or individuals from which they come, and the Belgian minister will be kept informed of contributions received. The concentration of money contributions in the hands of the New York committee will avoid competition in the purchase of supplies and the consequent increase in prices.

2. By shipping any of the following articles, charges prepaid, preferably in carload lots: Wheat, flour, rice, coffee (one-fourth chicory), peas, beans, canned goods, and cured or salted meats.

Perishable goods, such as potatoes, apples, or other fresh fruits, can not be accepted.

All shipments should be consigned to the Belgian Relief Committee, Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, N. Y. As shipments will have to stand railroad journey, transfer at New York, and a long sea voyage, they should be shipped in good strong packages. Individual packages should have a tag showing the contents.

The Rockefeller Foundation will bear the expense of ocean transportation of all supplies thus furnished to the European port most accessible to Belgium. As the extent of need and the amount of supplies which will be contributed can not now be predicted with certainty, this offer of the foundation will for the present apply only to shipments received in New York on or before December 31, 1914, but is subject to renewal if circumstances require.

There is no purpose to interfere with the entire freedom of any individual or organization to render aid in his or its own way, but rather to provide efficient transportation and distribution facilities which may be freely utilized by all who may desire to avail themselves of such cooperation.

To save hundreds of thousands of Belgians from starvation it is evident that very large demands will have to be made upon the generosity of the American people. The Belgian relief committee and Rockefeller Foundation having determined to cooperate in sending relief as promptly and efficiently as possible, now join in asking the good people of this country to do their utmost in this extreme emergency.

The arrangements for distribution have been made by the American committee in London, of which Ambassador Page is chairman, and provide for distributing stations in Belgium under the immediate supervision of the American consuls in the afflicted region. Every precaution seems to have been taken to insure the delivery of supplies to needy persons for whom otherwise no provision whatever would be made.

Serious problems will undoubtedly arise as to the organization of relief measures, including the great task of rehabilitation which must follow emergency relief. In order that the aid coming from America may be constantly guided by the most reliable information as to the location and extent of need and the methods of relief, the Rockefeller Foundation is sending a war relief commission to Europe to supply this information from time to time. The public will be kept informed concerning the progress of relief measures so that the extent and manner of its participation may be most wisely determined.

All communications should be addressed to the Belgian Relief Committee, 10 Bridge Street, New York City.

NEW YORK, December 7, 1914.

Mr. Jerome D. Greene, who for a year or more past has divided his time between acting as a member of Mr. John D. Rockefeller's personal staff and as secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation, has been obliged, on account of the increasing demands of the latter position, to suspend his activities as a member of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff and will for the present devote his entire time to the executive work of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Mr. Ivy L. Lee, now executive assistant to the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, has accepted appointment as an additional member of Mr. Rockefeller's staff, the other members of which, besides Mr. Greene, are Messrs. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and Starr J. Murphy.

Mr. Lee is a graduate of Princeton University. After several years' journalistic work he served for three years as general manager in Europe for Messrs. Harris, Winthrop & Co., bankers. He returned two years ago to become associated with the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, having retired from active business 15 or 20 years ago, his staff, of which Mr. Lee becomes a member, are his immediate advisers in matters both of business and philanthropy, and are his direct representatives in the various corporations in which he is financially interested, and on the large philanthropic boards which he has created.

[Released for publication Monday, Dec. 7, 1914.]

Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., as president of the Rockefeller Foundation, authorizes the following statement:

The international interest aroused in the work of the Rockefeller Foundation through its efforts on behalf of Belgian relief has led to innumerable inquiries for details as to its work and purposes. The fact that the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations is contemplating an investigation of the foundation's plan to conduct an inquiry into industrial relations indicates a further interest in the foundation's activities.

Its object being wholly one of public service, the policy of the foundation is to furnish current information with reference to its work, hoping thereby to enlist that confidence and active cooperation on the part of the public which is so necessary to the successful fulfillment of its purposes. It therefore seems fitting at this time to make a brief statement of the more important work so far accomplished and planned, to be followed by the annual report now in preparation, which will contain full details of the foundation's activities and finances.

The foundation has thus far dispatched one shipload of food—4,000 tons—to Belgium, which has already been received and distributed; it is now loading a second ship in New York Harbor which will carry 6,500 tons, and has purchased for delivery at Philadelphia to a third ship 280,000 bushels of wheat. These three shiploads represent an expenditure of about $1,000,000. It has also sent a commission to Europe to advise as to how and where further relief to noncombatants may be most effectively provided, and is ready to spend millions of dollars, if necessary, in this direction.

Realizing that the war and the industrial depression have created great want at home, the foundation, acting upon requests from various local charitable organizations, has just voted to contribute $45,000 to assist in the relief of the poor of New York City. Of this amount the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor will receive $25,000, the charity organization society, $10,000; and the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities, $10,000.

The foundation has established the International Health Commission, the purpose of which is to extend not only in this country but to foreign countries and peoples the work of eradicating the hookworm disease and the establishment of agencies for the promotion of public health and sanitation. The commission is already at work in the British West Indies, Central America, Ceylon, the Malay States, and the Philippines.

Last spring the China Medical Commission was appointed, to study the needs of medical education and health in China, and its important and far-reaching recommendations are now receiving consideration.

Other appropriations of special public significance are as follows: $2,550,000 to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research for addition to land, buildings, and endowment; $750,000 toward the fund being raised by Wellesley College because of the emergency resulting from its extensive fire loss; $225,000 for the purchase of a tract of 85,000 acres on the Louisiana coast of the Gulf of Mexico, which has been turned over to the Louisiana Conservation Commission as a refuge for migratory birds, which gather here in winter from all parts of the North American Continent. This was done to prevent the wanton destruction of this wild life, so important to the agricultural interests in keeping down the insect pests which, it is estimated, inflict a loss upon the country of upward of $400,000,000 a year.

Next in public interest to the Belgian relief work has been the establishment of a department for the investigation of industrial relations, to direct which Mr. Mackenzie King, formerly minister of labor of Canada, has been appointed.

For several years past Mr. John D. Rockefeller and his advisers have had under consideration the establishment of an organization for social and economic research. Upon the establishment of the Rockefeller Foundation, one of the first matters discussed was the advisability of the organization of such an institution, and a committee of leading economists and business men was created to consider whether such an organization could wisely be established.

While the general subject of economic research was under consideration the industrial disturbances in Colorado impressed the president of the foundation with the great need and public importance of finding an effective means of preventing such conflicts and caused him to urge a far-reaching study of industrial relations as the most important immediate inquiry to which the foundation could direct its attention.

In view of the passion aroused in Colorado and many divergent interests involved there, it was felt that the foundation itself should not interfere in that situation, but that it was of the utmost consequence that the root causes of that and similar disturbances should be ascertained and, if possible, removed, not only in Colorado but elsewhere.

The Rockefeller Foundation is, moreover, a large owner of corporate securities, and in that capacity is itself directly concerned in maintaining harmonious relations between the companies in which it is interested and their employees. It was therefore felt that if the foundation could work out on a basis compatible with sound economics a substantial improvement in the relations between capital and labor, it would not only be discharging its obligation as indirectly a large employer of labor, but would also perform for the general public a greater social service than it could render along usual philanthropic lines. It was also felt that there was hardly anything the foundation could do which would more effectively conform to its chartered purposes, namely, "to promote the well-being of mankind."

Realizing that the success of such an endeavor would depend almost entirely upon the character and attainments of the person conducting the work, the foundation felt itself peculiarly fortunate in being able to enlist the co-operation of Mr. Mackenzie King, who had had wide experience in the actual solution of labor problems in Canada.

Mr. King has from the outset indicated to the foundation his desire to avoid any form of organization which may cause it even to appear that his work is intended to rival or encroach upon the work of existing organizations, and in particular the work properly assignable to Government departments and agencies.

In spirit and method the work will be akin to that of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. In so far as Mr. King's inquiries have to do with industrial controversies, his attitude will be that of a physician who investigates the nature and causes of the pathological conditions with which he has to deal, with a view, if possible, to the discovery of effective remedies.

It can not be too clearly understood that the purpose of this inquiry is not to apportion blame in present or past misunderstandings nor to justify any particular point of view; the sole purpose is to be constructively helpful. The final and only test of the work will be the degree to which the constructive suggestions growing out of the investigation actually improve the relations between capital and labor.

The foregoing summarizes the major activities so far undertaken by the foundation. A statement covering completely the finances of the foundation is in preparation and will be made public.

[Released for publication Tuesday, Dec. 8.]

In the general summary of its work and plans given out yesterday the Rockefeller Foundation announced that it was preparing for publication in advance of its annual report a complete statement of its finances.

The funds of the foundation, all of which were contributed by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, consist of securities the market value of which at the time they were donated was $100,000,000. In making this gift Mr. Rockefeller expressly empowered the directors of the foundation, in their discretion, to utilize either the principal or the income or both for the chartered purposes of the foundation, namely, "to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world."

The directors of the foundation are Messrs. Charles W. Elliot, president emeritus of Harvard University; Dr. Simon Flexner, scientific director of the Rockefeller Institute; Frederick T. Gates, Jerome D. Greene, A. Barton Hepburn, chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank; Charles O. Heydt, Harry Pratt Judson, president of the University of Chicago; Starr J. Murphy, John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and Wickliffe Rose, director general of the International Health Commission.

The income of the foundation to date has been approximately $5,500,000; its appropriations approximately $6,500,000.

The funds which Mr. Rockefeller has given to the foundation are as follows: (For statement of funds referred to see under Schedule D of this exhibit.)

It was for many years the custom of Mr. Rockefeller in dealing with applications or suggestions concerning philanthropic objects to base his decision upon an expert investigation of the merits of each case. As time went on the task of deciding wisely upon an ever-increasing mass of applications, and, what was even more important, of providing the constructive imagination necessary for intelligent philanthropy, became more and more onerous.

For these reasons Mr. Rockefeller felt the need of organizations or groups of counsellors specially fitted to deal with such matters, and which should be independent of the life of any individual. He has accordingly for the past 15 or 20 years delegated his activities in this direction more and more to the various organizations and institutions he has created. The more important of these, each with its separate and independent funds, are: The General Education Board, The Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and the Rockefeller Foundation.

JANUARY 1, 1915.

The steamship Massapequa was dispatched to Rotterdam by the Rockefeller Foundation yesterday with 3,500 tons of food and clothing for the Belgian war sufferers. This is the second voyage of the Massapequa, which was the first of the Belgian relief ships to leave this country.

The foundation has now spent over $1,000,000 on ships and cargoes for Belgian relief. The Massapequa sailed on her first voyage November 2, with a cargo purchased by the foundation. The next ship dispatched was the Agamemnon, December 4, with 2,800 tons of food purchased by the Belgian relief committee and the committee of mercy. The Neches sailed on December 12, with 5,800 tons of food supplied entirely by the Rockefeller Foundation.

The Massapequa yesterday carried a cargo made up of donations received from all over the United States, in response to the joint appeal of the foundation and the Belgian relief committee.

In addition the foundation supplied a cargo of wheat for the steamship Ferrona, which was dispatched from Philadelphia December 23, by the commission for relief in Belgium.

The first object of the Rockefeller Foundation in taking up the matter of Belgian relief in October was to start with the least possible delay the stream of food supplies flowing into Belgium from this country. In the extreme emergency that was presented considerations as to the efficiency of the distributing organization in Belgium and as to the possibility of obstacles being confronted in the course of distribution, had to be delayed for later inquiry, but steps were taken to make such inquiry at the earliest possible moment. Accordingly a war relief commission was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Wickliffe Rose, director general of the International Health Commission; Ernest P. Bicknell, national director of the American Red Cross; and Henry James, Jr., manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and this commission sailed for Europe on November 11, 1914. The commission found the London organization of the American commission for relief in Belgium active and efficient. The Rockefeller commission then proceeded to Rotterdam and Belgium and for several weeks studied the extent of the need and inspected the distributing agencies, with the result that they were able to give the highest praise to the joint activities of the American commission, the Belgian relief agencies, and the diplomatic authorities of the several countries concerned. The commission is now giving its consideration to other aspects of war relief in Europe, and a further report is shortly expected.

ROCKEFELLER, JR., EXHIBIT NO. 2.

FULL SET OF BOWERS-ROCKEFELLER CORRESPONDENCE.

[A.—Correspondence submitted by John D. Rockefeller, jr., to United States Commission on Industrial Relations, May 14, 1915.]

MAY 13, 1913.

DEAR MR. HEYDT: Yours of the 10th, inclosing a letter of Mr. Frank S. Hoag, of the Pueblo Star-Journal, is at hand.

While I know nothing about the paper referred to as a business proposition, I think it would be undesirable for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to have Mr. Rockefeller interested in a newspaper at this time in a financial or any other way.

The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. for many years were accused of being the political dictator of southern Colorado, and, in fact, were a mighty power in the entire State. When I came here it was said that the C. F. & I. Co. voted every man and woman in their employ, without any regard to their being naturalized or not, and even their mules, it used to be remarked, were registered, if they were fortunate enough to possess names. Anyhow, a political department was maintained at a heavy expense. I had before me the contributions of the C. F. & I. Co. for the campaign of 1904, amounting to $80,603, paid out personally by President Hearne. All the vouchers and checks I have examined, personally, all of which were payable to Albert A. Miller, upon which he drew the currency, and, it is said, handed the money over to Mr. Hearne, who paid it out. So far as I can discover, not one particle of good was accomplished for the company, but Mr. Hearne was an aspirant for the position of United States Senator and devoted a vast amount of time and money with this end in view, I have no doubt.

The company became notorious in many sections for their support of the liquor interests. They established saloons everywhere they possibly could. This department was managed by one John Keblor, a brother of the one-time president of the company, who died, about the time I came here, a victim of his own intemperate habits. A sheriff, elected by the votes of the C. F. & I. Co. employees, and who has been kept in office a great many years, established himself, or became a partner, in 16 liquor stores in our coal mines. To clean up the saloons, and with them the gambling hells and houses of prostitution, has been one of the things that Mr. Welborn and I have devoted an enormous amount of time to during the past five years. The decent newspapers everlastingly lampooned the C. F. & I. Co. at every election, and I am forced to say the company merited, from a moral standpoint, every shot that was fired into their camp.

Since I came here not a nickel has been paid to any politician or political party. We have fought the saloons with all the power we possess. We have forbidden any politician from going into our camps, and every subordinate official connected with the company has been forbidden to influence our men to vote for any particular candidate. We have not lobbied in the legislature, but have gone directly to the governor and other able men and have demanded fair treatment.

We have secured, the past winter, a mining law almost entirely written by our own superintendent, E. H. Weitzel, with four other men appointed by the senate committee, including representatives of labor, a capable engineer and two representatives of the operators. It is just and fair to all concerned and meets every requirement of the labor organizations, excepting that there are no special privileges granted to labor unions.

We have now reached the point where we have the respect of the prominent men as well as the common laborers of Colorado, because of our fair treatment and continual efforts to improve the conditions of mining. Even the old-time bitter political enemies of the company now say they have not one word of criticism to offer against the company from a political standpoint. The newspapers, for the most part, are courteous, and it is not often we see an article upbraiding our company or its employees.

If you should become financially interested in the newspaper referred to, the C. F. & I. Co. would be immediately accused by the other newspapers of Pueblo and of the southern counties of the State as having taken a new tack in the control of politics, and we would be upbraided just the same as if we were backing the paper, because it is well known that the Rockefeller interests are managing the affairs of the C. F. & I. Co. Therefore, I think it would be a very serious matter to the company if you should take any interest in Mr. Hoag's enterprise.

I think I have never written a letter along this line, and I am doing so now for your files.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

THE PUEBLO STAR-JOURNAL,
Pueblo, Colo., May 5, 1913.

Mr. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: About eight years ago I was engaged to take the management of this newspaper, which I found to be losing from $6,000 to $8,000 a year. By hard work I have reversed conditions and the paper is now on a paying basis, and from the position of being the "trailer" in the newspaper field here it has come to be the acknowledged leading newspaper in Colorado outside of Denver.

I would like to buy the Star-Journal in such a manner that I could use its influence to do the right thing under any and all conditions, regardless of financial consequences. In other words, the trouble with most newspapers is that every time they attempt to take a stand for what they are satisfied is right some advertiser steps up and uses his club.

The Star-Journal is now so good, such a much wanted and such a widely read paper in Pueblo, that the largest department store in the city had to come back of its own accord after cutting us out for a month or six weeks, for the reason that one of the department-store owners wanted a franchise across the business section of the city, thus creating four dangerous grade crossings to which the people are opposed, and we stopped it. I mention this to let you know how the people regard this paper, and I want to get the financial burden against it, if I buy it, in such shape that I can use the paper for the purpose of advancing the best interests of the city and State in all matters that come up. We are likely to have another wet and dry fight, and I would like to put the paper in position to do the right thing on this question.

Would you be interested in making an investment of $75,000 in the shape of first-mortgage bonds at 4 per cent interest, payable semiannually, against this newspaper and its property? It would cost $100,000 to duplicate the plant and our building, while our franchise, good will, going business, etc., is worth $50,000. The Pueblo Chieftain sold for $175,000, with not as good plant as we have, with somewhat of a lost prestige, and I would not trade propositions even with them.

The 4 per cent interest may seem rather low, but the investment is safe, and I want the financial obligations to be as light as possible to make the paper as independent as possible. I can get time on the balance of the money I will have to pay for the stock of the paper. Other information if desired.

Yours, truly,

FRANK A. HOAG.

ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS THANK THE STAR-JOURNAL FOR ITS EFFORTS TO ENCOURAGE CHURCH ATTENDANCE.

It is the custom of the Star-Journal each Saturday to devote a portion of its first-page space to an article urging the people of Pueblo to observe the Sabbath day for the purpose for which it was set apart.

From every denomination in Pueblo, for this is an undenominational effort on the part of the Star-Journal, evlences have been tendered to show that the efforts of the Journal are not only appreciated, but also that the power of a newspaper for the accomplishment of a lofty and beneficial purpose is practically unlimited. In every place of worship more people are now attending church than before the Star-Journal began the campaign for a larger and more representative church attendance.

The Star-Journal is pleased to exert its influence in this connection, for whatever makes for better citizenship in any community is a guaranty of stronger community foundations, which depend upon the character of the people themselves. Below is an additional unsolicited testimonial from the ministerial association which speaks for itself:

PUEBLO, COLO., April 21, 1913.

STAR-JOURNAL PUBLISHING Co.,
Pueblo, Colo.

DEAR SIRS: We, the ministers of the Pueblo Ministerial Association, desire to express our appreciation of the splendid work you are doing by editorials and news articles to encourage church attendance in this city. We feel that it is the very best help we could get. Many of the pastors have spoken of your work from the pulpit. It is indeed encouraging to meet with such loyal support.

Most sincerely, yours,

THE PUEBLO MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION,
By GEO. N. MENDENHALL, Secretary.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. Executive department. L. M. Bowers, chairman.]

203 MAIN STREET,
Binghamton, N. Y., September 4, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: Reports are about completed for our fiscal year, and we are well pleased with the showing all things considered. Our profits would have exceeded 1912 if wages had not been advanced, costing us about $200,000 over the former year. The net profit, however, comes with $50,000 of 1912, the best year in the history of the company. Net for 1912, $1,701,226.69. Net for 1913, $1,647,192.10. Adding the extra wages paid and no advance in prices and the comparison makes a new high record. The month of August has been extra dull in all but rails, but July was $35,063.49 over July, 1912.

There has been a group of labor-union agitators in southern Colorado for more than a month and threatening to call a strike for the purpose of securing a recognition of the Western Federation of Miners, but protests have come from nearly all the State officials from the governor down, together with the protests from the boards of trade and of commercial bodies, so that the matter has quieted down, though their national officials are still in Colorado.

This has kept us all in a state of unrest, so that my vacation has been a season of worry. A disaster of this sort would put us up against a fight that would be serious indeed.

I expect to leave for Denver the 15th.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

26 BROADWAY,
New York, September 16, 1913.

MR. L. M. BOWERS,
Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: Mr. Ethelbert Stewart, chief statistician of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor, called last week to see Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., but was unable to see him, as Mr. Rockefeller had not returned from his vacation. He was told that Mr. Rockefeller was expected yesterday, so he called again yesterday morning. While Mr. Rockefeller has returned to the city, he has not yet been at the office, and, having been informed of Mr. Stewart's call, suggested that I see Mr. Stewart, which I did to-day. He presented credentials from the Secretary of Labor, saying that he had been appointed as mediator in the threatened controversy between the coal miners and the coal operators of Colorado.

Mr. Stewart called pursuant to appointment and said that the coal miners had sent a letter to all of the coal operators in Colorado asking for a conference with a view to establishing union conditions in the mines of Colorado; that they had received no reply from the operators; and that they then appealed to the Commissioner of Labor to appoint a mediator, and sent him a copy of the letter they had sent to the operators. Mr. Stewart showed me a copy. He said that he had called here with a view to ascertaining whether it would be worth while for him to go to Colorado, as he did not feel like making the trip if it would be entirely fruitless. He also said that he understood that a convention of the miners had been called which was to be held yesterday, and that the operators had been invited to attend that, but had made no reply. He was also informed that the other operators in Colorado had decided to follow the lead of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

I told him that this was a matter that would have to be handled by the executive officers in Colorado; that we here in the East knew nothing about the conditions and would be unwilling to make any suggestions to the executive officers. He replied that he could, of course, understand that the situation would have to be handled by the men in Colorado, but he thought that questions of policy could be determined here. I told him that the situation was so important a factor in determining the question of policy that we could not treat it as a separate matter. He said that he had not communicated with the officers in Colorado. He referred to the situation in 1903 and expressed the opinion that if the policy which then obtained was to be continued there was very little that he could do. I told him I was not familiar with the conditions in 1903, as I was not then connected with the company. He then asked whether you were there in 1903, and I told him that my impression was that you were not. He seemed interested in that statement and said that perhaps might make a difference.

Our interview was very pleasant, and Mr. Stewart does not seem to be at all of the labor-agitator type. He referred to the Calumet & Hecla controversy, which he said was finally settled in Boston, and not in Montana. I repeated the statement that we here would certainly not attempt to interfere in the matter, nor would we be willing to make any suggestion unless, after the matter had been presented to the executive officers in Colorado, they saw fit to refer the matter to us.

I am reporting this to you without any suggestion, merely to advise you of what occurred.

Very truly, yours,

STARR J. MURPHY.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1913.

DEAR MR. MURPHY: Your favor of the 16th is at hand and has been read by both Mr. Welborn and myself with great satisfaction. You handled the matter raised by Mr. Stewart with exceptional skill, and it leaves us unhandicapped in event there is a strike among the coal miners in southern Colorado. For the information of your office, I will state as briefly as possible the demands of the organizers and agitators of the United Mine Workers of America and our relation at the present time in connection therewith.

We have spent a great deal of time and studied with a good deal of care all the questions in connection with labor unions among miners and men employed by industrial corporations during the past two or three years, anticipating in time having to meet the demands of union labor. We follow the eastern rules of mining as to wages, prices per ton, and the several different features that obtain in the mining industries, both where union and nonunion labor is employed. This applies to our steel works as well as to our mining operations.

We have found it desirable to take up from time to time these questions that were likely to lead to controversy and study them from every angle, and where we could meet them by making certain economic changes without loss we have taken the initiative in their application in this mining district. We have been opposed by some of our competitive operators, whose notions of fairness are, in our opinion, somewhat lopsided, but our position among them was such that we have been able to inaugurate and carry out these changes without serious criticism on the part of these competitors. To-day they are patting us on our backs.

We studied the eight-hour problem, which we knew would come up in the form of bills in the legislature and would be pushed through by agitators on the ground who were backing them, so we anticipated these matters and experimented with eight-hour labor. For instance, we have a large percentage of employees who work by the day—timbermen, drivers, carmen, men outside, on tipples, etc.—at all of our mines. These men were on hand at 7 o'clock in the morning and stayed throughout the entire day, while the coal miners work by the ton, some coming at 7, some at 8, and some at 9, some working until 1, others until 3, others all day, averaging, however, not more than about seven hours' work per man. Generally speaking, we found that working our mines eight hours saved us in overhead expenses and in other ways enough to offset any loss than might come from an 8 instead of a 9 or 10 hour day in many of our mines. After this had been thoroughly settled in our minds we established an eight-hour day for all coal miners, complying with the union rules in that respect, but operating as nonunion mines.

Another question that we knew would come up in case of agitation was the semimonthly pay. All the mining companies in Colorado paid monthly, and there was great opposition in regard to semimonthly pay on the part of some of our competitive operators. We never had any demand from our miners for a change, with one exception. In a little remote section of the State, where we had a small mine in operation, they spoke to our superintendent, asking if it would be objectionable to us if we could send their money up twice a month, so that their womenfolks could go out of town some distance to trade if they wanted to do so, or possibly take a trip to their home land without the necessity of waiting until the end of the month. No demand was made; it was simply a request on the part of a few miners there. This led us to take up the question, knowing that if we paid at one mine we would have to pay at 20 or 30 mines, and in order to satisfy these people at this place we not only made a semimonthly pay day there, but at all of our mines, very much to the delight of our employees—wholly unsolicited, as you see, but it was done as a matter of policy, anticipating that these questions might arise sooner or later as well as because of our willingness to accommodate our employees, even at some extra cost to us.

Another matter was the weighmen employed at the mines. For several years our company has raised no objection but has requested our miners to select their own weighmen, as is done in eastern mines where union labor is employed. This weighman has to be paid by a small assessment against each miner. Trifling though it is, our men would perhaps employ a weighman for a month, and then becoming satisfied that our own weighman was giving them correct weights, they invariably refused to continue the one selected by them. As our miners shift more or less and new men are coming all the while, about a year ago Mr. Welborn and the writer were discussing these questions, because one or two competitive companies (both of whom tried to interest Mr. Cooper in their bonds) were cheating their miners by false weights, which some newspapers had taken up, and we agreed to post circulars at all our mines stating that we had always encouraged miners to employ their own weighmen, which our old employees were all familiar with, but for the benefit of newcomers we posted the notice to advise them that they were welcome to and urged to select their own weighmen. So far as I know not a single man was selected.

Another question was the accusation that miners were forced to trade at the company stores. In order to settle this we had our storekeepers and all interested say to our employees that they were welcome to trade at our stores or go anywhere they wished, as the money was their own; that we would be glad if they would trade with us, though they were perfectly free to trade where they pleased, and no man's standing would be changed if he saw fit not to trade with us. During the past few months, since the agitators have been in the State, we have had men make a careful canvass of our camps and we have yet to find a single case of dissatisfaction on this account.

The above covers every demand being made now by the agitators, with the exception of recognition of the union and a trumped-up demand of a 10 per cent advance, which is entirely buncombe, as our scales of wages practically conform to those of other bituminous-coal sections, and the average wages of our men are higher than in any other soft-coal mining section we know of. This is included in their demand to fool the public and to inspire our miners to unite with the union.

The main question, and, in fact, the only matter up between the United Mine Workers of America and the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., is recognition of the union, which we flatly refuse to do, or even meet with these agitators to discuss or take up this question directly or indirectly.

Northern Colorado has had a strike for three and a half years. The companies were handicapped for a year or more, but have whipped the organization and are operating to full capacity without any serious difficulty as nonunion mines. They formerly employed union miners, whose rules became so oppressive that the operators were compelled to rid themselves of union dictation.

I will not undertake to enumerate these objections to union labor here. They are many. One is the quality of the output under union domination, which is inferior. It is impossible to discharge incompetent labor without the matter being brought up for investigation by officials of the union, both in and out of the State, and numerous requirements that practically take away the mines from the control of the owners and operators and place them in the hands of these, in many cases, disreputable agitators, socialists, and anarchists.

In canvassing our numerous mines we find practically all of our miners opposed to a strike or any disturbance in the relations existing between the company and themselves, including possibly 5 or 10 per cent who are inactive members of unions. These labor agitators have caused to be circulated throughout the United States false statements, which Mr. Welborn says are 100 per cent lies. In other words, they claim that all the things above enumerated, which have been put in operation by our company without demands or solicitation, are unobserved in southern Colorado. While they may be able to find a few little operators who are unable to meet all the requirements and who are not doing as well for their miners as we are, they make no distinction and give the impression broadcast that all the coal mines of southern Colorado, including our own, are guilty of violating all of these rules which the unions have been able to secure in many sections of the country. So far as we are concerned, every single word is false. We have the good will of our men, and they are perfectly satisfied. Not more than 10 per cent belong to unions, and these are old miners who have belonged to unions in the Eastern States for many years and retain their membership as a matter of sentiment, rather than of protection.

It is difficult to tell what the outcome of the threatened strike will be, as letters are being sent to our miners demanding that they quit their jobs or it will go hard with them. Fear of the Black Handers, especially among these foreigners, is far from being phantom, but is a real thing. Though we hope to be able to keep a large number of our men, many of those who do go out will, after a few days when they find we are able to protect them, return to their work. The strike is called for the 23d, but it is thought on the part of a good many operators that the officials, anticipating being whipped, will undertake to sneak out if they can secure even an interview with the operators, which so far they have been unable to do, thus boasting before the public that they have secured the principal point, namely, recognition of the union.

This covers practically the whole matter, so far as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is concerned.

In behalf of Mr. Welborn and myself I want to thank you again for the exceptionally able manner in which you discussed this question with Mr. Stewart.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

SEPTEMBER 19, 1913.

DEAR MR. MURPHY: Mr. Welborn has called my attention to a matter I omitted in my first letter to you to-day, which is an important one.

This so-called convention, held on the 15th instant at Trinidad, where the strike was called, was made up principally of union men brought into Trinidad from northern Colorado, where the strike referred to in my former letter has been going on for three and a half years or more, together with paid heelers, and so far as we have been able to learn from our own men in the convention there was none from any of our mines who had been sent there as a representative of the miners. The five or six of our men who were there dropped in as men drop into a political convention, not as delegates, with one or two exceptions. One of these exceptions, for instance, was a man who had secured employment in one of our mines a short time before, worked a few days, asked for his time, which was given him, amounting to $11 or thereabouts. Some remark was made to him in regard to the small amount of money he earned, and he stated that that was all right; he didn't calculate to mine much, as he was getting $5 a day from the labor officials to represent the mine in the convention as a delegate.

What is true in this single case was the practice followed by these agitators in all sections of southern Colorado. In fact, the men attending the convention that called the strike were imported and hired fellows who were self-appointed delegates, pretending to act for the mine, which was absolutely false in every particular.

We mention this to show you to what extremes these men will go in order to carry their point.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: Your letter of September 4, inclosing statement for the fiscal year, was forwarded to me at Seal Harbor and read with much interest. The showing which your company has made this year is very gratifying. We are glad to have the president and vice president of the company know of our appreciation of the work which they have done and in which we know they have been so ably seconded by the loyal organization which they have built up.

I have delayed acknowledging the report, that I might have the opportunity of sending this personal word of appreciation.

Very sincerely,

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.

Mr. L. M. BOWERS,

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. L. M. Bowers, vice president and treasurer.]

SEPTEMBER 29, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: Mr. Welborn and the writer have read your letter of the 24th, and we appreciate your very kind remarks in regard to our management of the affairs of the C. F. & I. Co.

You have doubtless read that a coal strike has been ordered over the entire coal fields of southern Colorado, including all of the companies engaged in that territory, as well as in northern Colorado and the new coal field of Routt County.

In northern Colorado, where a strike has been on for more than three and a half years, practically no attention has been given to the call of the labor disturbers and the mines are all working full force.

In southern Colorado, where we are so largely interested, from 40 to 60 per cent of the miners have quit work, but it is safe to say that out of an estimate of 8,000 men who are out, 7,000 of them have quit from fear of the Black Hand and similar organizations, who, through letters or face to face, threaten to kill the men, do violence to their wives and daughters, and practice all of the hellish villainy that these creatures possess. One of our marshals, who was one of the best men in our employ, was deliberately shot by Greeks when he undertook to stop them from tearing down a bridge. A bus carrying a few men was held up by 25 or more striking miners and the occupants ordered to leave the camp. These men happened not to be miners, but employes of railroads, which probably saved them from a severe beating up when that fact was discovered.

Hayes, vice president of the United Mine Workers of America, together with representatives here in this State, are the principal mischief makers. They have been able to load some newspapers with their lying statements and are permitted to gather gangs and crowds together in the streets, making speeches that would scarcely be permitted in any European country. Old "Mother" Jones has been on the ground for two weeks, but Saturday, we understand, the governor ordered her to be taken to the State line and ordered not to return. We have not been able to verify this statement this morning.

Mr. Ethelbert Stewart, who called at your office, is in the State and is surrounded by and associated with Hayes, Brake, Lawson, and other men of that stamp who are at the bottom of this strike. Mr. Stewart spent part of one afternoon with me, going over every point raised by these agitators, and he confessed that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. were meeting every requirement of organized labor in any bituminous coal-mining section of this country. He admitted that the earnings of our miners were larger than he had ever known in any other locality, the month of August averaging $4.15 per day in all our mines to each man who worked. I challenged him to point out wherein we could better our men, or the men could better themselves by joining the union, and he was unable to say a word in reply, except to state that united labor was often able to secure what they would be unable to get unorganized.

We have given particular attention, as stated in my letter to Mr. Murphy, to the well-being of our men, as it has been one of the foremost things that I have always taken up in all of the corporations I have been connected with; and as I told your father in the first interview that we ever had, nearly 20 years ago, I would flatly refuse to be connected with any business enterprise where I would be handicapped in uplifting and benefitting mankind, especially those in our employ. This I told to Mr. Stewart, and suggested that he investigate every corporation with which I have been connected for the last 25 years or more, and see if he could find a place where this has not been one of the matters that has received my most careful consideration. He said he did not question this statement and that he had heard of it before coming here. I said that, in view of this, together with the fact that not more than 5 or 6 per cent of our men were members or unions after all the effort that had been made here for two or three years, we flatly refused to force 8,000 or 10,000 men to join the union and we be the collectors of $20,000 or $30,000 a month from our employees' wages and forward this amount to headquarters to be spent by the agitators in stirring up strife and discord and inevitable revolution in this country. He was told that we would work such mines as we could protect and close the others, and that the writer with every official of this company would stand by this declaration until our bones were bleached as white as chalk in these Rocky Mountains. We are right from every standpoint, and in justice to ourselves and our loyal men we shall never recede an inch from the stand we have taken. Several of our mines are working from one-half to two-thirds capacity, and if we can continue undisturbed, we can keep our steel works running and supply our railroad friends with coal to keep them going in good shape until the strike is over.

I will state one instance in connection with our domestic mines located in what we call the Canon City district, where a large percentage of our miners are union men, having come here from Eastern States many years ago. They have retained their membership largely, doubtless, from sentiment, having, I presume, been in trouble in eastern mines, though they may have been in strike troubles in mines in the East, which influenced them somewhat to retain their membership. Ninety-nine per cent of these union miners voluntarily signed a protest against being called out, but their protest was ignored, and, of course, they have gone out, being union men. At several other camps the men signed protests against a strike, stating that they were satisfied, had no complaint whatever to make, and wanted to work.

I have given you the situation up to date.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: Your letter of September 19 was duly received and I thank you for your kind expressions with regard to my interview with Mr. Stewart.

We are greatly pleased to hear of the care with which the management has studied the questions in connection with labor unions among miners in the past, and the spirit evidently manifested of trying to anticipate and meet all proper demands.

MR. L. M. BOWERS,

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. L. M. Bowers, vice president and treasurer.]

OCTOBER 3, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: The strike situation in the coal fields remains about as it has been for the past week. A few more of our miners are returning to work each day, and most of our miners who still remain in the State would be back at work if it were not for fear of assassination or violence. The union officials have run in a large number of sluggers and Black Hand foreigners from West Virginia, who are in the pay of the United Mine Workers of America. These men, together with what striking miners they can control, are camped in the hills as near to the mines as they can get and have several times riddled the coal camps with bullets.

It is estimated that more than 1,000 bullets were fired by these assassins into the Oakview camp of the Oakdale Coal Co., located in Huerfano County. I inclose you a clipping which gives an accurate account of this fusillade, signed by reputable persons who were eyewitnesses to the raid.

At another mine 400 cartridge shells were picked up behind the stone breast-work that these fellows had built on the side of the mountain.

None of these were our mines, as our armed guards so far have been able to protect our miners. We have eight large electric searchlights established, and each sweeps the surrounding country for 5 or 6 miles. This is a mighty fine scheme, as we can discover groups or single individuals without the slightest difficulty moving around within the circuit.

With the exception of a few small operators who have no funds to fight with and who expect to reap a rich harvest from high prices, all of the coal operators are a unit and under no conditions whatever will they submit to the dictation of the United Mine Workers of America. Unfortunately, Secretary of Labor Wilson, appointed by the President, was secretary and one of the big men in the above-named union, and all of his associates in official positions in his department have been officers or were employees of the union, which, to my mind, bespeaks a rough road ahead for our industrial enterprises during the present administration.

This man Stewart, who met Mr. Murphy at your office, has been hobnobbing continually, since coming here, with the most vicious of the labor agitators. One of these men, Hayes, vice president of the United Mine Workers of America, was heard by one of our detectives to say to a group of strikers: "What are you hanging around Trinidad for? Why don't you get out among the mines and give them hell?"

You see, we are not lying upon beds of roses these days. But for the fact that fully 90 per cent of our miners are loyal and have no grievances whatever and want to work, we would be inclined to seal up a large number of our mines and not undertake to work them during this warfare; but we are hoping to be able to control the situation and lessen the fear these men entertain of assassination, so that a large percentage of them will be able to return to their work.

While it is an exceptionally exacting situation for the writer to be placed in, especially at my age, I propose to stay in the fight until we regain our right to manage this great industry for the best interest of all concerned.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

New York, October 6, 1913.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: I have your letter of September 29, with reference to the coal strike in southern Colorado. We know how earnestly desirous you have always been to have the men in your employ work under the best possible conditions and receive every consideration and advantage. We also know that you and Mr. Welborn have spared no pains to provide for the well-being and look out for the interests of the employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. Your letter simply confirms what we knew to be the case.

You gentlemen can not be more earnest in your desire for the best interests of the employees of your company than we are. We feel that what you have done is right and fair and that the position which you have taken in regard to the unionizing of the mines is in the interest of the employees of the company. Whatever the outcome may be, we will stand by you to the end.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: I have your letter of October 3 and note with interest the progress of the strike. I realize that these are trying days for the management of the fuel company. Its actions are watched with great interest by this office, and its strong and just position will not lack backing at this end.

Very, truly,

Mr. L. M. BOWERS,

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. Executive department. L. M. Bowers, chairman.]

OCTOBER 11, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: I am in receipt of your favor of the 6th, and I want to express the appreciation of Mr. Welborn and myself, together with that of several coal operators who have seen your letter, for the stand you have taken in supporting us in fighting this unjust, uncalled-for, and iniquitous strike, called by the officials of what is supposed to be a very important union.

I can say that I have never known such falsehoods and disregard for law and common decency as these men are the perpetrators of in this State. It is now proven beyond any sort of question that Winchester rifles in large numbers and revolvers with large quantities of ammunition are being supplied to the sluggers whom these men have brought in from other States together with the blood-thirsty Greeks who have just returned from the Turkish war.

We also find that Ethelbert Stewart, representing Commissioner of Labor Wilson, has been for years connected with labor unions. He came here under false colors, representing himself as being appointed as mediator, while he has been spending weeks with the labor agitators above referred to and refused to listen to the operators' side unless it was in conference with the union officials, which, of course, the operators flatly refused to consider, with the exception of a two-hour interview with the writer.

When this Government places in the Cabinet men like Commissioner of Labor Wilson, who was for many years secretary of the United Mine Workers of America, which has been one of the unions that permitted more disorder and bloodshed than any class of labor organizations in this country, we are not skating upon thin ice, but we are on top of a volcano. When such men as these, together with the cheap college professors and still cheaper writers in muck-raking magazines, supplemented by a lot of milk-and-water preachers with little or no religion and less common sense, are permitted to assault the business men who have built up the great industries and have done more to make this country what it is than all other agencies combined, it is time that vigorous measures are taken to put a stop to these vicious teachings which are being sown broadcast throughout the country.

I know of no journal or magazine published in this country to-day that is doing the good work that is being done in Leslie's Weekly, and I know of no better expenditure for the common good and for the safety of this country that you could direct than to make it possible for the publisher to distribute a million copies a week of this magazine. I am personally doing all I can when attending directors' meetings of the several companies I am in, and whenever I meet business men, to call attention to Leslie's Weekly.

You know very well that I am not a pessimist of the dyspeptic sort, but I believe—that if the business men do not awaken from their indifference and take aggressive measures on a large scale to right the wrongs that are being inflicted upon the business of this country, we will see a revolution, we will be under military government and our Republic will end where so many others have ended.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

Mr. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,
New York, N. Y.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. Executive department. L. M. Bowers, chairman.]

OCTOBER 21, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: At our annual meeting yesterday the matter of having a vice president in New York was taken up. We thought it very desirable that we have an officer there and a lawyer preferred, so we elected Mr. Murphy as vice president and a member of the executive committee. I have written Mr. Murphy that if this is not in accord with your wishes, we can change it at any executive committee meeting.

Our balance sheet is practically completed, and our net earnings would have been the largest in the history of the company by $200,000 but for the increase in wages paid the employees during the last few months.

With everything running so smoothly and with an excellent outlook for 1914, it is mighty discouraging to have this vicious gang come into our State and not only destroy our profit but eat into that which has heretofore been saved.

There are a few more miners working to-day than at any time since the strike, and if the miners who were forced out on account of fear had the protection of the militia, a large percentage of them would return to work at once.

The large operators are all working in perfect harmony, which is very desirable, and unless all prophesy fails it is only a matter of time when the mines will be in operation generally.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

NOVEMBER 13, 1913.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: I have received the clippings regarding the strike which you have sent me from time to time. I am interested to keep in touch with the situation and hope the worst is over. We are profoundly distressed that such disorder, suffering, and bloodshed should result from the action of the labor leaders, and feel the sincerest sympathy with the employees of the company, who are forced to suffer, directly and indirectly, thereby.

Very truly,

Mr. L. M. BOWERS.
Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. L. M. Bowers, vice president and treasurer.]

NOVEMBER 18, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: I have not sent you much published matter in regard to the strike during the last few days, as we have been having a season of comparative quiet in southern Colorado.

You will be interested to know that we have been able to secure the cooperation of all the bankers of the city, who have had three or four interviews with our little cowboy governor, agreeing to back the State and lend it all the funds necessary to maintain the militia and afford ample protection so that our miners could return to work, or give protection to men who are anxious to come up here from Texas, New Mexico, and Kansas, together with some from States farther east. Besides the bankers, the chamber of commerce, the real estate exchange, together with a great many of the best business men, have been urging the Governor to take steps to drive these vicious agitators out of the State. Another mighty power has been rounded up in behalf of the operators by the gathering together of fourteen of the editors of the most important newspapers in Denver, Pueblo, Trinidad, Walsenburg, Colorado Springs, and other of the larger places in the State. They passed resolutions demanding that the governor bring this strike to an end, as they found, upon most careful examination, that the real issue was the demand for recognition of the union, which they told the governor would never be conceded by the operators as 90 per cent of the miners themselves were non-union men, and therefore that issue should be dropped.

Still the governor hobnobs with Hayes, Lawson, McLennan, and the rest of the gang, and either refuses or begs for more time to bring the strike to an end or to amply protect the operators in bringing in outsiders to take the places of those who have left the State and those engaged in these murderous assaults whom we refuse to take back under any circumstances. Yet we are making a little headway.

There probably has never been such pressure brought to bear upon any governor of this State by the strongest men in it as has been brought to bear upon Gov. Ammons. We have published statements of the earnings of the miners, which the agitators disputed, and the governor expressed great doubt as to its accuracy. In order to force acknowledgment, we requested the bankers to recommend three expert accountants to examine our pay rolls, books, etc., which they did yesterday. The governor appointed these men and they are now in our office checking up and their report will be published.

While we are meeting with enormous losses we are making friends by the thousands in the State by giving to the public all of the data proving our splendid treatment of our men, not only in making it possible for them to earn more money than in any other bituminous coal section of the country, but showing the public what we have been doing in the way of improving the condition of our miners and their families. We have won the cordial support of the leading papers of the State and have won over several men who formerly supported labor unions and the agitators, so we get some comfort and a good deal of satisfaction in having our efforts recognized, covering the past five years, in the upbuilding of our company morally, commercially, and financially, through the reports of the strong men connected with the business organizations, bankers, and others, who have been given all the data and information desired—which has been an eye opener to most of them.

Personally the strain has been very great on Mr. Welborn, who has been the recognized leader among the operators. He has not spared himself day or night, and but for his vigorous make-up, would have been unable to stand up under the weight loaded upon him. I mention this so that you may know how valuable a man he is when placed in the most trying circumstances that any official has ever been called upon to encounter in dealing with labor unions whose leaders in this State can not be regarded as anything less than assassins.

Personally my hope is to be blessed with enough mental and physical strength to be able to stand four square until we win a righteous victory.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

Mr. L. M. BOWERS,
Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo.

The following is a copy of telegram received to-day and my reply thereto:

"The governor of Colorado has asked me to lend my efforts toward settlement of coal strike there. He says the situation is critical and growing worse hourly. Can you help by using your influence to have representatives of coal companies in Colorado meet representatives of miners with view to finding a mutual basis for settlement? I will be at Albany Hotel, Denver, November 21, remaining indefinitely.

"W. B. WILSON, Secretary."

"Your telegram of November 20 asking that we use our influence to have representatives of coal companies in Colorado meet representatives of miners is at hand. So far as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is concerned the matter is entirely in hands of its executive officers in Colorado. They have always been quite as solicitous for the well-being of the employees as for the interests of the stockholders. The men who have brought about this strike are not representatives of our miners, as only a small percentage of our men are members of unions, and all but an inconsiderable fraction of those who are have protested against the strike. The action of our officers in refusing to meet the strike leaders is quite as much in the interest of our employees as of any other element in the company. Their position meets with our cordial approval, and we shall support them to the end. The failure of our men to remain at work is due simply to their fear of assault and assassination. The governor of Colorado has only to protect the lives of the bona fide miners to bring the strike to a speedy termination."

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo.]

NOVEMBER 22, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: We are in receipt of your telegram of last night, giving telegraphic correspondence between Secretary of Labor Wilson and yourself. Your telegram has been shown to all the members of the executive board, in whose behalf I want to express appreciation for your splendid support and for the reply you made to Secretary Wilson.

Numerous conferences are being held day and night, and it is the opinion of the coal operators generally that the officials representing the United Mine Workers of America are all hunting for a hole, however insignificant, through which they can crawl without disgracing themselves before the membership in their failure to make the coal miners' strike general and cause complete tie-up.

There are fully 50 per cent of the miners working in the State, including both the northern and southern fields, while it is estimated that one-half of the miners, the most of whom were forced to strike, have left the State, which is both an advantage and a disadvantage to the strikers. The disadvantage comes from the reduction in fighting force in event of an outbreak, while it is to their advantage to have the men leave, as it relieves them from the burden of support.

All the hot air in regard to bad conditions and unfairness, so far as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is concerned, has evaporated. The only thing that is demanded now is a conference so that they can claim recognition of their union.

This strike has brought to the front an issue which will secure the attention, and I believe the cooperation, of the business men of the country regardless of political affiliations—to force candidates for office to come out into the open and declare their attitude toward the rights of employers and employees to run an "open shop." We all know that the politicians have been giving organized labor sops for the purpose of securing their votes regardless of the fact that the great mass of laboring men have no connection with labor unions, including the millions of farmers and men engaged in a variety of other occupations.

Hundreds of men, including many State and some national officials, have become alarmed since the uncalled-for and vicious demand of the union leaders in this State for recognition of the union and suppression of the open shop. It has become a matter of such importance in these last few weeks that it will doubtless be one of the great issues in politics in 1916. I believe there is no man in either Republican or Democratic Parties who would dare to come out in opposition to the open shop. So long as the politicians can ride two horses going in opposite directions at the same time without attracting the attention of the public, they are reasonably safe, but that time is coming to an end, and I believe that in the long run good will come from this unwise action on the part of labor leaders to force fully 90 per cent of these miners out of the open shop and into the union, contrary to their wishes. They have so overreached the bounds of reason and common decency as to attract attention everywhere, and this is what is needed to awaken the men who have the good of the country at heart to oppose and finally defeat unions of every sort from becoming dictators to both employer and employee with the hope that they will eventually control the affairs of the State and Nation.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

NOVEMBER 24, 1913.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: I have just read with the utmost interest your letter to Mr. Gates of November 13; also your letter to President Wilson of November 8. In the latter you have set forth fully and clearly the position of the fuel company. It would seem as though only one conclusion could be drawn therefrom. In the former you tell of the recent history of the strike in a way which brings home to us with fearful clearness the sorrow and horror of it all. You and Mr. Welborn are frequently in our minds, and we have none but words of the highest commendation for the energetic, fair, and firm way in which you have handled this very trying matter. At the same time we have the utmost sympathy for the unfortunate employees of the company, who are suffering so severely, directly and indirectly, as a result of this conflict of labor which has been forced upon them much against their wills. There can be but one outcome, and we only hope it may be speedily attained.

I sent you on Friday night by night letter a copy of Secretary Wilson's telegram to me and my reply. We are with you to the end.

Very truly,

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.

NOVEMBER 28, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: I am in receipt of your favor of November 24, which has been read to all of our executive officers, and I can scarcely express our appreciation of the support you are giving us.

Secretary of Labor Wilson has been here for some time and suggested to the governor and to the labor leaders here that the operators consent to a conference with our own men, who are old members of the union, to which we agreed, the governor acting as chairman of the meeting. The conference began at 10.30 in the morning and lasted until 1 Wednesday night, the proceedings of which and its outcome is partially given in the clipping inclosed herein. As we have maintained, there are no important differences between the operators and their miners, which the governor admits is true.

Yesterday the labor leaders got after these three miners who notified the governor that they would not approve the conclusions reached by the governor and Secretary of Labor Wilson. So the matter settles down squarely upon the proposition of recognition of the union and the abandonment of the open-shop policy or the strike will continue indefinitely.

You will notice in the clipping that Secretary Wilson suggests an arbitration board, but this seems to me a useless proceeding, for the reason that if the labor leaders refuse to favorably consider Mr. Wilson's recommendation they will refuse to call the strike off if an arbitration board is selected. I see a "nigger in the woodpile" in Secretary Wilson's proposition to have an arbitration board consider two points, one of which is (a) the question of an increase in wages, which if the board granted, however slight it might be, then the labor leaders would declare the country over that they had gained a victory over the operators and forced them to make a concession, which we do not propose to permit in any circumstance.

I can see no particular objection to the formation of an arbitration board as suggested by Secretary Wilson, providing the three miners are nonunion men who have remained in the employ of the coal operators during this strike, but to this I am sure that neither Secretary Wilson nor the labor leaders would consent. What they want is to get on the board three striking miners who are union men, and they would keep up a perpetual controversy on one hundred and one little technicalities, which the labor leaders are notorious for doing wherever union men are employed.

I will inclose herein or forward to you later in the day copies of President Wilson's reply to my letter of November 8 and my answer to all of the points he raised. You will notice in his letter that he dodged all the essentials, excusing himself in a way that men usually take when they have the worst of the argument, and he falls back onto arbitration law and the spirit of the times. My reply to the President indicates our appreciation of compliance with the law, and also states that we are in harmony with the spirit of the times in arbitrating differences between employer and employee if any exist, as well as our desire to satisfy the public through the good offices of unbiased men, as set forth in my third paragraph. I also bring to his attention the importance of the avowed purpose of labor leaders all over the country to force the closing of all open shops, which is really the most important part of my letter.

I have never known the public mind to shift with the rapidity that it has during the past 10 days and since Secretary Wilson's anarchistic address at Seattle. Hundreds of thinking men who have been practically neutral in this coal strike now are outspoken when they see the trend toward the closing of the open shop and domination by labor unions in all industries of this country. Editors and men in high positions in political life are asking us whether or not we are going to fight this issue to a finish. They have become alarmed as they learn the facts in regard to this coal miners' strike, unquestionably called with the approval of Secretary Wilson, who, together with men high up in labor-union ranks, are making this coal miners' strike a test case, which, if successful, will warrant a national campaign to force the closing of open shops throughout the country during Secretary Wilson's retention in President Wilson's Cabinet. My reference to this matter being a national issue in my letter to President Wilson was to give him a hint that any such attempt on the part of the Department of Labor supporting labor-union leaders in this movement would not be tolerated by the American people.

We are satisfied, all of us, that since the receipt of our letters by President Wilson and your reply to Secretary Wilson's telegram the latter has been prompted to labor for any sort of a compromise, to which we shall never consent.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

Mr. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,
New York, N. Y.

DECEMBER 1, 1913.

DEAR Mr. BOWERS: Mr. Rockefeller asked me to acknowledge on his behalf your letter of November 28 inclosing copies of President Wilson's letter to you of November 18 and your reply of the 25th, together with the newspaper clipping, and to say that he fully approves of the position you have taken in the correspondence with the President and in the handling of the matter in general. We think you and Mr. Welborn are treating the matter in a very wise and firm way.

He asked me to submit for your consideration, merely for what it is worth, a suggestion which I have made to him. The President says: "All that is asked is that you agree to arbitration by an unbiased board. * * * The questions at issue ought to be submitted to some body of men who can make an impartial determination of the case on its merits. If the investigation led to nothing more than a full understanding of both sides of the case by the public the air would be cleared and the basis of settlement would, I venture to predict, become obvious." It seems to me that the President is confusing two entirely different things—one the question of arbitration and the other the question of investigation and making public the facts. I think your position in refusing to submit to arbitration under the conditions is unassailable. I suggest for your consideration whether it might not be a tactical advantage to say that while we refuse to consent to arbitration we are not only willing, but we strongly urge an investigation of all the facts as to the relations between the company and its employees and the circumstances leading up to this strike. Your letter offers to assist the President in making a thorough investigation of the riot and destruction that has been going on, but what I have in mind is whether we can not go further and court an investigation into the whole question. If I understand the facts correctly, I am satisfied that a thorough investigation, made by a body of men of character and ability and fearlessness, would turn public opinion so overwhelmingly in favor of the operators that the strike would have to come to an end. The investigators should not be politicians, but we might suggest that the President appoint any three Federal judges, thus guaranteeing that the investigation would be made by men whose positions were not dependent upon the votes of the labor unions, who were in the habit of investigating facts, and who would be willing to tell the truth and who would dare to tell the truth.

Please understand that this is merely submitted for your consideration, without any attempt whatever to influence your action in the matter if for any reason you deem it wiser not to follow it up.

Very truly, yours,

STARRE J. MURPHY.

DENVER, COLO., December 2, 1913.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,

Federal grand jury have indicted practically all officers of United Mine Workers' Union, and a score of strike leaders.

L. M. BOWERS.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. Executive department. L. M. Bowers, chairman.]

DECEMBER 6, 1913.

DEAR MR. MURPHY: Replying to your favor of the 1st. On the surface the President's suggestion looks plausible, but we are too well advised to believe that it would be possible to secure an impartial committee named by him. He knows perfectly well that there was not an atom of difference between the company and the miners, but, on the contrary, entire satisfaction. He has been advised that there has been three impartial committees who have made a fair and thorough investigation, and all reported to the governor that they found no good reasons for calling this strike. He also knows that his representative, the Secretary of Labor, has been here for two or three weeks, but he may not know that when challenged to point out one thing that should be submitted to arbitration he could not do so, except to give these labor leaders the opportunity to "argue" for recognition and to force the shutting of the "open shop." (The last dozen words are mine.)

We know that the President will not ignore the head of the Department of Labor, but will let his Secretary of Labor name the committee, if such an agreement was entered into, or else he would direct him to demand an end of the strike instantly.

No whipping around the bush is necessary on the part of the President if he really wants to end the strike; but he is too fearful of the labor voters who are in the unions to come out into the open and demand an end of the strike by those responsible for it.

Secretary Wilson is regarded as one of the most determined fighters for unionism in the country, and is the power back of United Mine Workers of America, and this strike was with his consent and is having his cordial support. Mr. Welborn, who, with the other two representatives of the operators, now believe that behind the soft voice of Secretary Wilson is the hand of Esau; that he is a cunning schemer and has tried during his stay here to trap the operators into same corner that the labor leaders can claim that they have won recognition of the union through him.

It is a well-planned undertaking on the part of the labor-union leaders of the country to shut the "open shop," and it is their opportunity to do so, while one of their own confidential and most expert schemers is in the President's Cabinet and the head of the department that can give the movement enormous encouragement, if not direct and active support.

The writer has satisfied himself that the labor leaders in charge would laugh at any report of any committee that would leave recognition of the union open for the operators to decide for themselves. So we prefer to let the President ask Congress to make the investigation and take our chances. We are ready and more than willing to face friend or foe in connection with our legal or moral responsibility as employers of labor.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

STARR J. MURPHY, Esq., New York.

DECEMBER 9, 1913.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: I have yours of December 6, and accept entirely your decision. In fact, as we have said many times before, we leave this matter entirely in your hands, having the utmost confidence in your judgment and the way you are handling the matter.

Very truly, yours,

STARR J. MURPHY.

DECEMBER 8, 1913.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: I am sorry to learn, from your pencilled note of the 3d, that you are under the weather. It is hardly strange, however, in view of the severe strain which has been upon you these many weeks. You are fighting a good fight, which is not only in the interest of your own company but of the other companies of Colorado and of the business interests of the entire country and of the laboring classes quite as much. I feel hopeful that the worst is over and that the situation will improve daily.

Take care of yourself, and as soon as it is possible, get a little let-up and rest.
Very truly,

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.

Mr. L. M. BOWERS,
Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo.

DECEMBER 22, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: If the governor had acted on September 23 as he has been forced to act during the past few weeks, the strike would have never existed 10 days.

We used every possible weapon to drive him into action, but he was glove in hand with the labor leaders and is to-day, but the big men of affairs have helped the operators in whipping the agitators, including the governor.

Now these fellows are cursing him without regard for common decency, so everybody is giving him more or less taffy to keep him from backsliding. The inclosed is a sample of the resolutions being sent to him, besides any number of personal letters.

By the number of miners we are getting in from the South and East, we will have all we can work in a week or so. Of course, the coal trade is good for nothing after about February 1, except the railroads, and little money is made on their trade.

I received a nice note from your father and in reply stated that I was feeling much better, though I am having miserable trouble with indigestion yet, which upsets me all over, especially my sleep.

I have never known such widespread approval by all classes of business men as we are getting in our fight for the "open shop."

We are paying the 4 per cent dividend for the last half of the current year on the preferred stock.

I thank you for your suggestion to take a rest, but I have no expectation of taking even a day off before spring, unless I play out entirely.

Wishing you and yours a "happy holiday season," I remain,

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

DECEMBER 26, 1913.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: Your letter of December 22, with inclosed clipping, is received. I note with interest the fact that the miners are rapidly going to Colorado from the South and East. I assume this means that conditions have become so nearly normal that business can be very generally resumed. It is most gratifying to feel that this struggle is so rapidly becoming a thing of the past.

I know that father has followed the events of the past few months in connection with the fuel company with unusual interest and satisfaction. I am glad that you are somewhat better, and still urge you to be as careful as possible, so as to get your digestion in good condition again, even though you may not stop for a rest just yet.

Thanking you for your holiday greetings, and wishing for you and yours a happy new year, I am,

Very sincerely,

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.

Mr. L. M. BOWERS,
Denver, Colo.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. L. M. Bowers, vice president and treasurer.]

DECEMBER 30, 1913.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: I am inclosing herein letter No. 3, from President Wilson, and my reply.

His Excellency had an excellent opportunity to end this correspondence upon receipt of my second letter, but unwisely, we all think, he allowed himself to write another one, which, if from a less dignified statesman, would be regarded as a bluff, as he was well aware that the efforts of Congressman Keating, of Colorado, and some other Representatives catering to labor unions have utterly failed to induce Congress to make an investigation. We are confidentially advised that President Wilson's recommendation for a congress-sional investigation will be no more effective. Anyhow, he can meditate over his decidedly weak reply to my second letter and take such action as he sees fit.

We are mightily pleased that the President used the strong language he did in stating "that a thorough investigation of the whole matter is necessary," as it gave me an opportunity to include the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the United Mine Workers of America, and the Department of Labor, as the three concerned, and I hardly see how they can be separated if the "whole matter" is to be investigated. So, on the whole, I am more than pleased to receive this third letter, which no shrewd business man would have allowed himself to have written, in my opinion.

We now have in the southern fields all the miners that we can use to supply the mills, coke ovens, railroads, and the probable limited demand for domestic and other purposes from now on.

As stated in my letter to the President, there are several hundred sluggers camped within the strike zone, who have rifles and ammunition in large quantities secreted, and we are facing a guerrilla warfare that is likely to continue for months to come. Assassinations and destruction of property will be attempted unless the indicted officials and labor leaders are tried and severely punished.

I thank you most heartily for your suggestion of a rest, but I can not possibly anticipate this, unless I give out entirely. Insomnia is my trouble when worry induces indigestion and nervous dyspepsia, and I am considerably disturbed and am feeling the effects of lack of sleep; but I am pretty well equipped with good nerves and expect to pull through without being forced to quit.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

JANUARY 8, 1914.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: The Federal court, after two days' trial on the part of the Government, dismissed the case against us on the grounds of no cause of action before we had opened our defense.

This case was the one against Judge Beaman and the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to recover 160 acres of coal lands, valued, as they stated, at $1,000 an acre.

This is the last case of the Government against the company, unless the herd of Government politicians run out of a job and browse around to find something else over which to annoy us.

Everything is running along about as usual, with more or less men deserting the strikers' camps every day, getting employment, if possible, in the mines where they had formerly worked.

We have all we can employ under present conditions in the coal and steel market.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

JANUARY 8, 1914.

DEAR MR. BOWERS: Your letter of December 30, inclosing copy of President Wilson's third letter to you and your reply, has been received and read with interest. I rather fancy that the correspondence has ended. It is most regrettable that these armed trouble makers are still remaining in the labor camps, and we can only hope that the State government will take such action as will compel them to leave the country at an early date.

Thank you for keeping us posted regarding these matters.

Very sincerely,

DEAR MR. BOWERS: I inclose herewith a letter from the secretary of the industrial department of the Young Men's Christian Association, with a pamphlet regarding their work.

It may be that it would be worth while to consider the establishment, in connection with the steel mills, if not in the mining camps, of a Young Men's Christian Association under the management of the industrial department.

APRIL 18, 1914.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: I am in receipt of your favor of the 14th, inclosing copy of pamphlet issued by the industrial department of the Y. M. C. A.

There is no doubt that a small Y. M. C. A. building, including gymnasium, reading room, etc., would be a good thing in the vicinity of our steel mills at Pueblo, but the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. could not possibly undertake the erection of such a building or maintain it for some time to come.

We have already lost in nine months, as you will see by our March report, $834,351.15, which will reach a million by the end of our fiscal year, and besides this an entire year's profits are lost. This means at least two years of hard work, with conditions reasonably favorable, to put us in the condition we would have been in financially but for this strike.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. L. M. Bowers, vice president and treasurer.]

APRIL 19, 1914.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: I have been so busy since I returned, and so few matters of importance in connection with the strike have come up, that I have not written you.

Speaking broadly, there is a decided weakening all along the line on the part of the labor leaders. We have reliable information that the United Mine Workers of America are pinched as never before for funds. The present week in northern Colorado they cut off the relief of 140 miners, which has created a very bad feeling on their part, and as some of those who are still kept on the pay roll say, it is only a matter of time when they will all be cut off from any funds whatever. In southern Colorado the labor leaders are making a thorough canvass of the strikers' camps and a very large number are to be eliminated from their pay roll when the canvass is completed.

A matter of more significance, in my opinion, is the change of attitude of the local representatives of the union from that of the past few months toward the miners themselves. Heretofore they have constantly endeavored to encourage the miners to hold out, as victory was sure to be won. Now, instead of encouragement, they dodge the issue and in some cases deliberately undertake to offend the miners, expecting they will quit the camps and go back to work and thereby relieve the organization from its financial burden, knowing that the strike has been a failure and that eventually the miners will have to shift for themselves.

A large number of the militia has been withdrawn, but Mr. Welborn and other operators believe enough are retained to protect the camps, supplemented by our own guards.

Another favorable feature is the organization of a military company of 100 volunteers at Trinidad the present week. They are to be armed by the State and drilled by military officials. Another squad is being organized at Walsen-burg. These independent militiamen will be subject to orders of the sheriff of the county. As these volunteers will draw no pay from the State, this movement has the support of the governor and other men in authority.

On the whole, the strike, we believe, is wearing itself out, though we are likely to be assaulted here and there by gangs of the vicious element that are always hanging around the coal-mining camps.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

APRIL 25, 1914.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: Your letter of April 18 and 21 are at hand. I am returning herein the letter and cooperative agreement sent you by Mr. J. B. Cory, of Braddock, Pa. Mr. Cory is precisely sound in his argument placing the unrest and responsibility of strikes upon the labor parasites and the legal shysters. We have kept one copy of the contract.

The situation in the States west of the Missouri River among the coal operators is a very difficult problem, as it is utterly impossible to organize because of the great number of small mines owned by individuals and small corporations, so that no cooperative agreement has ever been possible. The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. usually leads in fixing prices and conditions, which the larger companies usually agree to, and the smaller concerns also, if it is for their interest, but no dependence can be placed upon their adherence to any working plan for any length of time.

Again, in this present trouble the prices of mining and the income of the workmen had nothing to do with this strike, as they were getting larger pay than in any bituminous coal mining district in the United States. If they had been working under an agreement similar to that suggested by Mr. Cory, they would have been driven out just the same.

I have no suggestions to offer to you in regard to the letter of Vice President Hayes, only to say that an interview with him by yourself or any of your representatives would be spread over the United States in 24 hours, and the strike would not be called off by him unless the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. would agree to unionize the mines.

If the matter was solely between the United Mine Workers of America and the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., it might make some difference, but practically all of the coal operators of the entire State are concerned, many of them very large concerns, and some of them in northern Colorado, who had been under the domination of the United Mine Workers of America for several years, were forced to throw off the yoke four years ago, and have been operating their mines independent of the union at an enormous cost. It would therefore be impossible for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to settle the disputes if we should yield to the demands of the union, as the operators of northern Colorado will never be in their clutches again. We have been given altogether too prominent a place in this trouble, as we only mine about one-third of the output of the State.

I have received a large number of letters, telephone calls, and personal visits from prominent men in all lines of business and professions complimenting you on your testimony before the congressional committee. I have not sent any of them to you, knowing that you were getting innumerable compliments direct; although it is a pleasure to men, like yourself and the writer, who propose to do the right thing whether we have the approval or condemnation of others, to receive a bit of praise now and then.

It may be proper for one who knows you so intimately as I do, to say that the estimate of your testimony for the good of this country, given in my hurried letter to you before leaving Birmingham, was not as strongly stated as that of scores of men whom I have met and from whom I have received letters.

We have a Congressman whose home is in Denver who is in some respects a character. There is no question in regards to his honesty, though he is sometimes reckless in his use of the English language, but he is right in his conclusions more than half the time, I am sure. I am taking the liberty of sending you letter of the Hon. George J. Kindel.

Washington telegrams state Chairman Foster to visit New York this afternoon for conference with Osgood and doubtless yourself under direction of President to undertake settlement of strike before Federal troops are called into action. This delay may mean enormous loss of property and many lives. The strikers are increasing forces of men, guns, and ammunition hourly. In our opinion any proposition of Foster involving unionizing mines would be almost unanimously refused by the operators of Colorado; also anything he may press for temporary withholding Federal troops would be exceedingly detrimental and unwise. Immediate protection should be demanded and the parties responsible for calling this iniquitous strike should be forced to call it off.

Such mediators to have no powers, but simply to go from one side to the other, undertaking to formulate in definite terms the position of each, and then to act as negotiators in seeing whether anything could be done. They would talk with the various parties separately, privately, and confidentially. No one would surrender any rights or make any commitments by consenting to confer with such mediators. It developed in the conference that the only obstacle to settlement was the strikers' insistence upon union recognition. On November 27 the governor suggested in writing to those present at the conference a solution covering all points except recognition of the union. His letter was as follows:

"The strikers refused to accept the terms of settlement proposed by the governor and approved by the operators and all the disorder and bloodshed in this State since November 27 has been due to this attitude of the officers and members of the United Mine Workers of America."

"We still consider the plan of the governor legally and industrially sound and have never retracted our formal approval thereof."

MAY 6, 1914.

DEAR MR. MURPHY: Replying to your favor of the 2d. The criticism of Mr. Northrop in the New York Evening Post of May 1 is misleading in some respects plus half the truth in others. Our legal department has furnished me some rather hurried notes on the following points:

Eight-hour law.—The present eight-hour law went into effect April 3, 1913. This includes not only miners and coal diggers, but all underground men. The old eight-hour law passed in 1905 included only coal diggers, who rarely ever worked even eight hours a day, and as they worked by the ton it made no difference to the company whether they worked four, six, or eight hours, but it makes a vast amount of difference whether or not the 40 per cent who are not coal diggers work 8 or 10 hours, as they are paid by the day. While we established the eight-hour day on March 1 and the law went into effect on April 3 it might look on the surface as though we had foreseen that this law would pass and wet the powder. But the facts are that we took up the matter of establishing an eight-hour day several months prior to the assembling of the 1912 legislature for the purpose of demonstrating whether or not we could so adjust our operations as to enable us to adopt the eight-hour day without serious loss, which we satisfied ourselves we could do, and it would have been adopted by our company whether the legislature passed that law or not. You will be interested to know that the senate committee having this eight-hour bill and all the other bills relating to coal mining in hand by agreement selected a subcommittee made up of five men, which included John Lawson, the United Mine Workers' leader in this State and a member of the international board of that organization, State Coal Mine Inspector Dalrymple, a union man; two engineers, Mr. Weltzel representing the C. F. & I Co. and Mr. Peart representing the Victor-American Fuel Co., and one independent engineer. Our Mr. Weltzel was selected by common consent of all concerned and was the man who practically wrote every line of the coal mining law of 1912-13, spending more than a month here at the capitol. Time and time again he made concessions to Lawson and others and demanded some himself. The outcome is the present coal mining law, signed by all of the members of the committee, which the senate committee agreed to present without amendment or alteration if all members of the subcommittee recommended its passage. It is spoken of as one of the best coal mining laws passed in any State.

Seminmonthly pay.—The law referred to covering this point was considered unconstitutional and the supreme court was asked by the legislature to pass upon the constitutionality of the act and refused to answer the inquiry of the legislature. It is the opinion of lawyers that if the statute had been tested in the courts the act would have been declared unconstitutional. In any event no attempt was ever made to enforce it. It was absolutely a dead law and no individual or organization seemed to care enough about it to demand compliance in this State. As I have stated in a former letter, we were never asked to make seminmonthly pay except in a single instance where a miner or two asked the superintendent if he thought we would be willing to pay that mine twice a month. This request was forwarded to this office and came up to me. Upon looking into the matter I found that in other States a seminmonthly pay to coal miners had been agreed upon, and I felt that it would be brought up sooner or later. We therefore granted the request of this party and established a seminmonthly pay throughout our mining camps. I will say in this connection that the writer did not know that there had ever been such a law passed, and if Mr. Webber or any of our other officials knew it it had slipped their minds or I should not have emphasized this point as I have done in this controversy. However, it must have been forgotten by the strike leaders, because I have never noticed their mentioning the existence of this old law.

Checkweighmen and scale inspection.—The statute makes it the duty of the county commissioners to appoint inspectors of weights and measures in each county, and at the time in question such inspector had been appointed by the county commissioners and was performing his duties and had inspected the scales in Las Animas County, where the mines of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in question are located. The statute also provides that in a county where there is no inspector the State inspector of mines shall test the scales within a reasonable time after application is made to him by either the miners or owners or those who may be operating the mine. Under this statute Factory Inspector Brake or his deputy should not have inspected the scales in these mines.

In the testimony before the congressional committee Deputy Inspector Howe stated that he was instructing another deputy, Monical by name, in regard to testing scales, and they went to these mines, as reported. This deputy, Monical, as Howe's testimony shows, was discharged for incompetency. From other sources we learned that he was a drunkard and could not accurately test scales, but he was an adept at lying about his work and was known to have been outspoken against the C. F. & I. Co., and there is little, if any, doubt that his report was absolutely false. Factory Inspector Brake, who is and has been one of the strongest opponents of the "open shop" in the State, was more than glad to incorporate this drunkard's report into the testimony, so that he might give the C. F. & I. Co. a slap. He is an enemy of all the operators, and the governor has been appealed to repeatedly to remove him, but he is able to retain his position through political wirepulling. The statement that the men could not have checkweighmen is, as you know, absolutely false. At Starkville there has been a checkweighman for 20 years, and this property is within 7 miles of Morley, both of which are operated by the C. F. & I. Co. As our attorney says, it is incredible that the Morley miners could not have a checkweighman if they had so desired, while the Starkville miners could. I will say in a word that where miners had their own checkweighmen for a while they have invariably refused to continue them and pay the few cents a month to the checkweighmen for that service. I am now speaking of the C. F. & I. Co. and have nothing to say about our neighbors in that connection. Monical reports that there are no scales at Segundo. The reason is that it is a coking plant and the coal is sent there from other mines for coking purposes.

Company stores and antitruck act.—This act simply applies to the so-called "scrip" system, which was abolished by the C. F. & I. Co. a long time ago.

Employment of armed guards.—Mr. Northrop quotes only a portion of the law. The part omitted reads as follows:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to interfere with the right of any person, persons, or company, corporation, society, association, or organization in guarding or protecting their private property or private interest, as is now provided by law; but this act shall be construed only to apply in cases where workmen are brought into this State, or induced to go from one place to another in this State, by any false pretenses, false advertising, or deceptive representations, or brought into this State under arms, or removed from one place to another in this State, under arms."

Mr. Northrop evidently in his desire to serve labor unions failed to state that the United Mine Workers of America officials came here from other States, shipped in large quantities of arms and ammunition, and hired sluggers from other States to use them, and violated the portion of the law which he did not quote; namely, "removed from one place to another in this State, under arms," as that organization has been doing before and during the present strike.

You appreciate, Mr. Murphy, that every one of us here is under a tremendous pressure, and we have an enormous amount of work to do; in fact, our offices have been kept open night and day for most part during the last two weeks. Cots have been brought in and placed in the office of the Colorado & Wyoming Telegraph Co., where Mr. Welborn and other officers of the C. F. & I. Co., with other operators, could get a little rest at times during the night. Local and long-distance telephones were in constant use, and we had to have armed guards at our office and at the homes of some of us, so we have not been able, if we wished, to dispute the statements of the score or two of the representatives of yellow newspapers and muckraking magazines who have been here writing up the Colorado strike war. As quiet is being restored and the public mind calmed and reversed very largely, newspapers are asking for the facts now, having tired the people with their exaggerated and inflammatory articles.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

STARR J. MURPHY, Esq.,

DEAR MR. This fact Mr. Northrop may not have known. It will come before the people again this winter.

Under the heading "Checkweighmen and scale inspection," where I refer to Factory Inspector Brake, after the words, "Incorporate this drunkard's report into the testimony," it should read, "Incorporate this drunkard's report into his (Brake's) annual report."

DEAR MR. BOWERS: In the statement which Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., gave out to the press, he said that the eight-hour day, semimonthly pay, right to use checkweighmen, freedom to deal at the company stores or not, and the increase of wages, were all made by the company voluntarily. The statement is now made by some of his critics that all these points, except the increase in wages, were covered by law, and that the company did not make the concessions until statutes were passed requiring them. He asks me on his behalf to find out what are the facts in this connection, and would be obliged if you could inform us when the statutes went into effect, and when the various matters above mentioned were granted to our workmen, and what, if any, are the relations between the granting of them and the statutes.

J. F. WELBORN, President.
L. M. BOWERS, Vice President,
Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo.:

In his telegram to me of April 29, Dr. Foster said:

"William Green, secretary-treasurer of the International Mine Workers' Union, makes public statement that the mine workers will waive any recognition of the union or unionizing camps. If the President should suggest to the operators and miners that all questions affecting the relations between themselves and their present and former employees except the recognition of the union and the unionizing of the camps be submitted for adjudication to a board to be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, to consist of members of the Supreme Court and other Federal judges would the operators accept? Would not their acceptance be entirely consistent with the position which they took in November last in reference to the suggestions of Gov. Ammons, which position they reiterated in their telegram of May 1 to Dr. Foster? Would it not go far to remove the unfair criticism to which they are now being subjected, and if accepted by the miners, would it not put an immediate end to the present controversy? Would not the findings of such a board bring the facts before the public in an authoritative way, a result so greatly to be desired?"

[Western Union night letter.]

DENVER, COLO., May 26-27, 1914.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,
26 Broadway, New York.

Your wire date in view of fact that two representatives of Government, one an operator apparently very favorably disposed toward our side of controveray and other a miner, both appointed by Secretary of Labor Wilson, are now actively investigating conditions here, and that a committee of six from our own legislature has just commenced similar investigation, it would seem to me inadvisable that matter be taken up by any other body at this time. It is opinion of Mr. Bowers and myself that the proposition made by Gov. Ammons in November, approved by Secretary Wilson and accepted by operators, and which at your suggestion we repeated to Chairman Foster, influenced Wilson in selection of his committee, or at least in one member of it, and that a report favorable to us from that committee is not improbable. Furthermore, Green and other officers of the international organization were reported to have repudiated the statement attributed to him that recognition would be waived. The points suggested by Gov. Ammons in November are all covered by our statutes and are being lived up to practically all if not all operators. This fact seems to be now well understood by the people in Colorado, and public sentiment outside of the most labor radical element is unquestionably strongly crystallizing in our favor. Newspapers generally, outside of Denver, some of whom have heretofore taken side of strikers, are condemning recent criticisms of operators and urging miners' organization to call strike off. Two papers from Canon City, located in one of most important mining districts, showing change in attitude, have come to my desk to-day. Mr. Bowers left last night, and I am mailing him copy of your message as well as copy of my reply.

J. F. WELBORN.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. J. F. Welborn, president.]

JUNE 23, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. MURPHY: I am in receipt of yours of the 19th instant inclosing a clipping from the New York Times, reporting a statement made by J. A. Owenby at Washington last week.

Much of what Owenby said was entirely without foundation, and I can not believe carried any real weight with the President or others in power at Washington. We must admit, however, that the average reader will not be able to determine just how much of what he said to believe, yet I doubt the advisability of taking any public notice of his remarks. He is most unreliable and is so regarded by practically all who know him; in fact, I understand that he is very much discredited by the present members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., although he had some strong influence over the late Mr. Morgan, who was a partner in his coal-mining venture in Colorado.

It is a fact that the policy of the Government with respect to the employment of men by Colorado coal operators is working a very great injury on many of the small operators, and we have been encouraging them to make their appeals for relief direct to Washington. The policy is not pleasing to us, but has not interfered with our operations where we were working a fair force of men before the Federal troops came into the field. If what Owenby said along this line, together with what some of the other operators have reported to Washington, should make it possible for the coal operators to seek laborers generally within the State and outside, it would be helpful to us, and it seems to me that they must come to this before long, though I believe it will be accomplished only through the efforts of the so-called smaller operators.

Yours, very truly,

J. F. WELBORN.

STARR J. MURPHY.

New York, N. Y.

AUGUST 1, 1914.

DEAR MR. KING. As you have doubtless learned from the papers, the situation in the coal mines of Colorado is quiet. Practically all of the mines are in operation, the output being 70 or 80 per cent of normal, but quite all that present business conditions will absorb. Practically all of the men who are needed are obtainable. On the other hand, tent colonies are maintained in which some 1,500 or 2,000 strikers still reside. These tent colonies are a constant menace to peace and are only held in subjection by the presence of the Federal troops. If the latter were withdrawn, doubtless these unoccupied men, many of them, we believe, paid by the union to continue the disturbances, would renew active hostilities. I wrote Mr. Welborn, the president of the fuel company, a few days ago, inquiring what the present status was of the various committees or individuals appointed to undertake to terminate the industrial warfare. A copy of his interesting reply I inclose herewith.

There would seem to be but two ways in which a permanent condition of peace can be restored. First, by the calling off of the strike by the United Mine Workers of America. That this is likely to happen in the near future we have no definite reason to believe, unless the financial resources of the union are so depleted as a result of their industrial conflicts in several States that they can not much longer continue to support the striking miners. Secondly, by developing some organization in the mining camps which will assure to the employees the opportunity for collective bargaining, for easy and constant conferences with reference to any matters of difference or grievance which may come up, and any other advantages which may be derived from membership in the union. When we had our first conference at my house, you remember we discussed this matter and developed certain points which such an organization would include. I am wondering whether you can take the time to dictate, at your convenience, an outline of such an organization and send it to me for consideration. I think we all recognized in the conference above referred to the many difficulties in the way of devising such a plan; at the same time, there were certain points which we agreed upon as essential. An outline covering these essentials and as fully developed as your experience and present thought might make possible is what I have in mind. The purpose of this outline would be to provide a basis for our further consideration of the subject and for our discussion of it with the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. While I recognize that after your studies have progressed you will feel yourself much better fitted to outline such an organization, on the other hand, it seems to me that a step of this kind is going to be the next move. This is only my personal opinion. I have not talked with my colleagues or with any of the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. about it.

I understand that you are about to start on your western trip and that your time is fully occupied. I shall not expect a carefully studied or carefully rounded plan—simply a rough outline of those points which may occur to you, without extended thought but more as a result of your past experience with questions of this kind. I shall be in New York for the next 10 days or 2 weeks and shall be glad to hear from you at my office address. The accompanying editorial from the New York Times of July 30 is along the line of my suggestion.

AUGUST 16, 1914.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: Mr. Welborn has shown me your letter of recent date in regard to our taking up the question of organizing a board to consider grievances of our miners.

I have also read the copy of Mr. King's letter to you in regard to the same matter, but I will not discuss that, as Mr. Welborn will doubtless take that up and reply to it himself.

I, however, want to state some reasons why this matter should not be taken up at the present time.

As you know, there is not now, nor has there been since the present management assumed control in 1907, any disagreement between our company and its miners.

The strike was not entered into or called by or approved of by our miners but vigorously opposed by them, including the few labor-union miners long in our employ.

This strike does not have in it a single feature usual in coal strikes. The word "satisfaction" could have been put over the entrance to every one of our mines.

The situation was unique and entirely different from ordinary labor troubles, in one and the most important one, in the history of coal strikes, that it was forced upon an unwilling body of men by an organization that the men was not in favor of and would not affiliate with, because they were satisfied and wanted to continue the pleasant relations with the company, both the miners and the company being prosperous and no differences existed, therefore no board to take up grievances was required or such machinery necessary.

For us to take steps at the moment to form such a board would be regarded by the public as an admission on our part that some such committee or board was lacking prior to the strike and might perhaps have prevented it.

To form such a board now would discount every utterance we have made and insisted upon, that there were no differences whatever and the strike was not forced because of any grievances or differences.

The United Mine Workers of America could and would justly charge us with inconsistency and that we were forced to side-step and at last compelled to admit their repeated charges that the miners had no way to reach the managers with their grievances.

We have known for some time that if we would agree to a joint committee of miners and operators being formed the strike would be called off and without recognition of the union being mentioned. Such a scheme was no longer ago than yesterday passed by the strike leaders here and submitted to the international committee at Indianapolis, who meet there Monday next, who, in turn, are expected to submit it through Mr. Davies, one of the investigating committee, to the operators.

This trick they know would be a recognition of the union and they would shout it over the world that they had won the strike and our men set upon by a horde of organizers and run into the union and followed in a year or two with a strike and the open shop would be shut.

Later on and after the strike is off, or worn out, the writer would favor and take an active part in joint conferences directly with our miners and undertake to form a scheme or plan that would give the miners a representative to whom they could go with any matter that they thought should be adjusted. I mean a board that would have a much wider field than investigating grievances and adjusting quarrels, but who would undertake to prevent quarrels—to suggest ways and means for the betterment of the miners in many ways and help solve the perplexing social conditions and a general uplift board, so to speak.

There has been some cause for complaint, I think, in some coal companies because of the inability of miners to reach the officers higher up with their real or fancied complaints, but this has not been shown to be the case in the C. F. & I. Co. To remedy this would be one of the good features that a board would be expected to develop; they would be the "missing link" between the miner and the managers.

At the proper time the writer will give his cordial support and will take an active part in formulating such a scheme and help to make it valuable to both the miners and the company alike not only to forestall trouble, but to bring about better feelings and conditions for the mutual benefit of all concerned.

To take this up at the moment would be most unwise, in my opinion, from every viewpoint. I feel certain other operators would balk; the socialistic papers would charge us with dodging and hiding behind this eleventh-hour scheme to save our faces. The union leaders would use it as a club to drive us into some other corner.

Our rugged stand has won us every foot we have gained, and we know that the organization is bankrupt in this field, while the big men in the union are at swords' points because of their failure here. So to move an inch from our stand at the time that defeat seems certain for the enemy would be decidedly unwise, in my opinion.

The political gang at Washington are at their wits' end to find some way to get out of the pit they help these leaders to dig, so we are encouraged to stick to the job till we win.

Yours, very truly,

L. M. BOWERS.

SKETCH OF MR. DAVID GRIFFITHS'S ACTIVITIES.

David Griffiths was born at Gly-Heath, Wales, February 1, 1856. He took up coal mining in his native country when 9 years of age. He came to the United States in 1882 and almost immediately to Colorado. He entered the coal mines of the State as a miner, has filled the positions of fire boss, mine boss, mine superintendent, and was State coal-mine inspector from 1895 to 1899. He took the examination for State mine inspector twice, receiving the highest markings ever given anyone in the State, being 99.7 per cent and 99.6 per cent. Mr. Griffith's ready-hand knowledge of the geology of coal deposits in the United States is equal to that of anyone in the West. He has always taken a lively interest in the welfare of his workmen, showing the keenest appreciation of the problems affecting their welfare. He is peculiarly fitted for the work which he is now undertaking, not only because of his broad knowledge of the coal-mining industry, but on account of the unequalled confidence reposed in him, not by the coal miners alone, but by others actively engaged in the coal-mining industry.

DEAR MR. WELBORN: I inclose a proof of the Atkinson report, which is about to be issued by the Federal Council of Churches. I have received a notice from the secretary of the council that the proof is being sent to about a dozen persons representing the public and both sides of the controversy in order to give them an opportunity to criticize the report. I have been told, however, that no general comments will be printed, but only evidence submitted in opposition to statements made in the report, such evidence to be incorporated in an appendix.

I have read the report so far as it relates to the Colorado situation and am impressed with its extreme feebleness. It adds absolutely nothing to the discussion, and its only statements unfavorable to the operators are assertions either wholly unsupported or inadequately supported by impressive illustrations.

Will you please communicate to me your decision as to whether it will be best for you to take any notice of the report by correcting the more obvious mistakes? My feeling is that it would be well to correct the more obvious mistakes and to ignore the hostile generalizations.

Very likely a copy of the report has been sent directly to one or more of your associates, but your name was not on the list that was shown to me. Mr. Loughridge was to have a report, and will doubtless bring his copy to you.

Sincerely, yours,

JEROME D. GREENE.

OCTOBER 28, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. GREENE: I inclose herewith a brief statement in answer to some of the charges contained in Dr. Atkinson's report.

It has seemed absolutely impossible for me to find time to read the report and familiarize myself with the parts that ought to have attention from me, but Mr. Fred Herrington has given it some thought and prepared the inclosed statement.

If you think any parts should be left out, I am perfectly willing that you should rewrite the statement, modifying it as you see fit, and sign my name to it.

I addressed it to no one, for the reason that I did not know to whom it would be sent.

Yours, very truly,

J. F. WELBORN.

It will require more space than is allowed me to answer the report of the Rev. Atkinson on the many phases he has attempted to cover. Social and religious, and even political conditions, are subjects upon which honest minds may differ. I shall therefore not enter upon a minute discussion of these phases, but submit to your readers a simple statement of facts which, to my mind, shows that "right conditions of labor" have existed and do exist in our mines. While we make no pretensions to perfect conditions, yet the fact that a great majority of our miners remained at work, a great many have returned to work during the past year, and more applications are now being made for work by our former employees than we have employment for argues strongly and convincingly that as between the great body of our employees and ourselves there is not now and never has been any serious controversy. Moreover, the circumstances that a number of our employees left our service through fear, or for other reasons, and went into other fields and have returned to us, bears true witness to the claim that we have made—that our wages and our conditions of camp life are equal to, if not better, than those in any other districts in this country.

Rev. Atkinson, under the head of "Concerning wages," says: "It would be unwise to attempt to express my definite judgment as to whether the contentions of the miners or those of the operators are correct"; and under the title of "Conclusions," subhead, "Concerning welfare work": "No amount of welfare work, however admirable it may be in and of itself, will take the place of fair wages and right conditions."

This company has not labeled its efforts in behalf of its miners as welfare work, nor designated such efforts by any other philanthropic term. It has done much, however, in practice toward giving its employees comfortable and healthy conditions, as well as good wages. As I have heretofore expressed myself, I believe that the company could have done less in this respect and given the subject more publicity and met with greater favor in public opinion. There is one question, however, inferentially stated in the above quotation, that I can not permit to go unchallenged, namely, that the earnings of our men are not exactly as we have from time to time published and quoted. This is a matter of simple calculation from our books and records, and not a matter of judgment. Two committees, acting independently, one appointed by the Press Association, of Colorado, and the other by the governor of the State of Colorado, examined the books and accounts of the companies, and reported that the statements put forth by the companies were correct. This information was available to Rev. Atkinson. The report of the governor's committee is found at page 2687, Hearings of Congressional Committee. The Rouse pay roll of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was one which was made the subject of much comment. The governor's auditors reported in the following language:

"By request, we made a careful examination of the pay roll for the Rouse mine for August, 1913, and found the same to agree absolutely with the published pay roll."

The statement of earnings of James Fyler for August, 1913, shows $50 deducted under heading of "Drafts." This was an advance on his wages before pay day.

Rev. Atkinson says: "The coal companies are determined that their men shall not be organized." Organization, or "recognition of the union," has been the issue and, practically, the sole issue in the strike, but it has been between the U. M. W. of A. and the companies, and not between the companies and their employees. Indeed, our present employees, in a great majority, are outspoken against that organization. We admit that, in so far as it is proper, we will not permit that organization to unionize our employees against their will by the use of the gun and the torch, the arguments employed in this strike.

So many matters have been touched upon by the Rev. Atkinson that have been answered by us in other publications, that we take the liberty of inclosing you our letters to the President of the United States, and our pamphlet of the facts concerning the strike, which, we think, fully answers most of the phases touched upon by the report. In addition, we would respectfully refer you to an article on the subject, prepared by Dr. Berle, appearing in the October number of Bibliotheca Sacra, and one by Prof. Sellman in Leslie's Weekly.

Yours, truly,

J. F. WELBORN.

DECEMBER 11, 1914.

My DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: The feeling of satisfaction on the part of all of us over the calling off of the strike is by no means small.

It is unfortunate that trade conditions make it impossible for us to reemploy in the near future, if at any time during this season, all of our former employees who have not participated in the violence against those who have remained at work.

Out of the 22 mines that under normal conditions and for many years have worked steadily during the fall and winter, we have only 15 now in operation.

These 15 properties are working 4,000 men, or about the same number as they employed before the strike. This force represents approximately 70 per cent of the number employed at our 22 mines before the strike was called. Because of light business we are unable to keep the 15 mines working steadily.

The shifting about that is common among coal-mine workmen will make it possible to reemploy a few of the old men from time to time, and we will strain a point to give employment to those whose needs are most pressing.

Our mine superintendents have been instructed to keep a complete record of applicants for work, taking into account the extent of their families and others dependent upon them, and preference will be given to those whose employment will result in the greatest good to the greatest number.

Yesterday three of our former employees applied at the Rouse mine for work, and although every working place in the mine was full, the superintendent devoted most of his day to rearranging his forces so as to start these men to work.

The future must be very discouraging to the strikers who have remained in the State and have now been set adrift at a time when most of the winter is before them, and when the prospect for employment is so poor.

It is hardly probable that relief by the labor organization will be continued for any considerable length of time, if at all, even to the most needy. And if those who have willingly accepted the teachings of lawlessness and defiance of the rights of others, together with men who never worked in our properties and who were brought in here for the purpose of engaging in the violence, remain, they may wreak their vengeance, if opportunity offers, on the men whose only offense has been that they have remained at work.

I don't mean to paint a gloomy outlook; but I can not believe that the strike leaders who have directed the vicious lawlessness, and their willing followers, will change in spirit merely through the calling off of the strike.

We have been having a seasonable winter for a few days, and if it continues very long it will stimulate the coal trade. Yet the dullness in the steel business, which has caused a reduction of about 50,000 tons per month in our use of coal at the steel plant, and the greatly reduced consumption of locomotive coal by railroads, will, I fear, make it impossible for us to reopen any more mines this season.

Yours, very truly,

J. F. WELBORN.

Mr. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,
New York, N. Y.

26 BROADWAY,
New York, December 15, 1914.

DEAR MR. WELBORN: Your letter of December 11 is received. In view of the great loss which has been suffered by the State of Colorado, the miners, the unions, and the operators, it is a source of profound gratification to all involved that the strike has been called off. At the same time we greatly deplore the fact that trade conditions are so slack, owing to the war and the general business depression, that it is impossible to find work for more than a few, if any, of our former employees at this time. We can only hope that conditions will change at an early date. In the meantime, your instructions to give the preference to men with families and others dependent upon them, so as to reduce in so far as possible the hardship resulting from the lack of work, indicate an earnest desire on the part of the officers of the company, cordially seconded by the stockholders, that the law-abiding employees who went out on strike be given the utmost consideration.

Very, truly,

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.

Mr. J. F. WELBORN,
President Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo.

STATEMENT BY J. F. WELBORN.

DECEMBER 17, 1914.

In my letter of August 20, 1914, to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., in connection with a suggestion of W. L. Mackenzie King, the contents of both of which have been made public through the hearings of the Commission on Industrial Relations, I referred to plans then under consideration of providing a method (more systematic than heretofore in use) by which our workmen could reach the higher officers of the company on matters in which they were concerned.

I made further reference to the plan in my letter of September 18, 1914, to the President.

The selection of Mr. David Griffiths for the extension and direction of the plan puts it into systematic operation, and we are sure will meet the requirements in the situation where representation by committee has not been requested. Mr. Griffiths is peculiarly fitted for this work, over which he will have complete charge. The extent to which he enjoys the confidence of the men will make him their natural representative in any differences that they may have with the foremen under whom they work. If he succeeds in inducing the men to select their own checkweighman, as we earnestly hope he will, that will give them another representative.

THE COLORADO FUEL & IRON CO.,
Denver, Colo., December 15, 1914.

To our employees:

Mr. David Griffiths has been assigned to the duty of extending and directing the work of cooperation and general welfare among our employees.

He will take up his work immediately and spend practically all of his time at the mines investigating and adjusting complaints.

As he is well known to all of you, he needs no introduction, and I know he will receive the active cooperation of everyone connected with the company.

J. F. WELBORN, President.

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. J. F. Welborn, president.]

DECEMBER 18, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: Since writing you on August 20, 1914, in answer to your letter of August 11, with which you inclosed a copy of Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King's suggestions, we have been actively at work perfecting our plans to provide an easy means by which our employees could present their suggestions or grievances, if they had any, to officers of the company who would see that they received proper consideration.

Now, that the strike is over and the chance for misinterpretation of our motive is to some extent removed, we are putting into systematic operation the plan embodying the results of our experience, and Mr. King's suggestions as far as seemed practicable.

As will be noticed by the circulars inclosed, the plan is designated as the work of cooperation and general welfare, and has been placed under the direction of Mr. David Griffiths, a man peculiarly fitted for the work.

Through our investigation among the camps, we have found that general satisfaction still exists and that there is no demand, and apparently no desire, on the part of the men that they should have what is termed a grievance committee.

Occasionally some man will say that the doctor has not treated him right. Another will have some complaint of the treatment at the store. And some will think that they should have better working places in the mines. But these are nothing more than isolated cases, and the sentiment of the men seems to me that they do not want a committee for whose activities in handling complaints they would have to pay (according to general practice) a larger figure than the same men would earn while at work about the mines. They are, also, in the main, opposed to paying the small sum that would be necessary in order to provide their own checkweighmen.

Three workmen have been in my office in the last few weeks. One of them, a miner, came to ask me if we would provide a place in which to keep an automobile that he had bought. The other two had been called before the Commission on Industrial Relations by a special agent of that commission, and after testifying, came of their own volition, and not by request, to see me.

All these men took occasion to say, without questioning, that they were earning good wages and were satisfied with their condition.

One of them who was quite talkative volunteered the information that if he had a complaint and the superintendent would not adjust it he would go to the officer next in authority, and finally to me if he did not secure satisfaction earlier. I assured him that he should do just as he said he would.

All of these men said they did not want a checkweighman; that they felt they were receiving full credit for the coal they mined; and they did not want to pay 50 cents or $1 per month to employ a man of their own.

I am referring to these instances for the reason that they fairly represent the character of discussions that, in the main, take place between the workmen and the department officers of the company visiting the mines.

From another man, an Italian, I received a complaint not long ago of unfair treatment. The investigation of this complaint developed the fact that the man had worked in three different places within the past few months, and made four distinct complaints about his working conditions. The places about which he complained were readily taken by others, who made very good wages in them. This man's last complaint was made about a working place in our Morley mine. By some rearrangement in an effort to satisfy him, the division superintendent, together with the mine superintendent and the underground foreman, found two other places in either one of which they would allow him to work—giving him his choice of the three. All were good places and all anxiously sought by other workmen, but this man declined to take either or to remain at the mine. The facts are that he was a chronic complainer and would probably never be satisfied in any place.

This instance is mentioned to show the extent to which our superintendents go at a time when workmen are most plentiful to satisfy the men in our employ.

These cases, with a few others that have come under my personal observation, and the reports from four or five of our men in the fuel department, working in a general capacity that gives them access to all the mines, convince me that the plans consummated, which will be under the personal direction of Mr. Griffiths, will more than meet the requirements of the men, and when fully placed before the public ought to satisfy it.

If anyone can induce our workmen to select checkweighmen, Mr. Griffiths is that man; and if he succeeds in this purpose, which we earnestly hope he will, their checkweighmen will be the natural personal representatives of the other workmen. Mr. Griffiths will himself be their representative in any differences that arise between the workmen and either the superintendent, the doctor, or the store. He is probably better known to coal miners in the State than any other man and enjoys their confidence to a degree not equaled by that of any other man in the State. He has always been the friend of the mine workers, and will stand out for them and their interests. At the same time, he will usually be able to correct the impression of the worker whose grievance is only imaginary.

We are establishing clubhouses at several of the camps, not only at places that have heretofore had saloons but at many other mines. We are providing, and to some extent equipping, the club buildings. The men will form their own club organization at each camp and operate it with men of their own selection.

Knowing your deep interest in the work here outlined and being uncertain as to when I will be able to see you, I have written you at some length. After the work in its present form is more actively under way I shall take the first opportunity of discussing it with you and your associates.

Yours, very truly,

J. F. WELBORN.

Mr. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr.,
26 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

DECEMBER 30, 1914.

DEAR MR. WELBORN: It was a great pleasure to us that Mr. Herrington was able to stay in New York for some days. I thoroughly enjoyed coming to know him more intimately and the opportunity for a number of leisurely talks with reference to Colorado interests. At my request, he will tell you more fully than I could write of a number of things which we talked over.

I am inclosing for your information copy of a letter prepared by the commission, of which Mr. Low is chairman, appointed by the President to help bring about, if possible, better relations between the coal operators and the coal miners of Colorado, which letter I read to Mr. Herrington but retained to have copies made. The commission is disposed to send this letter to the president of each of the mining companies in Colorado. I have told Mr. Low that the spirit in which the letter is written seemed to me well calculated to assure the operators of the friendly and helpful disposition of the commission.

In due course, together with the other operators, you will receive this letter from the commission. It occurred to me that the accompanying memorandum might contain points which would be suggestive to you in making your reply.

Our feeling here is that, the strike having been terminated, it will be the wish of all those connected with the fuel company to introduce as rapidly as may seem expedient the various progressive steps in such a plan as your further thought will suggest, looking toward the prevention of a possible recurrence at any time in the future of the disorder and loss on every hand which has resulted from the recent strike. At my request Mr. Herrington told me of the tentative plan which you and he had considered, and in our several conferences I undertook to develop the idea with him more fully. We believe that the adoption of some such plan as this will be in the interest of the employees of the fuel company and of the stockholders; that it will reflect credit upon the president of the company; that it will insure the cordial and hearty good will of the employees; and that it will win for the company many friends, both in the West and in the East, among business men and State and Government officials. Its adoption would only be in line with the position which you took in your letter to me of last August, written after the receipt of my letter accompanied by certain suggestions of a plan for cooperation. I believe that after it has become effective it will render increasingly easy your work in the management of the company. At the same time I believe that you share with us the desire to show all deference and courtesy to the President's commission, and our feeling that their approval of your plans and, if necessary, their cooperation will help materially in securing the approval not only of the administration but of the public at large.

Very sincerely,

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.

DENVER, COLO., December 24, 1914.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.,

26 Broadway, New York City:

Press reports of distress among families of strikers practically without foundation, both as to their condition and number of children in families. Thorough canvass made of southern Colorado shows but 15 families in Ludlow, none of which are in want. Smaller numbers in other tent colonies. Small number at points other than Ludlow were short of shoes and clothing, and their wants supplied by coal companies for whom heads of families formerly worked. Superintendents and store managers at our little mines where former employees are living have been instructed to see that no suffering occurs. At Starkville no workmen are living in their own houses, and have been given permission to mine coal for their wants. In accordance with our usual custom, we have distributed presents of candy and other articles to all children in our camps, numbering about 3,000, which include those of former strikers.

APRIL 5, 1915.

MY DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: On March 1 Mr. Heydt wrote me asking that certain information regarding the Colorado Industrial Co. and the Colorado Supply Co. be furnished in order that you might be able to answer questions with respect to these companies asked by the Commission on Industrial Relations.

The Colorado Industrial Co. was organized in August, 1904, in connection with the refinancing of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. Its capital stock of $20,000 was owned entirely by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. Its property consisted of coal lands, iron lands, and stocks and bonds of the Colorado & Wyoming Railway Co. and the Crystal River Railroad Co., the railroads associated with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

In June, 1913, the Colorado Industrial Co. was merged with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and ceased its corporate existence.

The Colorado Supply Co. is engaged in general merchandising business, having wholesale and retail stores in Pueblo and Trinidad and retail stores at mining camps of the C. F. & I. Co. Its authorized capital is $1,000,000, of which $676,600 is outstanding. None of the stock was ever owned by the Colorado Industrial Co. All of it is and has for some years been owned by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Yours, very truly,

J. F. WELBORN.

ROCKEFELLER, JR., EXHIBIT NO. 3.

THE ROXBOROUGH,
Ottawa, August 6, 1914.

DEAR MR. ROCKEFELLER: As stated in my wire to you, I did not receive your letter of August 1 until the late mail on Thursday, the 4th. The announcement of the declaration of war between Britain and Germany came a few hours later. Pressing duties arising out of this exceptional circumstance made it impossible for me to get off a letter to you yesterday, as I had hoped, and may necessitate this letter being less in detail than I should like. However, please do not hesitate to write or wire me on any point and do not hesitate to suggest my coming to New York to see you if you should desire this. I shall be quite frank in stating if it is impossible to get away for 48 hours. Just now I am with Sir Wilfrid most of the time, as this seems to afford an opportunity of service greater than any other which it is possible for me to hope to render in the present crisis.

The western trip has been called off owing to the war, and, as you may have noticed, the Canadian Parliament has been called for a special session to open a week from Tuesday. It is hardly probable that this session will last any length of time, but while it is on and until there is something decisive in the European situation I almost feel that I owe it to my country to stay here and be available in contingencies that may arise. Under these circumstances I am inclined at this time of writing to feel that notwithstanding the cancellation of the western trip you will think I am taking the right course if I hold to the original intention of not giving my time wholly to the work of the foundation until about October 1, as originally planned. On the other hand, the cancellation of the western trip makes possible an earlier announcement of my association with the foundation, if any useful purpose might be served by this. If in the interests of the foundation it would seem desirable to make the announcement in the near future, I should be glad to confer with Mr. Greene, Mr. Murphy, or yourself as to the time and form in which it could best be made, having regard to the work itself.

Coming to the Colorado situation, I agree with you in believing it to be extremely unlikely that the United Mine Workers of America will call off the strike. They might be willing to drop open active support by degrees, but I am inclined to think that where recognition has been the principle for which they have been fighting they will not openly abandon the struggle with anything short of what they may be able to construe as such.

It may be, however, that organized labor in the United States will realize the opportunities and handicaps likely to come to certain industries through the changed conditions of Europe and will be prepared to cease hostilities where industrial strife at present exists in order that on the one hand labor may reap with capital a fuller measure of the harvest or, in industries that may be differently affected, protect itself against consequences that are certain to arise. I fear that the view likely to be taken by some of the leaders may at the outset be the shortsighted one of endeavoring to persuade their followers that the opportunities which may come to American capital through the crippled condition of industries elsewhere will induce a recognition which under less favorable circumstances might not be granted. This is almost certain to be the immediate effect, and I think you are wise, therefore, in dismissing altogether from your mind the possibility of the United Mine Workers calling off the present strike, even if, under any circumstances short of recognition, they would be likely so to do. It will not be very long, however, before the inevitable effects of the European war on American labor conditions are certain to make themselves felt, both because of the scarcity of capital available for investment and the crippled condition of industry on the other side, and once this becomes apparent the unions will have to revise considerably some of their present policies.

Having regard to the more cordial relations between labor and capital, which it is hoped the foundation may be able to effect, it would be fortunate, indeed, if you could, out of the changed conditions which this European war is certain to produce, find a means of restoring industrial peace in the United States in industries, such as coal and fuel, where there is a certainty of a direct bearing. It may be that among those who are embarrassing the situation in Colorado there are many foreigners who may feel compelled to return to Europe, and that may prove an immediate factor of importance. Looking at the ultimate rather than the immediate effect, there is, speaking generally, going to be a large amount of unemployment as a consequence of this war, and once the war is over thousands of men and their families in the Old World are going to seek future employment here in the New. In certain industries it is going to be easy for employers to find all the labor they desire, and unions will be confronted with a new problem. Recognition, simply for the sake of recognition, is going to be seen to be less pressing as an immediate end than that of maintaining standards already existing, and may rightly come to regard as their friends and allies companies and corporations large enough and fair enough to desire to maintain these standards of their own accord. For the unions to take a different view will certainly mean to lose the substance of fair conditions while wasting resources in fighting for the shadow of recognition. Here, it seems to me, lies a possible avenue of approach toward restoring normal conditions in Colorado.

The possibilities here set forth might be pointed out by employers in a perfectly frank and open manner. It might be said with equal frankness that were it desired to profit by such a situation, employers may seek later to enforce individual agreements with all men desiring to enter their employ; may even consider, as some doubtless will, altering conditions of employment to their supposed immediate advantage. Between the extreme of individual agreements on the one side, and an agreement involving recognition of unions of national and international character on the other, lies the straight acceptance of the principle of collective bargaining between capital and labor immediately concerned in any certain industry or group of industries, and the construction of machinery which will afford opportunity of easy and constant conference between employers and employed with reference to matters of concern to both, such machinery to be avowedly constructed as a means on the one hand of preventing labor from being exploited, and on the other, of insuring that cordial cooperation which is likely to further industrial efficiency.

Granting the acceptance of the principle outlined, the machinery to be devised should aim primarily at securing a maximum of publicity with a minimum of interference in all that pertains to conditions of employment. By this I mean that the hope of establishing confidence between employers and employed will lie more in a known willingness on the part of each to confer frankly with the other than in anything else. Similarly, the avoidance of friction, likely to lead to subsequent strife, is likely to be minimized by agencies which will disclose the existence of irritation and its cause at or near inception; trouble most frequently follows where ill feeling is allowed to develop, unknown or unheeded.

A board, on which both employers and employed are represented, and before which at stated intervals questions affecting conditions of employment can be discussed and grievances examined, would appear to constitute the necessary basis of such machinery. The size of this board, and whether there should be one or many such boards, would depend upon the numbers employed and the nature of the industry, and whether or not the work is carried on in one or several localities. Where, for example, there are different mines, or refining plants as well as mines, it might be that boards pertaining to each individual concern might be combined with a provision for reference to a joint board covering the whole industry, or group of industries, to which matters not settled by smaller boards might be taken for further discussion and adjustment.

In determining the character of representation on such boards, broadly speaking, a line might be drawn between those who are "paid salaries" on the one hand, and those who "earn wages" on the other. This is very rough and very general, for there are in some industries a class of petty bosses whose interests may appear to identify them more closely with wage earners than with salaried officials, but, broadly speaking, men who have authority to give orders and to direct operations fall into the salaried class, while men who have no authority to direct others, and whose own work is subject wholly to direction, fall into the category of wage earners. The selection of representatives on such boards should be made at a meeting or meetings of employees called expressly for the purpose. It might be left optional for the employees to say whether they desired a permanent form of organization of which their representatives on a board would be the officers, or whether they would prefer the selection of individuals at stated periods, without reference to any permanent form of organization. It could also be left optional with the workers themselves to say whether they wished to allow representatives so chosen a salary in payment of their services, or whether such services would have to be voluntary. A company might, with propriety, offer to provide a place of meeting for the boards, and possibly go the length of supplying the employees with permanent office accommodation for their representatives, leaving it, however, to the employees themselves to provide whatever might be necessary in the way of salaries and expenses in the keeping up of such offices.

It would not appear desirable at the outset that these boards should have anything to do with benefit features. They should not be framed with a view of restricting through possible benefits the liberty of any man as respects the continuance of his employment, but should aim primarily at affording a guaranty of fair play in determining, in the first instance, the conditions under which men would be obliged to work and the remuneration to be paid, and secondly, the carrying out of these conditions in a spirit of fair play.

One thing to be especially aimed at in the construction of such boards would be the making virtually certain of the possibility of grievances or conditions complained of being made known to and subject to the review of persons in authority over and above the parties immediately concerned, where the parties fail to adjust these differences between themselves; this to be carried even to the point that directors, if need be, should have, where the numbers to be affected are likely to justify it, a knowledge of the situation and power to pass upon it. This feature will probably not appeal to pit bosses and managers who may desire absolute authority. On the other hand, I am convinced it should be possible to so frame a constitution for these boards that the possibility of this review would in no way interfere with discipline, but would be a material assistance rather than a handicap to those who are charged with responsibility.

What might be expected of boards of this kind would be that employees before taking up any question with the officers of the company would try to adjust or settle it among themselves. Failing adjustment in this manner, differences and difficulties would be presented to the officers of the company, not by the individuals immediately affected, but by the duly constituted representatives chosen to safeguard the interests of all. Having had a preliminary sifting in this manner, cases could be brought before a committee of the board or before the whole board in any one industry for adjustment. If it should be found that an individual board could not definitely determine a matter of importance, there might be brought a further appeal on stated conditions to a board chosen to represent the industry as a whole, or a group of allied industries, the purposes here being to get away, to a degree, for purposes of adjustment, from the parties immediately concerned, but not wholly away from parties likely to be ultimately affected. This would make it an essential that all members of such boards, excepting, possibly, persons chosen as chairmen, referees, or umpires, should be persons actually employed in the industry or connected with it in some way, not persons chosen from outside. It should be possible, however, for workmen to select one or more of their number, who could give their entire time to acting in a representative capacity, and pay them a salary pending their acting in such capacity.

I think, in a very rough way, this covers the points mentioned in our conversation. I really hesitate to send this letter in such rough outline and without care in preparation. I believe so strongly in never advising in regard to any situation until one has made oneself familiar with all its phases that I feel I am running a great risk in even setting forth what this letter contains, as there may be conditions or reasons which will render its suggestions wholly inapplicable to some of the industries with reference to which consideration is invited. I should mention, too, that in the course of the present dictation I have been subject to constant interruptions, and, in fact, have had to pick up this letter and drop it half a dozen times before reaching this point, all of which is most unsatisfactory in a matter so important. I understand, however, from your letter that for the moment you are agreeable to accepting a very rough outline, the purpose being mainly that of enabling persons immediately concerned with the industries to consider possibilities and limitations of the suggestions made, in order that these may be taken account of in the working out of some definite plan when the same may come up for consideration.

With this understanding I am agreeable to letting this letter go forward. Without it I should hesitate, without opportunity of mature consideration, to attempt to give concrete expression to views which are clear in my own mind, but which, without knowledge of the conditions to which they are to apply, I find the greatest difficulty in seeking to convey.

Yours, sincerely,

W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

BUREAU OF MUNICIPAL RESEARCH,
New York, January 28, 1915.

HON. FRANK WALSH,

Chairman Industrial Relations Commission, New York City.

DEAR SIR: I send you herewith report¹ of the Denver survey, which deals with Judge Lindsey's court.

¹ The Report on a Survey of the Department of Finance and Sundry Commissions and Offices Not Under Departmental Jurisdiction, etc., prepared for the Colorado Taxpayers' Protective League by the Bureau of Municipal Research, New York, August, 1914, was submitted in printed form.

Let me say that it is the invariable practice of the bureau of municipal research to submit to the chief official of any department into which it inquires the draft of its report before it is shown to anybody else. This practice was followed with Judge Lindsey. He was in New York, and he and his wife lunched at the City Club with one of the bureau staff. The report was read to him at the luncheon and he pronounced it "very fair." As he made no further comments upon it, it was published as read to him.

I inclose also copy of a letter written by the judge to one of our staff who was working in Denver while the investigation was going on. It certainly does not read like the letter of a persecuted man.

Very truly, yours,

R. FULTON CUTTING.

MAY 8, 1914.

Mr. C. J. DRISCOLL,

Care Bureau of Municipal Research, New York City, N. Y.

MY DEAR DRISCOLL: I hope, my dear fellow, that I am not terrorizing you by the inclosed statements. I know, after your experiences in Denver, you are beyond any such possibility, but after our very delightful and interesting visits and conference the night before you left the city, I concluded to-day that certainly you would not be offended, and if I may appeal to a somewhat different consideration from that of your official capacity, which I do not wish to impose upon, you might agree it might be wise for my own protection in view of what you must know has been the terrific and bitter community struggle here, to send you such a statement as that I inclose, and which, I hope, you will continue to show me such honor and courtesy as you have shown, to read, trusting again to a continuation of the patience you must have needed through your rather trying experiences here in Denver, especially so far as my own poor self and court are concerned.

While I did not get to read the text of your report, I do want you to know that I appreciated more than I can tell you your kindly suggestion that you should make it perfectly clear that the matters you found to criticize or recommend or suggest would be so presented as to give the enemy no unjust or unfair handle to draw improper inferences therefrom, especially the kind that you know they are so anxious to draw, which might reflect upon my integrity and the good name that is about all I have left after 15 years of struggle against the evils of a community life in a modern American city.

I may send the copies of the letters referred to under separate cover. We are in the midst of a jury term and under a possible suggestion of yours that may automatically and surely lead to bankruptcy in the case of any man who undertakes to fight for a city. I am having an outside stenographer copy these letters, as I have had much of such copying done at my own expense, even though it would seem to be in line with the work that has come here because of the fact that I had been fortunate or unfortunate enough to be returned to this court by the people 10 times within 12 years. I am sure you know that I do not wish to do anything contrary to propriety or that might be offensive, but it occurred to me that I might want to send a copy of this letter to you to the committee to whom you report. If I should, I am assuming that you would not object—if you do let me know; that is, the formal letter, addressed to Mr. Driscoll of the committee, and not, of course, this informal letter, addressed to Mr. Driscoll, whom I have had such a pleasure in meeting personally as well as in your official capacity.

With kindest regards and all good wishes, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

BEN B. LINDSEY.

When will your reports be available for inspection?

[Supplementary information desired from Rockefeller Foundation by the United States Commission on Industrial Relations.]

JANUARY 23, 1915.

1. Complete list of the gifts made by the Rockefeller Foundation to January 15, 1915. If quite as easy, please give the gifts up to and including January 23, 1915.

Answer. A complete list is furnished herewith. (See Exhibit A.)

2. As part of Exhibit D, sent in your communication of January 7, appears the statement, "The Rockefeller Foundation has determined to exert itself to the extent, if necessary, of millions of dollars for the relief of noncombatants in the various countries involved." Later, in connection with the foundation's work for Belgium relief, a statement was made that, "The Rockefeller Foundation will bear the expense of ocean transportation of all supplies thus furnished to the European port most accessible to Belgium."

(a) Has the foundation offered to pay the expense of transportation to other than Belgium ports?

Answer. The foundation has thus far not committed itself to the purchase of supplies for any part of Europe other than Belgium. Supplies for Belgium have thus far been delivered through Rotterdam. Subsequent to the Rockefeller Foundation's offer and the actual chartering and dispatching of vessels in accordance therewith the international commission for relief in Belgium has offered to reimburse the foundation for all transportation charges, thus making the foundation's funds wholly available for the purchase of supplies.

(b) State the extent to which the foundation has afforded relief to other than Belgian sufferers.

Answer. Answered under (a).

(c) Is the foundation bearing other administrative expenses?

Answer. The foundation is bearing the expense of maintaining an office at 10 Bridge Street for the executive work necessary in connection with the purchase of supplies and the chartering and loading of vessels in cooperation with the Belgian relief committee of New York. As the foundation has been relieved of expenses connected with transportation, this office will be closed on February 6.

(d) Please enumerate or explain the foundation's relations with the different committees of this country which are working for relief of noncombatants.

Answer. The relation of the Rockefeller Foundation with other agencies for relief was indicated by the announcement signed jointly by Mr. Robert W. de Forest and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., as printed on pages 80 and 81 of the printed pamphlet furnished by the foundation in response to previous questionnaires. Since that arrangement was put into effect the American branch of the commission for relief in Belgium has perfected an organization for the assembling of supplies and the chartering and loading of vessels so that any further contributions made by the Rockefeller Foundation will, if possible, utilize the facilities thus provided.

(e) Is it premature to summarize the consideration which the foundation's release of January 1 said would be given to "other aspects of war relief in Europe"?

Answer. One of the duties of the war relief commission sent to Europe was to obtain, so far as it found possible, a perspective view of the need in different parts of Europe and the practicability of meeting that need. Thus far the committee's reports have been limited to Belgium, although the commission is known to have visited Poland and to have conferred with various agencies as to the possibility of rendering aid in that region.

(f) What effect has the activity of the foundation had upon giving to war sufferers by private citizens?

Answer. That the activity of the foundation in accordance with its terms of cooperation with the Belgian relief committee stimulated gifts from other sources was indicated by the rapid increase in money donated to the Belgian relief committee of New York.

(g) Please submit copies of the reports sent to the foundation by the commission which was sent to Europe to investigate methods of distributing, etc.

Answer. The only report thus far received deals with conditions in Belgium. It treats very fully of the conditions found, including the extent of need, the organization for distribution, and the methods of financing followed by the Belgian authorities. The report deals with international relations of such a character that the foundation does not feel at liberty to release the report as a whole, but it will be held at the disposal of the Department of State.

(h) How many meetings has the full board of the foundation held for considering war relief?

Answer. The only meetings of the full board of the Rockefeller Foundation held since the beginning of the war were those of October 21, 1914, and November 5, 1914, at both of which war relief was discussed. The attendance at these meetings is shown on page 54 of the pamphlet containing the answers to the questionnaires.

(4) How many were present at each meeting?

Answer. It will be seen that all of the members were present at both meetings, except Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr.

(f) How many meetings of the executive committee have been held for considering war relief?

Answer. The matter of war relief was considered at the meeting of the executive committee on October 21, 1914, but was the subject of constant discussion among the members of the executive committee at all of its meetings and between its meetings, the whole matter being referred to the executive committee at the meeting of the full board on October 21 and by that committee to a subcommittee consisting of Messrs. Murphy and Greene.

(k) How many were present at each meeting?

Answer. All of the members of the committee were present.

(l) Will you submit such estimates as the foundation has prepared as to the total amount of relief which will be needed on various assumptions, as that the war will last two months, six months, one year?

Answer. No such estimates have been prepared.

(m) Did negotiations between the Rockefeller Foundation and the Belgian relief committee initiate with the committee or with the foundation?

Answer. The plan of cooperation was suggested by the secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation for the purpose of coordinating effort and preventing the entrance of the Rockefeller Foundation into the relief work from diminishing the amount of aid that would be given from other sources.

(n) What steps has the foundation, as such, taken to ascertain whether and in what ways interest in war relief has affected public interest in relief of the needy in the United States and attention to unemployment in the United States?

Answer. The foundation was made aware, by the many appeals for gifts to local and other domestic charities whose funds were reduced on account of prevailing conditions, of the great need for continued or enlarged donations at home in addition to the gifts for war relief.

(o) What are the results of such study?

Answer. The foundation has made special appropriations for local and domestic needs on the grounds just stated.

3. Regarding applications in the interest of different proposals for studying and improving labor conditions:

(a) Will it be practicable to summarize for a period of five years the applications received by Mr. Rockefeller personally before the establishment of the foundation in the interest of proposals for studying or improving labor conditions, showing number of applicants, character of work and amounts of money involved and the action with regard to it?

Answer. No such applications appear to have been received, with the single exception noted on page 96 of our pamphlet of answers to the questionnaires.

(b) If application involve the training of teachers in vocational and industrial instruction, would these be taken up by the foundation or referred to the General Education Board.

Answer. Applications involving the training of teachers in vocational or industrial instruction would probably be referred to the General Education Board, but the projects themselves, if important, would doubtless also find a place in the "chart" of industrial relations now being prepared by Mr. King.

(c) Will you have prepared, re the staffs of Mr. Rockefeller and the different foundations established by him, a chart which will show graphically the interrelations, e. g., trustees serving on more than one board, officers acting for more than one board, employees and investigators employed in common?

Answer. The chart¹ requested is submitted herewith (Exhibit B). It shows the membership of all the boards. The only officers employed by more than one board are those mentioned on page 31 of the answers to the questionnaires, and in addition two clerks.

4. Regarding the publicity matter furnished in the exhibits to your letter of January 7:

(a) Were copies of the releases sent to all of the trustees in advance of issuance to the press?

Answer. It would not be possible to state exactly what members of the foundation saw and what members did not see these releases before publication. The nonresident members certainly did not see them, the issue of such material being entirely within the discretion of the executive officers. The releases were prepared by joint conferences of members of the executive committee, with collaboration of Mr. Ivy Lee.

(b) If not, which members did not receive copies in advance of publication?

Answer. Answered under (a).

(c) Did each member of the executive committee receive copies before publication?

Answer. Answered under (a).

(d) If not, which members did not receive copies in advance of publication?

Answer. Answered under (a).

(e) Did Mr. Ivy Lee prepare the releases?

Answer. Answered under (a).

(f) In a case where service of this kind is rendered by a member of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff, is a charge made against the foundation's funds for such service, either directly or through an overhead charge? Please explain.

Answer. No such charge is made.

5. Regarding the incorporation of the foundation:

(a) Was the foundation represented at Albany? If so, by whom?

Answer. By Jerome D. Greene, at that time general manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

(b) Who introduced the bill in the senate? Why was he selected?

Answer. Senator Foley. Mr. Greene consulted with the majority and minority leaders of both houses and was advised that Senator Foley would be a suitable person to introduce the bill.

(c) Who introduced the bill in the house? Was his interest enlisted through personal interview or by correspondence?

Answer. The bill was introduced in the assembly by Mr. _____ at the request of Senator Foley, and with the cognizance of the various leaders.

(d) What representative of Mr. Rockefeller appeared in person before the legislature or committee of the legislature?

Answer. Mr. Greene was the only representative of Mr. Rockefeller who acted in the matter. He expressed his readiness to appear before a committee if a hearing were granted, or to circularize the members of the senate and assembly; but in view of the fact that all party leaders were agreed in favoring the bill and no opposition was indicated in any quarter, these steps were not considered necessary.

(e) At how many committee meetings was the bill considered?

Answer. Answered under (d).

(f) How many of those meetings were public?

Answer. Answered under (d).

(g) How many statements which were issued from Mr. Rockefeller's office to the press and to the public prior to or while the bill was pending?

Answer. No statements were issued.

(h) Why were the limitations which were incorporated in the final act considered by Congress not incorporated in the New York act of incorporation?

Answer. The limitations incorporated in the final act considered by Congress had been cordially accepted by Mr. Rockefeller, in the belief that they tended to allay apprehension regarding the charter powers, although they imposed no restrictions that might not at any time have been imposed by Congress should the need have arisen. When it was decided to introduce the bill in the New York Legislature it was thought that the best plan would be to follow precedent as closely as possible. Accordingly, the bill was drafted on the lines of the charters of the Sage Foundation and the Carnegie corporation. It was the belief of the incorporators that the precise limitations and safeguards, some of which might possibly be found desirable, could be more intelligently determined by Congress not incorporated in the New York act of incorporation?

6. A statement showing the number of applications received by the foundation since its establishment from each State of the Union and from each of the principal cities?

Answer. No catalogue of applications has been kept, as these range all the way from innumerable requests for personal gifts or loans of money to applications in the interest of important institutions or projects.

7. Although the commission hopes to have a representative examine the material mentioned on page 22 of your letter showing various drafts and bills and committee reports, etc., in connection with the application of the Rockefeller

Foundation for charter, perhaps you will prefer to file also with the commission a digest showing:

(a) Changes made in successive drafts or bills and committee reports.

Answer: The material changes made in successive drafts and bills are indicated on pages 98-101 of the pamphlet containing the answers to the questionnaires, the changes from the original bill being indicated by italics.

(b) Dates and essence of information and statements given publicity in connection with the application for an industrial charter.

Answer. No application has been made for an industrial charter. If the word "industrial" is a misprint for "Federal," the answer is to found on pages 87-103 of the pamphlet containing the answers to the questionnaires.

8. Please send copy of the foundation report upon prostitution, and any other public reports or announcements of reports or studies.

Answer. The foundation has issued no reports upon prostitution. The inquiry doubtless refers to two reports issued by the bureau of social hygiene, which will be sent to the commission.

EXHIBIT A.

ROCKEFELLER, SR., EXHIBIT.

26 BROADWAY,
New York, February 9, 1916.

HON. FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman United States Commission on Industrial Relations, 643 Transportation Buildings, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request for information with regard to my personal advisers as to my business investments, I submit the following statement:

The present members of my personal staff are my son, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Starr J. Murphy, and Ivy L. Lee.

The other men whom I referred to, some of whom may in the course of time fill places which may become vacant, are Messrs. Edward V. Cary, J. Alva Jenkins, Charles O. Heydt, and Bertram Cutler.

There is no clear separation of duties as between the different members of my staff, but they all cooperate as they are able to toward the common end.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER.

PUBLICITY GROWING OUT OF MR. ALLEN'S "FLIMSIES" AND OTHER FORMS OF STATEMENT TO THE PUBLIC, AND MR. CUTTING'S RESPONSE—SOME NEWSPAPER HEADLINES, JULY, 1914.

During the last year many typewritten "flimsies" and other statements have been circulated and news stories have been current which have caused friends and supporters of the bureau of municipal research to question the management. Before the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations turned its attention to investigating charges of Rockefeller domination only two statements were made by those in charge, one an interview (July 16 last) with Mr. Cleveland on the differences that had arisen between the directors, the other a signed statement of Mr. Cutting (July 19) denying the truth of Mr. Allen's claims concerning the action of the board of trustees.

The first intimation the officers of the bureau had of a news story came in the form of a telegram of inquiry from Madison, Wis., to a New York agency. Officers of the bureau refused to make a statement, until a reporter came (July 16) with Mr. Allen's claims ready to print.

The widespread publicity given to Mr. Allen's recent testimony and the renewed request for information has made it seem worth while to issue this "statement of facts" to our mailing list and correspondents.

Dr. W. H. Allen, Who Can Not Agree With Dr. F. A. Cleveland, May be Ousted—Rockefeller as a Factor—Report That His Domination Caused Friction Denied by Officers of the Organization.

STATEMENT OF MR. E. FULTON CUTTING, CHAIRMAN OF THE BUREAU OF MUNICIPAL RESEARCH, CONCERNING THE PUBLISHED REPRESENTATIONS THAT MR. ALLEN WAS THREATENING TO RESIGN ON ACCOUNT OF ROCKEFELLER DOMINATION, ISSUED JULY 19, 1914.

The articles that have appeared in the newspapers with reference to disension in the Bureau of Municipal Research leave much unsaid. The trustees of the bureau do not agree with Dr. Allen with reference to the wisdom of some of the policies and methods he pursues. There is room for honest difference of opinion upon those questions.

But the trustees are unanimous. They are persuaded that they are right and Dr. Allen holds to his views. The trustees appreciate his enthusiasm for the work, his fertility of expedients, his unwearied industry, and they entertain for him personally a cordial regard.

He has not resigned as director, nor has he been asked to do so. At the inception of this bureau it attempted a form of organization very difficult to operate successfully. At the request of Dr. Allen, who was one of the founders of the bureau, an executive was created consisting of three directors with co-equal powers—Dr. Allen, Dr. Cleveland, and Mr. Bruere.

I expressed grave doubts as to the wisdom of this policy, but Dr. Allen was so positive that it would succeed that he had his way. For a considerable time the plan worked better than I expected, but of late serious differences of opinion have arisen with reference to the expediency of various policies and methods.

The fact that Mr. Rockefeller has been one of a large number of subscribers has had nothing to do with this controversy. The Rockefeller Foundation is not attempting to control this bureau in any way. Dr. Allen is wrong when he says that the board of trustees has changed its views in any respect in obedience to requirements of the foundation.

LETTER OF RESIGNATION OF MR. ALLEN AS DIRECTOR OF THE BUREAU OF MUNICIPAL RESEARCH, DATED OCTOBER 2, 1914, GIVEN TO THE PRESS WITH PAMPHLET ENTITLED "REASONS WHY MR. ALLEN BELIEVED THAT MR. ROCKEFELLER'S CONDITIONAL OFFER * * * SHOULD NOT BE ACCEPTED."

GENTLEMEN: Herewith I tender you my resignation as director of the bureau of municipal research, to take effect at the annual meeting of the corporation.

Since the May meeting with several of the trustees regarding Mr. Rockefeller's conditional offer,¹ I have hoped to be able to present in person at the annual meeting reasons for giving me an opportunity after December 1 to organize a new board around our old program and record.

In July, when untrue statements were given to the press regarding the Rockefeller offer, regarding the trustees, and regarding the bureau and the training school and their men, as well as regarding me, I was silent when perhaps I should have spoken and should have resigned. But it seemed unfair to those trustees who were away from the city or out of the country, and others who acted hurriedly without analyzing the basis for action, to make public facts which had been overlooked by or withheld from them, before first knowing that such facts had been placed before them.

How far, and in what direction, changes have been made in the bureau and the training school without the board's knowledge, and how far the board's action since May has been based upon misinformation, partial information, or no information, each trustee may now more easily ascertain from the bureau records than from me. How far, and in what ways, injustice has been done, misrepresentation fostered, and malice vented ostensibly in the name of the trustees, it is also easy to ascertain.

The university survey prevents me from coming home at this time and I can not from this distance present the essential facts as briefly, clearly, and agreeably as you can obtain them through first-hand examination.

One or two facts seem to me to add to the reasonableness and the force of two suggestions I beg to make: That trustees be elected at the annual meeting who believe in the record of the bureau and the training school; and that those trustees be not reelected who, during the past several months, have been party to disparaging and changing both bureau and training school.

¹ The purpose of this meeting was to consider differences between the directors concerning practices that had developed under Mr. Allen's management. Mr. Allen tried to inject what he termed "an alternative to the Rockefeller proposal," but was told that there was no proposal, and this was the only reference made to Mr. Rockefeller.

Never before had the bureau—and my so-called “methods”—so few enemies and so many friends as in early April this year, when, with your hearty approval and benediction, I started for the University of Wisconsin Survey.

Since that time, with the exception of one short visit home, I have been continually in Wisconsin. During that time I have had no audience with the board on any other subject but the Rockefeller offer, have been asked no questions, and hence have had no opportunity to present either fact or questions regarding proposals for change in the bureau or training school.

During that time a campaign of misrepresentation has been waged not merely against me—which would be insignificant—but against the fundamental spirit and method and the record of both bureau and training school—which I regard as highly significant.

During that time radical changes have been made in the program, the method, and the constituency of the bureau and training school. What these changes are you are in position to ascertain if, by chance, they have not been made clear to you.

The right of a trustee to independent judgment and independent preference no one can reasonably question. I certainly do not question any trustee's leaning toward what Mr. Rockefeller and recent statements from the bureau call “scientific research” rather than toward what the world knows and esteems as municipal research. But I do submit that such preference and leaning are reasons for being trustee of a bureau of scientific research rather than for transforming the bureau of municipal research and the training school for public service into something they were not intended to be.

The fair and just solution is simple as I see it :

(1) That the annual meeting of the bureau of municipal research elect trustees who believe that this is the time for emphasizing and expanding—not for changing and contracting—municipal research as it was a year ago.

(2) That the men and the money with a leaning toward “scientific,” as distinct from municipal research, be organized into a separate bureau of scientific research.

By December 1 next, when I am released from this position, I shall not only be able to guarantee from entirely new sources adequate funds for promoting municipal research as the world knows and wants it, but shall have ready men equal in training and superior in vision and in ability to get things done to those men now available for the emasculated program of municipal research which is proposed.

Through the years 1906 to 1914 you had continued evidence of my appreciation of working with the trustees of the bureau. I do not wish at this time either to subtract from my enjoyment of that retrospect or to divert your attention from my proposal for the future to treatment received the last summer by the program and myself, so strikingly incompatible with our previous relation.

Sincerely, yours,

WILLIAM H. ALLEN.

FURTHER REPRESENTATIONS MADE BY MR. ALLEN IN A PAMPHLET “REASONS WHY MR. ALLEN BELIEVES THAT MR. ROCKEFELLER'S CONDITIONAL OFFER * * * SHOULD NOT BE ACCEPTED,” ISSUED OCTOBER 5, 1915.

The idea of using New York municipal research work for teaching purposes is worth more to the country than Mr. Rockefeller's promise to help secure $100,000 a year for five years. * * * The pedagogical contribution made by this bureau is worth more to the country than any pedagogical contribution as yet made by the General Education Board's use of its nearly $50,000,000 endowment.

Mr. Rockefeller's restrictions indicate to me that he does not understand the bureau's program, method, or result. * * * Mr. Rockefeller's right to spend his own money as he wishes I do not question. I do question anyone's right, even that of our own board or our own directors, to call an emasculated program by the name of the whole program. * * * We have made capital of the fact that we have looked at all these questions from the public's point of view and in the public's interest. As one of the many men who have given their best to this movement, I should never again expect the public to believe that I was capable of looking at this question solely from the public's point of view, if it became known that I had promised to accept for five years restrictions as to field or method such as those which Mr. Rockefeller asks our board to consider and which Mr. Cutting has informed me are to be accepted.

The offer of Mr. Rockefeller was first repeated to me by two of our trustees, one of whom began the interview by saying: "If it were not for the money I would never have listened to it."¹ For trustees of the bureau to promise to avoid any field whatsoever for any person whomsoever or for any consideration whatsoever, I personally regard as contrary to the principles which originated the bureau and as an extravagant bargain both in influence and in money.² The fact that it is Mr. Rockefeller who proposes the restriction does not mitigate the danger which surely exists. * * *

In May, after extended correspondence with bureau officials, I returned to consider with the trustees of the bureau of municipal research, who were not abroad or out of the city, a proposed reorganization which included provisions to secure financial support conditioned upon radical sacrifices of bureau program, method, and accountability to the public. I was officially told that except for my objections there was unanimity of intention to accept this offer with conditions.³

For hours on May 9 and 13 I was urged "not to make a moral issue out of a mere question of expediency" and to humor the wish of Mr. Rockefeller and others "to eliminate the bureau from the New York school fight"; i. e., the fight to secure democratic, progressive, informed management of New York City's school system.

Money plus trustees' support was offered me then and later, verbally and in writing, if I would work outside New York City. I replied each time that I did not want money for however good a cause from men who would desert a winning program such as our school program.

The trustees disbanded May 13 without motion to refuse the conditional offer. At a later meeting, however, it was voted "that no subscriptions or contributions be received subject to any conditions or limitations as to the future activities of the bureau."

Yet gifts of $55,000 from Mr. Rockefeller followed shortly, part for the bureau, part for so-called "scientific research," to be by bureau men, but not under the trustees' direction.⁴ The original conditions, however, technically rejected, have, in large part, been lived up to.

On June 18 I wrote the trustees that I would rather be "alone in New York with our old program than have Mr. Rockefeller's millions, but minus our program."

What I still believe I then affirmed: "With little money, but with our old program, the bureau can accomplish more during the next 10 years than Mr. Rockefeller can hope to accomplish with his tens of millions if he continues to work with the restricted vision which he has used and would now have the New York Bureau of Municipal Research adopt."

When newspapers in July obtained from other sources than myself a rumor of the "Rockefeller conditions" I referred them to the bureau officers for the truth. The official statements, as published, were contrary to the record in letter and in reference.

The character of New York City's municipal research movement and training for public service has changed. The change is being widely felt. * * *

NEWSPAPER HEADLINES BASED UPON MR. ALLEN'S STATEMENT OF OCTOBER 5, 1914.

On October 5, when the board of trustees met, the letter of resignation and the news stories based on Mr. Allen's pamphlet had already appeared in the afternoon papers, some of which were before them. Notwithstanding this, the board of trustees unanimously decided to take no notice of the letter, pamphlet, and news stories, other than to accept Mr. Allen's resignation and to ask the chairman to refer the reporters to Mr. Cutting's statement of July 19. That Dr.

¹ Mr. Cleveland was present at the "interview" referred to; he affirms that no such statement was made by Mr. Cutting.

² Mr. Allen was not only told at this meeting that no such proposal had been made as he claimed, but when it became apparent that he would not accept the statement of Mr. Cutting and Mr. Morawetz, a formal resolution was unanimously passed (June 30) binding the officers not to accept contributions which would bind the future action of the board, and a copy was sent to Mr. Allen.

³ $30,000 only was given to the Bureau for the year 1914, and this was to make up a deficit.

Allen's claims were given wide circulation appears from the following headlines, which have been selected as typical :

INQUIRY OF THE COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—ONE OF THE NEWS STORIES TELLING OF THE INTENTION OF THE COMMISSION—DR. WILLIAM H. ALLEN AIDING THE COMMISSIONERS IN FRAMING QUESTIONS WHICH WILL BE PUT TO THE WITNESSES.

Whether the Rockefeller, Carnegie, and Sage Foundations and big business have interlocking directorates is one of the questions to which the United States Commission on Industrial Relations will seek an answer from witnesses at public hearings that begin Monday. An expert who will aid the commission is Dr. William H. Allen, formerly director of the bureau of municipal research. Dr. Allen is the author of Modern Philanthropy, published in 1912, and the questions he has framed for the commissioners to ask representatives of the foundations were suggested in his book at the time when skepticism toward philanthropy was being encouraged by certain groups of social workers.

Dr. Allen has been engaged in a survey of the University of Wisconsin, to determine for the people of that State whether their institution is doing the best it can. As he is said to have clashed with men directing the expenditure of philanthropic millions, and to have knowledge of their methods, he is expected to supply effective ammunition for the questioning of witnesses. The correspondence between trustees of the bureau of municipal research and the Rockefeller representatives, also correspondence in which Dr. Allen took part, will, it is said, be examined by the Federal commissioners.

Mrs. E. H. Harriman and Robert Fulton Cutting, both of whom were directing forces in the bureau of municipal research before the Rockefeller interests became identified with it, may be asked to testify as to what conditions were made to secure for the bureau Rockefeller support.

From the local bureau has sprung a bureau of municipal research for Denver. In the Colorado mine strike inquiry, conducted by the Federal commission, there was a parallel inquiry by the Rockefeller Foundation, two directors of which are directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., whose men were on strike. At least it is so stated at the temporary office of the commission in this city. The relations of the personnel of the Denver bureau, the foundation, and the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. will be the subject of inquiry.

Critics of the foundations believe that they are attempting to control the educational development of the country to suit the standards of the men who have created the foundations. A sample case suggested relates to the Rockefeller Foundation's attitude toward the department of education in this city. The Rockefeller Foundation is said to have looked unfavorably upon Thomas W. Churchill when he sought reelection as president of the board of education a year ago. Dr. Abraham Flexner, once identified with the Carnegie Institute, afterwards with the Rockefeller philanthropic interests, is a member of the board of education and the leader of an aggressive element with definite ideas on educational development. (News item, New York Evening Post, Jan. 16, 1915.)

EXHIBIT B.

STATEMENT OF FACTS¹ SUBMITTED TO THE COMMISSION WITH LETTER OF FEBRUARY 2, 1915.

The origin of the bureau.—The one novel idea in the organization of the bureau of municipal research (the continuous employment of a staff by a citizens' agency to keep in touch with the Government and what it is doing and to cooperate in constructive work) had been discussed for many years before 1907. In its issue of March 11, 1901, this was the subject of an editorial in the New York Tribune, which was clipped by Mr. Frank Tucker and sent to Mr. Cutting as something to which he should lend his support. Soon after this a formal proposal to create a bureau or department of civic affairs of the chamber of commerce was prepared by Mr. Tucker and taken up by Mr. Cutting with Mr. Charles Stewart Smith, a prominent member of that body. When Mr. Allen came to New York his assistance was invited. While engaged professionally on work of this kind, Mr. Frederick A. Cleveland became impressed with the need for an independent agency supported by citizens, which would be equipped to obtain information about the management of public affairs, and follow up and support the constructive measures of public officers. And when Mr. Cleveland became a member of the mayor's advisory commission on finance and taxation in January, 1905, he actually employed an outside staff in this manner.

In February, 1905, Mr. Cleveland prepared a written prospectus for the organization of a permanent "Bureau of municipal research," at the suggestion of Mr. Tucker, and placed it in Mr. Allen's hands, with the understanding that he would undertake to raise money for it. This brief was used for some time by Mr. Allen, and several conferences were arranged with professional and business men. Later in November, with the help of Mr. Tucker, Mr. Allen prepared a revised statement and circulated it under the title of "Brief for the establishment of an institute for municipal research." In the latter part of 1905 Mr. Cutting decided to support the efforts at the rate of $1,000 per month for a year, to make an actual demonstration of what could be done; and with this fund Mr. Henry Bruere was employed to take charge of it, taking over on his staff some of the men who had been working with Mr. Cleveland. The work was financed by Mr. Cutting and conducted by Mr. Bruere as the "Bureau of city betterment," a branch of the citizens' union, of which Mr. Cutting was president. The success of the first year's effort led Mr. Cutting to ask Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller to join him, and the bureau of municipal research was incorporated in 1907, with Mr. Cutting, Mr. Tucker, Mr. Allen, Mr. Cleveland, Mr. George McAneny, Mr. Richard Watson Gilder, Mr. Edwin R. A. Seligman, and Mr. Carroll D. Wright as trustees. Mr. Bruere was the first director of the bureau. Mr. Cleveland was brought in as director on the technical side and Mr. Allen was made director in recognition of his ability as a promoter and advertiser.

The purpose and policy of the bureau.—The bureau originally undertook to make inquiries into the organization and management of the Government, to find out what the Government is doing, how it is doing its work, and what results are being obtained, without color or bias. This is still the underlying purpose and motive of the board of trustees and of all the employees of the bureau engaged by them.

In order that there might be no question about the unbiased and disinterested attitude of the bureau in doing its work, it started out with the established policy of first preparing a statement of facts, without comment or criticism; of submitting this statement of facts to the official or to the person responsible for the conduct of the office that was being studied, of taking up with the responsible officer or person any suggestion for change, enlargement or amendment of the first draft of statement of facts, as submitted. A statement of facts having thus been agreed to, the bureau then undertook to place before the officer its critical and constructive recommendations based on the statement of facts. It also undertook to give to the public officer its report before it gave it to the public, in order that he might take such constructive steps as he might think desirable for the public good before making the report a matter of news. This is still the policy of the bureau of municipal research. During the first five years of the bureau's existence, Mr. Allen had little to do with the research work of the bureau—this being almost entirely in the hands of Mr. Bruere and Mr. Cleveland. During the last three years, while Mr. Cleveland was absent, Mr. Allen had much to do with the bureau's research work, and it was during this period that serious differences developed with respect to the uses which were made of the personnel of the bureau and serious question was raised by the board as to whether the practices that had grown up were in harmony with established policies.

With respect to publicity, Mr. Allen's views have never been in harmony with those of his associates, and within the first year of the bureau's existence a special committee was appointed to define its publicity policy, departure from which has since been the subject of frequent protest.

When Mr. Allen began more actively to participate in bureau work he first entered the educational field; and in this he not only attempted to go into the various institutional aspects of education, but also to criticize sharply matters of educational theory and the ideals of professional educators. This practice, together with his personal attacks on educators, was the subject of protest by members of the board.

Further questions were raised as between the directors with respect to practices pertaining to the professional service work undertaken for compensation, management of the training school, office organization, and discipline, and other matters, many of which were not brought before the board.

During the period of these controversies several members of the board of trustees resigned; the last, Mr. John B. Pine, whose letter with statement of reasons was dated February 20, 1914. Effective on January 1, 1914, Mr. Bruere resigned as codirector.

For two months after January 1, 1914, efforts were made by Mr. Allen's remaining codirector, who had then returned to active participation in the management, to find a basis whereon an agreement could be reached with respect to bureau work, either by a definition of duties or by a subdivision of responsibility which could be presented as a formal proposal to the board of trustees.

Finding that this was impossible, on March 2, following a six-hour conference on February 28, Mr. Cleveland submitted his resignation to the board of trustees, recommending that the whole management be turned over to Mr. Allen.

The resignation of Mr. Cleveland brought the chairman of the board into the matter, and an agreement, in writing, was made with respect to the division of work, to no avail.

A formal proposal along the same lines was then brought before the meeting of the board of trustees (Mar. 24, 1914) and a resolution was passed defining the jurisdiction and authority of each director, with no better result.

Facts about Rockefeller subscriptions and influence.—Although Mr. Rockefeller and the Rockefeller Foundation have been among the liberal contributors to the support of the bureau, the total of all the contributions from both sources has amounted to only about 10 per cent of the funds expended. (See "List of Contributors," Exhibit 1, attached.)

During 1907, Mr. Allen sought to obtain large financial support from the Sage Foundation and the Carnegie Institution, as well as from Mr. Rockefeller.

In May, 1908, Mr. Allen wrote to Mr. Rockefeller, emphasizing the need for a permanent endowment. In November, 1908, Mr. Allen again sought to enlist Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Carnegie in obtaining large support for the bureau.

From 1910 to 1914 Mr. Allen frequently urged Mr. Rockefeller and his associates to contribute to the bureau.

In 1913 Mr. Allen obtained from the Rockefeller Foundation, on his urgent solicitation, $30,000 for a special investigation to be controlled by him, although at that time Mr. Rockefeller's subscription to the general fund of the bureau was only $2,000.

As late as December, 1913, he stated that he still hoped to get from Mr. Rockefeller an endowment and cited the fact that he had obtained a special fund of $30,000 a year before as the reason to hope for such a result.

The only contributions to the bureau by Mr. Rockefeller or the Rockefeller Foundation with restrictions attached were obtained by Mr. Allen, and the only difference between the subscription which Mr. Rockefeller made in 1914 (the subject of Mr. Allen's hostile criticism) and the $30,000 subscription of 1913, above mentioned, is that the subscription of 1914 was to the general fund, without restrictions, whereas the 1913 subscription was to a special fund.

The fact that Mr. Allen sought and frequently obtained special funds from Mr. Rockefeller and others instead of giving his thought and attention to obtaining general funds, the use of which would be for the free determination of the board, was one of the subjects of serious complaint against Mr. Allen by his codirectors.

During the entire period of eight years Mr. Allen was the only one who had any considerable contact with Mr. Rockefeller or his associates in asking for financial support.

During this period Mr. Allen also made various overtures to try to get Mr. Rockefeller to interest himself personally in the management and affairs of the bureau.

In 1909 Mr. Allen proposed Mr. Rockefeller as a trustee and obtained the consent of the board to write a letter to Mr. Rockefeller, urging him to become a trustee, which Mr. Rockefeller refused to do.

It was not until May, 1914, after Mr. Bruere had left the bureau, and after questions had formally been raised before the board bringing into issue questions of policy concerning the management on which the trustees could not agree, and when, with the resignation of his codirector before the board, there was a disposition not to accept it, Mr. Allen made it known that he thought that Mr. Rockefeller was exercising undue influence or that he objected in any manner to Mr. Rockefeller's contributions.

A conference between Mr. Cutting, Mr. Morawetz, and Mr. Rockefeller took place on April 10 in response to a request of Mr. Cutting, made several months before, urging Mr. Rockefeller to take up the question of another five-year subscription, the last year of the previous one being about to expire.

Upon the conclusion of this conference Mr. Cutting immediately reported the conversation to the directors, and stated that Mr. Rockefeller had raised question about the publicity and about the policy of the board, but that he had been told that every question he had raised had been for some months before the board; further, that Mr. Rockefeller had requested information about certain details of bureau practices and that he had suggested that he get his information from one of the directors.

On the following day—April 11—at Mr. Rockefeller's request, Mr. Cleveland lunched with him to talk over the bureau's methods and work. At the conclusion of this conference a written memorandum was made and submitted to Mr. Allen, setting forth what questions had been raised and what had been the attitude of Mr. Rockefeller—this being the first conference that Mr. Cleveland had ever had with Mr. Rockefeller about bureau work or bureau affairs.

On April 22, Mr. Allen wrote to Mr. Cutting from Madison a letter, an excerpt from which follows: "If it were not for the recent Flexner report I should feel justified in writing to Mr. Rockefeller and appeal for funds to supplement the meager budget that was voted for this study. * * * It is just the kind of opportunity that those big foundations which advertise that they are looking for opportunities to serve, ought to take advantage of." And in the same letter he says that he had asked the chairman of the special committee to study training schools for teachers in New York to "make formal request for help of the General Education Board and the Carnegie Foundation."

What was heralded by Mr. Allen as a conference on the "Rockefeller proposal" in his published brief under the title "Reasons Why Mr. Allen Be-leaves Mr. Rockefeller's Conditional Offer Should Not Be Accepted" never took place.

The meeting of May, 1914, referred to by Mr. Allen in his brief, was devoted entirely to the questions raised in a memorandum submitted by Mr. Cleveland with a view of getting an "agreement on the main questions raised in previous conference," and when Mr. Allen tried to inject his so-called "alternative" he was told that there never had been such a proposition.

For all statements of fact given there is supporting evidence in the form of letters, minutes, reports, and other documents in the files of the bureau, except in so far as they relate to personal conferences, in which cases the persons with whom the conferences were held are still in the service of the bureau, are still available as witnesses, may be sworn by the commission and their testimony obtained by the commission under oath.

ASSIGNMENT ADVICE.

Assistant director in charge: William H. Allen. No. 310. Date: June 11, 1913.
Assigned to Franklin Zelger.

Descriptive title of assignment: Public School No. 115, Canarsie, Brooklyn.

Instructions.—Visit Public School No. 115, Canarsie, Brooklyn. Ask for Miss Callahan, principal. Do not state your connection with bureau unless definitely asked, when say that you are there by assignment. If possible, keep the rôle of interested citizen who has read the attached clipping. Say that you made up your mind to step in some time when you could. Use your own judgment about disclosing your connection with the Newburgh survey.

I am very anxious to learn from your judgment of the general spirit of the place; whether the teachers seem interested and happy; whether there seems to be a more indifferent attitude of principal to teacher than you find in the larger schools.

Assignment to be completed: Thursday night.

ASSIGNMENT ADVICE.

Assistant director in charge: William H. Allen. No. 348. Date: July 1, 1913.
Assigned to Mr. Kirshman.

Descriptive title of assignment: Moving-picture shows.

Work to be performed at: Field on Saturday and Sunday evenings.

Instructions.—Please visit the moving-picture shows named below and obtain the data called for in the accompanying schedule. You will note that all questions not requesting numerical values may be answered by "yes" or "no." Care should be taken to place at the head of the data column for purposes of identification the same number that appears opposite the house in the list. As the list has been prepared with a view of covering the district in the most expeditious manner, it is suggested in visiting these houses that the order indicated be followed. Merely note whether or not building contains tenements; it is not necessary to count them. Artificial ventilation will be indicated by the presence of electric fans. All the shows listed are so-called "store shows," in small rooms, and it should be possible to obtain the desired data by a casual observation.

Be careful to note each item on the schedule.

(1) No. 899 Eighth Avenue, (2) No. 366 West Fifty-ninth Street, (3) No. 114 West Sixty-fifth Street, (4) No. 683 Amsterdam Avenue, (5) No. 217 East Sixty-seventh Street, (6) No. 1153 First Avenue, (7) No. 1196 Second Avenue, (8) No. 908 Third Avenue, (9) No. 797 Third Avenue, (10) No. 699 Third Avenue.

Assignment to be completed: Monday morning.

ASSIGNMENT ADVICE.

Assistant director in charge: Dr. Allen. No. 445. Date: August 6, 1913.

Assigned to Mr. D. Miller.

Descriptive title of assignment: Help your city complaint bureau.

Work to be performed at office.

Instructions.—Prepare a 1,500-word article to be syndicated by the survey, which is taken by about 50 different cities. It must be popularly written and full of concrete illustrations showing the kind of questions that have come in and showing results.

As you have this in hand, it would be a pity for you not to sign this story.

Can you wedge it in among your other assignments without interfering with the complaint-bureau work? This kind of thing all of us have to do in our own time on the fly. From your knowledge of the field you should be able to turn in finished copy within one hour's time.

Please let me know how much time you put on it.

Assistant director in charge: William H. Allen. No. 470. Date: September 22, 1913. Funds: Budget. Chargeable: N. J.

Assigned to Don C. Sowers.

Descriptive title of assignment: New Jersey budget-making methods.

Instructions.—We have made a preliminary report to a New Jersey citizen on present methods of making a budget in that State. (See report by Mr. Farmer and Mr. Heffernan.) As you see, it is a first draft only. It should be whipped into shape as a formal report which will give the bureau's best experience, judgment, and constructive suggestions to date. Feel free to use the matter from Wisconsin's blanks, from the commission of efficiency's work, Washington, your own visit to Albany. Please consider this a test of how you are to prepare to submit matter by the politicians, newspapers, and public-spirited citizens of a State. It will be an important part of this fall's campaign in New Jersey if we word it right and put into it what Mr. Driscoll calls "punch." Make it the shortest, most direct possible thing and in form which lends itself to use through press, magazines, and pamphlet purposes. You should spend not more than one day in whipping into space the data contained in the two above-mentioned preliminary reports.

Descriptive title of assignment: Tammany Hall organization.

Work to be performed at office.

Instructions.—For the next few months there will be a great deal of discussion of the possibility of destroying or rehabilitating Tammany Hall. Talk of destroying Tammany Hall is probably absurd. Talk of rehabilitation is equally absurd unless they go further than the make-up of the men at the top. So far as I know, there never has been a suggestion that the charter of Tammany Hall be qualified or restricted so as to give its own membership a voice in the management and more particular to guarantee complete publicity to its own membership as to what has happened.

Please look into this thing and report when you see your way out as to the possibility of so reorganizing Tammany Hall by charter and by publicity provisions that it will become a veritable bureau of municipal research plus training school for public service plus clearing house for adequate community relief and discussion.

No. 495. Date: November 10, 1913. Funds: Comp. bur. Code No. 569C.

Assigned to M. G. Wend.

Under direction and control of Mr. Ray.

Descriptive title of assignment: Reckless driving of United States mail wagons.

Instructions.—Look up the ordinances passed by the board of aldermen concerning the regulation of street traffic. Pay particular attention to those articles which provide against reckless driving.

Note any exemptions or exceptions made in the case of United States mail wagons. When you have become thoroughly familiar with the laws on this subject make observations in the field, particularly in the downtown district.

Take the registered number of mail wagons which you observe. Note the speed, any reckless driving, street conditions, etc. Also note the time and place.

This assignment is designed to secure specific information to be used in making a recommendation to the board of aldermen that the exceptions made in the case of United States mail wagons be abrogated.

Descriptive title of assignment: Bureau books and accounting methods.

Work to be performed at office.

Instructions.—Please report to Mr. Chadbourne, office manager, for work in connection with the bureau's system of accounts. Bear in mind that this system is in miniature the same system as is being recommended by the bureau for Government departments. At this time your assignment on the books will only last five days. This is in order that you may have an introduction to bookkeeping and accounting and become familiar with the terms used before going out to city offices.

Get a copy of the Handbook of Municipal Accounting and read it while engaged in the above assignment.

Descriptive title of assignment: Cost accounting.

Work to be performed at: Department of finance and department of charities.

Instructions.—Please report to Mr. McIntyre, who is in charge of the expert accounting department of the department of finance. He will assign you to work under Mr. Hyer and Mr. Eggleston, of his office. Your first work will be to draw off a quarterly report of the expenses of the street-cleaning department from the general-expense ledger in the office of the chief bookkeeper at the department. This work should be completed within one week. At the end of this time you will again report to Mr. Hyer, who will assign you to work in the department of charities. In this department you will probably be required to act as an instructor in cost accounting to newly appointed bookkeepers.

During this assignment you will, of course, consult with the supervisor and directors of the training school as often as may be necessary.

Title of account to be charged: Help-your-city complaints.

Descriptive title of assignment: Office and in the field.

Investigated help-your-city complaints as assigned.

Instructions.—Every complaint, if founded on fact or if sound in policy, will relate to some city department, and will involve a knowledge both of the department's organization for attending to the complaint and its organization in general, and its relation to other city departments, including the body which votes funds.

In assigning these complaints we have in mind that those who investigate shall not only secure certain field contact with conditions, with officers, employees, and citizens, but shall secure also definite information as to department organization and methods. Incidentally, oftentimes the dispatch, accuracy, and suggestiveness, with which investigations are reported upon give helpful hints as to the next experience needed by men and women in the training school.

Please remember that the first purpose of the assignment is to get information promptly and to suggest remedies, but that the first purpose of sending you is that you shall obtain the above-mentioned experience and information.

Title of account to be charged: Re information concerning automobiles owned and used by various city departments.

Work to be performed at office and field.

Instructions.—You will please get complete information on the following points: (1) Number of automobiles owned in the various departments of New York City; (2) on whose order they were purchased, prices paid, by whom used, cost of operation.

This study should be completed by Monday or Tuesday of next week, if possible. The purpose of this study is to obtain the facts stated for the use of the bureau and to give your experience in seeking such information in the proper sources in the city departments.

Descriptive title of assignment: Suitability of location of street-cleaning barns.

Work to be performed at field.

Instructions.—You will please visit the section headquarters, department of street cleaning, at the following locations: Section 30, 319 East Twenty-fourth Street, rental $360; sections 1 and 4, 74 Greenwich Street, rental $1,200; 70 Carmine Street, rental $560.

Report on the above with respect to suitability of location with reference to area served, number of men accommodated, fairness of rental for property.

In obtaining this information, if possible, confer with the district superintendent in charge of each section visited.

This work is to be done to-morrow, March 13.

The purpose of this study is to obtain information for the sinking-fund commission, which may have to assist it in considering requests made by the street-cleaning department for renewal of leases at the above locations.

Descriptive title of assignment: Municipal buildings.

Work to be performed at office and field.

Instructions.—In most communities the buildings bearing the worst reputation for cleanliness, ventilation, beauty, etc., are public buildings. This is probably as true of national and State buildings as of dingy city halls. Too often it is true of schoolhouses as well as of courthouses. Several times we have suggested to volunteers wishing to do practical civic work a quick examination of public buildings from the standpoint of what the citizen without having any special authority can observe from the outside through the corridors, calling at offices, etc. We should have here, in concrete shape, suggestions which could be used by volunteers here in New York or which could be recommended in other cities. For studying national buildings I once suggested a set of questions to the National Civic Federation, addressed to Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Washington. In Woman's Part in Government there are some other suggestions.

With a view to getting the facts about city-owned, county-owned, and nation-owned buildings in this city, obtain from the Municipal Reference Library and from available digests, reports, inquiries, etc., the data necessary for a list of minimum essentials which you or someone else can use in testing New York buildings. Report this list of minimum essentials to Mr. Snyder and to me. (Consult with Mr. Lindholm, Dr. McCombs, etc.) The first buildings to be studied will be the courthouse; second, the city hall; third, municipal building; fourth, building now used by health department.

ASSIGNMENT ADVICE.

Director in charge: William H. Allen. No. 697. Date: March 23, 1914.

Assigned to Mr. Lockwood.

Under direction and control of Mr. Snyder.

Descriptive title of assignment: Corporation inspectors.

Work to be performed at field and office.

Instructions.—For many years one of the chief opportunities for paying political debts has been through the so-called corporation inspector, i. e., a man whose ostensible business is to inspect work done upon the city streets by street railway companies, gas companies, etc. His salary was paid by the corporation, but he was named by the borough president in charge of public works. See page 24 of our Municipal Reform Through Revision of Business Methods.

Just what progress has been made since the above publication no one in New York knows. Supplementing an earlier assignment calling for the facts regarding present practices, it is desired to know what is the practice in other cities. Please learn first what, if anything, can be obtained at the Municipal Reference Library. Try, secondly, the New York Public Library. Thirdly, read the indexes of the principal publications, including engineering and municipal journals; see what the Civil Service Reform Association has.

Report progress daily to Mr. Snyder or to me. We are particularly anxious to learn whether in any places the amount of work done, salaries paid, conditions of appointment etc. are reported to or controlled by the city.

ASSIGNMENT ADVICE.

Director in charge: William H. Allen. No. 700. Date: March 24, 1914, Funds: New York health.

Assigned to Mr. Lane, Mr. Peterson, Mr. West.

Under direction and control of Mr. Snyder.

Title of account to be charged: Health department reports, New York City.

Work to be performed at office.

Instructions.—Commissioner Goldwater, through Secretary Fiske and Dr. Baldwin, now in charge of the health department's public education work, has asked that we make suggestions as to weekly bulletins, quarterly report, and annual report which will improve either form or content. More particularly we are asked to be of help with regard to the proof of the 1912 annual report, which should be issued at once. Mr. Lane is making a study of health bulletins published by cities and States.

You will be given a section of the report proof. In reading it have in mind points which I had in mind last night, as to the essential factor of a reporter—desire to know unit of inquiry, account, comparison, subtraction, percentages, summary, classification. Thus, with respect to every statement of fact for each section and every table, ask yourself: "Does this table indicate that the person writing it wanted to know the particular facts which would help the town or help the administrator? Are the things listed the right units of inquiry? Are the comparisons set up in such a way that the reader takes in at once the truth of comparison? Are unlike things put into the same column or the same total?" All these have to do with content primarily and only indirectly with form.

In addition read proof to see whether or not what has been told is told in proper English, proper spelling, proper use of plural and singular, proper brevity, proper clearness. This proof costs money. Therefore we want to make our corrections tentatively either on slips of paper or, when space permits, on the extreme left or right margins, so that there will be room enough for Mr. Fiske and Dr. Baldwin to insert their final instructions to the printer.

Remember there are three purposes in this study: (1) To improve the report if we can, (2) to give you information, (3) to show us what power of analysis and capacity for detail you can give to proof reading.

It is not possible to make radical changes in this particular proof. It is former Commissioner Lederle's report, and must go out substantially as set up, except for typographical and proof corrections. Another assignment will cover analysis and criticism of this proof to be used for the 1913 report.

Director in charge: William H. Allen. No. 701. Date: March 24, 1914.
Funds: New York health.

Assigned to Mr. Lane, Mr. Peterson, Mr. West.

Under direction and control of Mr. Snyder.

Title of account to be charged: Health department reports, New York City.

Work to be performed at office.

Instructions.—One of the principal services of Mayor Gaynor's administration, due primarily to the interest taken by his secretary, Robert Adamson, now fire commissioner, was to start the standardization of departmental reports. As the mayor is on the board of city record, which prints reports, and as the reports must also come to him in his capacity as mayor, any mayor who wishes and knows how may set a minimum standard as to content, form, size, etc., of reports.

As stated in assignment No. 700, the training school has been asked to suggest improvements, if we can, in the health department reports. As our base we start with the proof of the health department report for 1912. We have preceding reports. From the health department we can get reports of other cities, such as Montclair, Providence, Seattle, etc. In the administrative code prepared by the bureau of Portland are the best suggestions which we were able to get last summer. We should be able to do better to-day because, in the language of the farmer, "our whiffletree is near the center of the bull wheel"—i. e., we are asked to do a task of potentially big service for our home city, to be used at once by one of our own group as well as by the department.

Take the sections of the report given to you by Mr. Snyder, indicate on separate slips of paper every statement that is not clear, every general statement that is not proved by supporting data, all tables or statistical statements which do not of themselves explain their meaning and which lack editorial interpretation, all tables which fail to show that in preparation the department did not conform to a standard of minimum essentials—unit of inquiry, account, comparison, subtraction, percentages, summary, and classification.

Individually first and later in conference with others working on this assignment, list the improvements in typography. Here we have an absolutely free hand, so far as our assignment is concerned. We may suggest any kind of type, any kind of tabular arrangement, any kind of paragraphing, illustrations, graphs; after each one of us has individually made his own suggestions we shall put them all together and in conference prepare a composite list for consideration by the department.

Assistant director in charge: Dr. W. H. Allen. No. 710.

Assigned to Mr. Jessup.

Under direction and control of Mr. Snyder.

Descriptive title of assignment: Inspection service in the health department.
Work to be performed at: Field.

Instructions.—You will report to Mr. Fiske at the health department for a study of the inspection service of that department. It is desired that you should become well acquainted with the inspection work done by this department, touching sanitary inspection, food inspection, and sanitary food inspection. You are to use your own judgment as to the best methods of getting acquainted with this subject, but should arrange to make the rounds of several inspection districts with inspectors of the department and then follow the same procedure on your own initiative. It is expected that when you are through with this study that you will be sufficiently well acquainted with the health-inspection service to criticize faulty methods and make recommendations as to changes which would operate for the improvement of the present inspection service of the department.

ASSIGNMENT ADVICE.

Assistant director in charge: Dr. Allen. No. 749. Date: April 15, 1914.

Assigned to Mr. Parlin.

Under direction and control of Mr. Snyder.

Descriptive title of assignment: Study of street cleaning department.

Work to be performed at: Field and office.

Instructions.—Commissioner Fetherston, of the street cleaning department, faces a number of interesting problems in his work. He has assured us that he believes we may be of some help to him in reaching a solution of these problems. You will therefore report to Commissioner Fetherston and put yourself at his service for work along lines as follows:

(a) Familiarize yourself thoroughly with the detail of street cleaning throughout the entire city, particularly with reference to the methods of inspection. Mr. Fetherston is considering a reorganization of the inspection service, and your study should be so carried on that you may be helpful to him in working out this problem.

(b) Mr. Fetherston is considering the organization of a school for employees of the street cleaning department. You will make a study of the labor required to do the several kinds of work, as street sweeping, emptying cans of ashes and garbage, so that you may be in a position to make suggestions to Commissioner Fetherston in working up a teaching plan for such a school.

(c) In attacking the problem of street cleaning, Commissioner Fetherston feels that he must bear in mind the industrial or commercial characteristics of different sections of the city, and to this end he desires to prepare a map of New York showing such parts as tenement districts, manufacturing districts, wholesale districts, retail districts, high-grade residential districts, etc. You will make a study of this problem also so that you may assist in working it out.

(d) You will use your own initiative in approaching any other problems that may present themselves to the street cleaning department.

The purpose of this assignment is, from your point of view, to give you such contact with the street cleaning department that you may familiarize yourself with every detail of its management. This study is to be completed only when we feel that you have done as much as may be done by you in the direction indicated.

EXHIBIT D.

MARCH 4, 1914.

MR. ALFRED WAGSTAFF,

Clerk, Appellate Division,

Supreme Court, First Judicial Department, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. WAGSTAFF: I find that the division of our office which handles our publicity service has made a mistake by way of furnishing to the newspapers of the city a flimsy in relation to a notice which appeared in the Law Journal on the 20th ultimo, over your signature, designating 10 newspapers as having a circulation calculated to give notice of legal publications. The assumption was that this designation made these papers the only ones that were entitled to give notice of legal publications, and a flimsy was prepared for the press, for release on March 2, on that assumption.

Going into the matter, we now find that about November 1 some 18 papers of large circulation were designated and that this is a supplementary list.

In view of these facts, I apologize to you and to the court for the part which we have taken in such publicity as has resulted.

As a matter of fact, I find from our clipping service that the World and the Times had published editorials on the subject before the date of release of our flimsy, and so far as we know the American is the only one that had a story making use of our material.

Very sincerely,

F. A. CLEVELAND, Director.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
Wednesday, May 19, 1915—10 a. m.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Gaddis present?

TESTIMONY OF REV. EUGENE S. GADDIS.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Dr. GADDIS. Eugene S. Gaddis.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession or calling?

Dr. GADDIS. Minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been in the ministry?

Dr. GADDIS. Twenty-seven years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a regularly ordained minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is your residence?

Dr. GADDIS. Cincinnati—I have been away from there, though, for about two years and a half.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a graduate of any school of learning or institution in this country?

Dr. GADDIS. My education has been in the schools of Dayton, Ohio, and the theological school of Evanston and Boston.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had any connection with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What was it?

Dr. GADDIS. I began as the camp minister in the Trinidad district, and about a year or 10 months after I began, I became superintendent of the social work of the entire camp system.

Chairman WALSH. That includes what camps, please, in Colorado?

Dr. GADDIS. It includes all of the work of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., in particular their four different branches, their coal and iron and rock and timber camps.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand that it was confined to Colorado?

Dr. GADDIS. No, sir; it is not; there are iron mines in Wyoming, and one in New Mexico, although I never visited that mine in New Mexico.

Chairman WALSH. By whom were you employed—what individual employed you?

Dr. GADDIS. My predecessor, Rev. Walter Morritt—I obtained the work through him, through his instrumentality.

Chairman WALSH. In addition to doing this sociological work, did you have any church or parish or church of your own that you administered to people?

Dr. GADDIS. My work was first, as I stated, as religious worker principally in the nine camps of the Trinidad district. That was purely religious, taking in simply what was known as the Trinidad district, and then, when I became superintendent of the sociological work, my work was broadened into the educational and social, and I incorporated in it, looking after the work along hygienic lines.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what opportunity did you have for observation into the everyday working of the way the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. dealt with the men and women in their camps?

Dr. GADDIS. I considered it one of the very best—a very close range. I was intimately acquainted with the miners and their families; I visited them and they entertained me; and the relations I sustained to them and to the operators, until within a few weeks before I severed my relations with them, was one of confidence.

Chairman WALSH. Do you understand their everyday lives, the complaints, if any, they had against the company; their method of expression, how they felt leading up to this strike and afterwards, and all about it?

Dr. GADDIS. I can not say I know all about it, but I know considerable.

Chairman WALSH. You had a standpoint from which you could understand their feelings?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, have you prepared a statement which to your mind covers generally the situation out there, so far as the company and the human beings working for them is concerned?

Dr. GADDIS. I have.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be kind enough to submit it, if you prefer to do it that way; I think we would like it.

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir; I would be glad to do that.

Chairman WALSH. Very good; just read it to us.

Dr. GADDIS. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, in the reading of this I may add some things that come to me that are not here, and I have a number of quotations from various sources in this memoranda, and I am not going to stop to note that they are quotations in reading them.

Chairman WALSH. Very good; just do it in your own way, and then you can submit the whole document to the record.

(The witness submitted several documents, which appear at the end of this subject as "Gaddis Exhibit.")

Dr. GADDIS (reading):

"PRELIMINARY STATEMENT.

"The United States is the largest coal-producing country in the world, exceeding England's annual output over 200,000,000 tons.

"In 1864, the virgin year for the Colorado collieries, 500 tons was the yield; in 1910 over 12,000,000 tons were dug; last year a tonnage of some 8,000,000 was recorded, giving the State the ninth place among the 23 coal-mining States of the Union. The Centennial State is destined to take much higher rank than previous ratings, as the United States Geological Survey estimates her workable coal fields at 10,130 square miles.

"The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. mines 35 per cent of the State's total output of coal and is the largest company loading the 'black diamonds.'

"COMPONENT PARTS.

"This corporation was formed in 1892 by a coalition of the Colorado Fuel Co. and the Colorado Coal & Iron Co. The following subsidiary branches were subsequently acquired or developed: The Colorado Coal & Iron Co., the Colorado Supply Co., the Colorado & Wyoming Railway, the Crystal River Railway, the Grand River Coal & Coke Co., the Rocky Mountain Timber Co., the Colorado Industrial Co., and the Mountain Telegraph Co. (part owners)—as I understand it, they are equal owners of this with the Victor-American Fuel Co.—the Minnequa Town Co., the Pueblo Realty Co., the Hospital Association Co., the Red Stone Improvement Co. (part owners), and the Minnequa Coöperage Co.

"The fourteenth auxiliary has lately been made an adjunct to the Rocky Mountain Timber Co."

Chairman WALSH. When was it that Mr. Bowers came?

Dr. GADDIS. I think six or seven years ago, as I understand it. [Continues reading:]

"Cattle raising on a large scale will soon be tried. Expiring leases on the Maxwell land grant are not being renewed; the acreage to be reserved for coming herds of beef on the hoof.

"The purchase of between 250,000 and 300,000 acres of the above-mentioned territory deprived many ranchers of what they had concluded was their inalienable property rights. A representative of the company, accompanied by a band of half-trigger cowboy desperadoes, clothed with the dignity of a deputy sheriff's commission, proceeded to settle disputed claims. At Stonewall one man was shot dead in cold blood; all enemies were put to flight; and the raid guaranteed clear titles to vast regions of coal and timber land. The leader of these bandits was lately eulogized by one of the board of directors in saying: 'They don't make 'em much better than the old man.'

In the general mêlé, of course, no one knew just how the tragedy occurred; but unquestionably they murdered that man at Stonewall, and as surely as Cain killed his brother Abel, these claimed supporters of the dignity and authority of the State caused this man's blood to cry out from the ground against the Rockefeller representatives who piloted the gang.

"STAKEHOLDERS.

"In October, 1914, the twenty-second annual exhibit came from the press in pamphlet form, 'Capitalization $86,325,000; bonded debt, $45,158,000; summary of total assets, over $101,000,000.'

"Rockefellers own 40 per cent of the preferred and 40 per cent of the common stock; also 6½ per cent of the 'general five' bonds. There are 2,000 other stockholders.

"In the early days of the strike agitation the newspapers boldly affirmed that the company had accumulated a $5,000,000 reserve fund with which to defeat the efforts of the United Mine Workers. The allegation was denied, but the snug sum furnished the foundation for a serene complacency and a course of tactics otherwise impossible. Often heavy drafts on this reserve fund for 'strike expenses'; cash on hand in the financial report, is tabulated at over four million.

"Six years ago Welborn was not regarded as a man of large enough caliber to properly conserve the allied interests of which he had been made president. He 'was not trained as an operator of a large corporation.' Bowers, clothed with authority from 26 Wall Street and sufficient proxies to constitute him sole arbitrator in all minor and major matters to which he might address his attention began to put into telling effect his former 'experience in organization and management.' 'It is true I represent the Rockefeller interests,' is his asseveration. The Damocles sword that Bowers suspended over the heads of the officers in the Boston Building in Denver reduced them to manikins and office boys."

Our predecessor in office told us when in Denver always to speak to Mr. Welborn; that he felt humiliated in his present position. [Reading:]

"Testimony was given before the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations, sitting in Denver last December that Bowers was still a resident of Denver. Absentee landlordism was not a palatable phrase for the operators. Months before this statement was made Bowers had sold his Denver property and removed his family to the East. He had fully determined to 'turn things over to the boys,' and there was much rejoicing at the prospect that he would be content to give them chiefly 'absent treatment' in the future.

"At 68 years of age Bowers was wearied with 'carrying the rasping details of a large business; and while the case of industrial malpractice was being adjudicated in the court of public opinion, he retired to his eastern home'; having labored four consecutive days with Mr. Rockefeller before he would release him. Before leaving Denver he wrote me to address all future communications for my department to Mr. Welborn, who had greatly developed under Mr. Bowers's tutelage. But Mr. Welborn was too busy, and he referred me to Mr. Weitzel, an ex-coal digger. E. H. Weitzel was as well qualified to act in connection with the sociological department as Johnson would be with reference to a kindergarten.

"About 25 years ago four-fifths of the men in the Colorado collieries spoke the English language. The Welsh, English, Scotch, and Irish were the predominating races. To-day the ratio has been exactly reversed; and the English-speaking employees average about one-fifth of the people in the camps.

"Aliens in the fullest sense of the word have been encouraged to crowd out the higher-grade immigrant. To lower the scale of those living in the cottages raises the total footing of the scales on the tippie. The less it costs to keep camp citizens satisfied the less danger there is of public sentiment forcing expenditures for improvements. The camp that can mine the largest amount of coal at the lowest possible figure carries the banner.

"In 1913 some 200 coal mines were operating in the State. Twenty of these represented the Rockefeller holdings. Without being too technical the coal deposits are divided into the northern, southern, and western sections. The C. F. & I. Co. are working in the southern and western areas.

"In July and August of 1914 the company had on their pay rolls 7,786 manual laborers, representing 32 different nationalities, principally from southern Europe. The heavy percentage of illiteracy fixed their rating as low almost as present conditions in old Mexico. Many of them could neither read nor write their own language."

I have signed the name of a man who handed me his card to be taken to the office. He could only make a cross. [Reading:]

"A few years ago in Las Animas County, which produces 50 per cent of the coal of the State, there was found 18 per cent of the population and one-third of the State's illiteracy. Some of the strikers thought Rockefeller was the President of the United States.

"LOCATING RESPONSIBILITY.

"Mr. Rockefeller has not been in Colorado for 10 years and seldom attends a meeting of the C. F. & I. board of directors. His ignorance of real conditions in the camp villages enables him to testify under oath: 'I should not have known how more conscientiously to carry out my full duty toward them than I have.' 'The fact that they brought no complaints at all, would indicate to me that they had no grievances.'"

"For several years prior to the 15 months' war in Colorado, which aroused the whole Nation, neither Bowers or Welborn were cognizant of policies and practices in dealing with the miners, except as represented to them by inferior officers. Mr. Bowers took the position that to grant the right of appeal with the type of characters with whom they had to deal was to invite chaos—appeals to Welborn, which we are glad to say he allows, if they were considered at all, would only emphasize the severity of the régime."

He told me his men in the Boston Building did not take complaints over each other's heads; and that the camp régime was the same. I am glad to say that I know Mr. Welborn disagreed with this position.

"A 'down-the-canyon' verdict was not likely to be reversed at the office of the general boss, for he is the kingbolt of the machine that must be kept running smoothly. The superintendent can easily erect a wall between himself and the division manager, which only calloused temerity would tackle. At the bottom of the pit with pick and shovel, the miner frequently found a grafting pit boss on his back."

Just within the last three months a pit boss whom I know and can mention by name at Camp Lester was discharged for taking bribes from miners.

"The Federal grand jury which sat in Pueblo during the strike trouble thus portrays the situation: 'Miners generally fear to complain of real grievances, because of the danger of being discharged or being placed in inferior places in the mines. Many miners apparently believe that employees have been discharged because they have made a request for checkweighmen.'"

It is a common saying among miners that they invite their own "canning," or it was equivalent to being canned to ask for a checkweighman.

Chairman WALSH. The absence of checkweighmen was one of the grievances the men had that went on strike; is that correct?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. They claimed the companies cheated them on the amount of coal they actually dug out of the ground; is that correct?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the demand was that they should have men of their own selection who could see that they were paid for what their labor produced?

Dr. GADDIS. It was guaranteed them by the State law. [Continues reading:]

"The responsibility for about 50 per cent of all of the miners of the State laying down their tools lies at the door of the local coal-camp officials, supported by those immediately over them, the division superintendents and the general manager."

In support of that statement I will read a letter from a miner at Frederick, who went out as a striker September 23. I knew him very well, and he is a man I am perfectly willing to vouch for any statement that he makes:

"Personally, I think the strike is of no benefit to the workers; and I even think that some of the smaller officers were more to blame than the stockholders," as he puts it.

"The camp superintendents as a whole impress me as a most uncouth, ignorant, immoral, and, in many instances, the most brutal set of men that we have ever met."

Chairman WALSH. Is that your experience generally, as to these subbosses as you went through those camps in sociological work?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes. In my first interview with Mr. Bowers at Denver, at the suggestion of Dr. Corwin, I asked him if it was not possible, in the advanced stage of the coal industry in the United States, to secure a higher grade of men to act as superintendents of the mines. At that time I spoke of these men as blasphemous bullies, and I have never been able to change my mind. [Reading:]

"When ex-mine mule drivers and 'rope riders' are given the arbitrary authority of a provost marshal, in communities varying in size from 200 to 1,000 souls, an individual has been evolved which can only be found in the closed camps of the coal barons or other mines so controlled.

"On the day of the great walkout a super ordered his gunmen to drive the red necks—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). "Super" is an abbreviation for superintendent?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes; that is a very common expression. [Reading:]

"On the day of the great walkout a super"—at Morley—"ordered his gunmen to drive the red necks—strikers or their sympathizers—off the company property. The zealous deputies refused to permit some men to assist their families to pack their household goods. They were not allowed to stop at the Santa Fe Railroad station, not located on C. F. & I. territory. Only after telegraphic remonstrance from railway officials were the men allowed to wait for the trains."

Chairman WALSH. Were there women and children there?

Dr. GADDIS. I think these were men; they allowed the women and children to stay and pack up their effects.

"After the famous battle of the 'Hogback,' where incessant firing for 50 consecutive hours occurred, a super from the Walsen mine of the C. F. & I. Co. was drunk on the streets of Walsenburg.

"For years a super has been retained at Primero, in one of the largest camps in that district, whose periodical drunken exploits are a disgrace to the whole county."

The manager of the fuel department stubbornly refuses to remove the man. [Continues reading:]

"About a year ago the super at Gulch was let out, whose notorious camp record became unendurable. He soon afterwards opened a saloon in Denver.

"Men who do not know how to speak emphatically without blasphemy, or to enforce discipline without brutality, and who are quite likely to have their efforts seconded by 'camp marshals whose appointments and salaries are controlled by local companies, have exercised a system of espionage and have resorted to arbitrary powers of police control. These, taken with brutal assaults upon the miners, have produced a general dissatisfaction.'"

This last clause I have read is a quotation from the Federal grand jury's report.

Chairman WALSH. Is there no right of appeal to the State officials? When you say they are brutally beaten, is there no appeal to any official?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes; they can appeal to the super or the division superintendent.

Chairman WALSH. You say the superintendents are the brutal men?

Dr. GADDIS. They are.

Chairman WALSH. Is there no one to protect these people? Is not the State of Colorado represented by impartial officials that will protect these men?

Dr. GADDIS. The State of Colorado is represented in the closed camps and in some open camps by justices of the peace, who are company men.

Chairman WALSH. You mean they work for the company?

Dr. GADDIS. They do. [Reading:]

"VIOLENT DEATHS.

"The geological formations in the Rocky Mountain region makes mining peculiarly hazardous. There are two deaths here for every one in all other coal fields in the United States. The Rockefeller company has made a heavy contribution to this mortality. The following explosions in recent years have occurred in the Rockefeller mines: April 2, 1906, Quatro, 19 killed; January 23, 1907, Primero, 22 killed; May 5, 1907, Engleville, 5 killed; January 31, 1910, Primero, 78 killed; October 8, 1910, Starkville, 56 killed. Total, 178 in five years.

"When the second Primero explosion occurred, the leading pastor of Denver, Dr. Robert F. Coyle, of the First Presbyterian Church, from his pulpit declared the lives had been sacrificed on the altar of corporation cupidity. By telephone, the Rockefeller representative, Mr. Bowers, said he wished to make explanation; to which the good man replied, 'There is nothing to be explained.' For these utterances he was blacklisted along with the 'muckraking magazines, socialistic preachers, trust-busting political shysters, and their bedfellows—the agitators and anarchists.'

"During a recent period of a little over two years there were nearly 180 violent deaths in mines in Las Animas County. Within a period of eight years and a radius of some 150 miles of Trinidad 564 lives were crushed out. In 1914 statistics presented by the United States Bureau of Mines charges 108 deaths to Colorado. More than two human lives a week was the toll exacted."

Chairman WALSH. Do these workmen out there of the intelligent class, of intelligent character, do they claim that is violence being used against them, the happening of so many accidents? Do they classify that as violence on the part of the company?

Dr. GADDIS. They dare not speak out their minds.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in their minds as they do express it, the intelligent ones, do they class that as violence?

Dr. GADDIS. I am going to refer to that in a special instance later.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Dr. GADDIS (reading): "For three years past the number of violent deaths for every 1,000 employees has increased. Fifty per cent of these fatal accidents are preventable, and yet an adverse deliverance of a coroner's jury was but once levied against the company during the past 10 years.

"That perjury before the coroner is common no one will deny that has serious regard for a breach of the ninth commandment."

The State superintendent of mines, Dalrymple, has gone on record as saying, "The strained relations between employees and employer are responsible for many accidents." [Reading:]

"A few weeks ago a pit boss and colored miner were killed at Walsen by two runaway cars. It was a topic of conversation among the men of this camp, that the cars had not a double coupling, as required. The company was exculpated" before the grand jury, and the super assured the deputy State mine inspectors that the cars were double coupled."

A few weeks after that incident some 50 colored men were discharged from the Walsen mine, and it was there where this report originated that the cars were single coupled; it started from the colored miners. This very grave offense, we are glad to say, was corrected by the officials and the super was required to reinstate the men. [Reading:]

"Coal at any cost seems the avowed policy of not a few of the petty bosses. That a drunken spree is really a good thing, for the miner will work harder to make up for loss of time when he is able to reach the face of his room again," was the opinion of the superintendent, Charles O'Neill, of the Berwind and Tabasco mines.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you get that information, that it was the opinion of the superintendent that the men would work harder after a drunken spree?

Dr. GADDIS. He told me so in the mine office to my face, Mr. Charles O'Neill.

Chairman WALSH. Were you trying to work to have the men not go to work in that way?

Dr. GADDIS. I was; that was a part of my work.

Chairman WALSH. And you had a conversation with the superintendent in which he told you that the miner will work harder after a drunken spree?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you treat of that in your paper?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do the companies substantially own the saloons where these men get drunk?

Dr. GADDIS. They do in some camps. At Primero they get $1,500 a year rent for a building that cost only $3,000.

Chairman WALSH. And they form the habits of these men?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed.

Dr. GADDIS. [Reading:]

"Of the much-advertised welfare agent 'as a mediator between the company and its employees,' we believe his work will only tend to intensify the despotic able oppressiveness of the past few years. One super at least has already been informed, sub rosa, that there need be no undue concern about this new officer limiting their suzerainty. He had been in the field but a few weeks when he effected the discharge of a man with a family to support on the word of a woman of questionable character. The evicted employee was given no opportunity to present his side of the case.

"It is almost farce to presume that a pet appointee would fearlessly and impartially bring things to the surface that would disturb the imperturbable equanimity of the one who must O. K. his monthly salary account.

"The assembling of camp delegates in Bower's old office on January 19, in which complaints were solicited, and a generally bumptious good time, with free auto rides, banquet, and theater party as a part of the program, in addition all expenses being paid to and from their respective camps, was a decided hit."

Chairman WALSH. What was the camp delegates? What do you mean by that? Is that this new scheme they call collective bargaining out there, by which the employees can present grievances for adjustment?

Dr. GADDIS. That is what it is claimed.

Chairman WALSH. You called them "camp delegates," and that they had a convention. How do you say it was done?

Dr. GADDIS. These men were elected, and the orders given were from Denver that no local officials should attend the meeting of any camp where they were elected, but that the men were to elect their own men—that was the supposition—to go up there and air their grievances before Mr. Welborn and Mr. Weltzel and a mediator, Mr. David Griffiths. [Continues reading:]

"And many of the men showed a freedom such as one might expect from them in a meeting exclusively of their immediate associates. If two of the members of this 'Denver convention' represented the rank and file of that body, the form of the past years will not be altered. One of these said members has for some time made more money in his camp than the super himself.

"Another son of Ham who sat in this first assembly of coal-camp patricians and plebians owed the company store a bill of over $80, which the manager had almost despaired of collecting, and for more than a year this same accredited subject had been paying back the store on a $100 advanced for his wife's funeral expenses."

Chairman WALSH. Now, this was a Negro, was he?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you say, however, the men were given to understand that they would choose these men democratically; that is, the company was not to interfere?

Dr. GADDIS. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, for instance, take this sort of a case, how would it work out, the criticism of this man being that he was beholden to the company for an indebtedness? First, I will ask you, is that a negro camp?

Dr. GADDIS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How did he happen to be representing the white men there—a man that was so—

Dr. GADDIS. I could not say, Mr. Walsh. There are some things that happen that I can not explain.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Dr. GADDIS (reading):

"A good square kick could hardly be expected from such sources.

"Again the remembrance of so many of their former comrades being 'canned' for squealing would not be forgotten amidst the grandeur and informality of their temporary environment.

"A few weeks after this meeting a representative from headquarters inquired of a super if 'the men thought we were trying to put one over on them?' There is room for suspicion that 'one is being put over on the public and that the various investigating committees are having dust thrown into their eyes; for presto, the lion has been changed into the lamb.'"

If the investigating committees can be kept out of Colorado for the next six months or a year the old shackles of oppression will have received so many new rivets that it will take the hellish fires of another strike to loosen them. [Continues reading:]

"POLITICAL MANEUVERS.

"In the fall of 1912, the present brightest star in Rockefeller's Colorado legal galaxy publicity attacked the corporations in the following language: 'You who have been attending conventions for the last 10 years in Colorado know very well, if you are honest with yourselves, your neighbors, that you can not put your finger on a single item of convention legislation, in the way of platform or nomination, in which you were instrumental. They have probably given the local superintendent of the mine, the number of delegates to which the community is entitled. He knows he is to select a certain number of men who are to come in and follow the dictation of a single man whose name is given them before they leave. Candidates are selected not with a view of their fitness, not with a view of their ability to discharge their duty, not with a view of their integrity, but "are they satisfactory to the company?" "

This is a quotation from Judge Northcutt's speech at Lamar.

Chairman WALSH. When did he make that speech?

Mr. GADDIS. Fall of 1912.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the same Judge Northcutt that is prosecuting these men out—

Dr. GADDIS. I refer to that in my next clause.

Chairman WALSH. Now, just a moment. I want to ask you was Judge Northcutt, who was making that speech in the fall of 1912, stating the facts, from your observation of the conditions and of the camp?

Dr. GADDIS. I believe that he was; and I will give you a concrete illustration here in a few moments. [Reading:]

"This man," Judge Northcutt, "was too formidable an antagonist to be at large. Last year no more doughty champion than he defended the Rockefeller interests. The Chronicle News, the Trinidad evening paper, which he owns and controls, went beyond all limits to out-Herod Herod in their fight against the miners. The city editor of this paper so exasperated the strikers that he apparently considered it the part of wisdom to seek employment in another city.

"The frequent number of conferences the manager of the Trinidad Morning Advertiser had with the Trinidad and Denver office would justify the opinion that the nature of the many columns of their advertising he was carrying needed particular attention."

Chairman WALSH. One moment. Is Judge Northcutt connected with a newspaper?

Dr. GADDIS. He owns and controls the Chronicle News.

Chairman WALSH. The Chronicle News, of Trinidad?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And they sent out editorials that were copied through the papers of the country highly laudatory of these coal companies?

Dr. GADDIS. You mean copies of Judge Northcutt's editorials?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; they published very laudatory editorials about the company and its management of its coal department, and those were sent out throughout the country, and, so far as people in the East were concerned, they would imagine they were from some independent newspaper source, but in fact and really it was owned by Judge Northcutt. Is that correct?

Dr. GADDIS. It is, so far as the Chronicle News is concerned, and I think it is also true as to the Morning Advertiser.

Chairman WALSH. Now, was it in that office of the Chronicle News after this trouble was begun that it was found that arms were stored and munitions to be used against the strikers?

Dr. GADDIS. Well I think so; it was so reported to me. I could not verify that from personal knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in the congressional committee's investigation and in our testimony it was stated that they found boxes of ammunition and guns, etc., in this newspaper office.

Dr. GADDIS. I don't doubt it a minute.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Dr. GADDIS. [Reading:]

"The deliverance of the ex-judge was by no means an anachronism. The company camp delegates to the Las Animas Republican convention in Trinidad last spring, 1914, were closeted with the general boss of the fuel department just before they went to the convention hall," of which procedure I was a witness. I saw these men go in with him and come out, and I recognized several of them. 'If the Republican ticket is not elected, some one will be out of a job.' was a threat put up to us by the surgeon general."

Chairman WALSH. Put up to you personally?

Dr. GADDIS. It was. I considered it not a threat, but just telling me where to head in and where to use my influence.

Chairman WALSH. Well, did you hear that put up to other men working for the company there?

Dr. GADDIS. I don't know that I did. I know he made the remark to me.

Chairman WALSH. That was in the election just past, of 1914?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir. [Continues reading:]

"In the ballot at polls at Terico, November 3, 1914, the company store manager and mine weigh boss served as camp election judges, which is in open violation of the statutes of Colorado. While in this same camp the superintendent and marshal lined things up on the outside. Returns from this camp were quite satisfactory."

Chairman WALSH. Was any complaint made about that alleged violation of the law?

Dr. GADDIS. I never heard there was.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is there anyone there to look out for that on behalf of the State—that is, for the disinterested people of the State—that would complain about and bring a prosecution for a thing like that if it is true?

Dr. GADDIS. I do not think anyone will doubt it is true.

Chairman WALSH. No; but I am accepting it as true. But I asked you—

Dr. GADDIS (interrupting). The company, in communities like that, overshadows everything; and even men that oppose them politically are almost afraid, for commercial purposes, to come out in an open fight.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you say that is in direct violation of the statutes of Colorado for those people to act as election officials?

Dr. GADDIS. It is; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the statute of limitations has not run against that, has it; if the law is operative in Colorado, those people could still be prosecuted for that crime?

Dr. GADDIS. They can. [Reading:]

"On this same day the clerks in the Denver office were so moved by patriotic principles as to almost desert their desks, to a man, for efforts in and about the polls.

"In the last legislature a company store manager sat as a member in the lower house, who is said to have blandly asserted that he was a corporation man."

This is the store manager for Morley, now in charge of the Trinidad store.

Chairman WALSH. Is he a member of the legislature?

Dr. GADDIS. Not the present one; the last one. [Reading:]

"Several years ago the State legislature found the large corporations so sensitive to restrictive measures that they put up dummy bills as scarecrows; and the fear of obnoxious laws subsided, as the State lawmakers were reduced to a set of blackmailers.

"From a high tribunal the charge is hurled 'the coal companies are sufficiently influential to nominate, elect, and control many country officers, and have done so, with the result of complicating the industrial situation by arousing political prejudices.'

"In 1912 a notice was posted in the camps of the company that 'every one of its employees shall be free to vote as he sees fit.' A hard-working company railway man who dared to be a Democrat was decapitated a few months ago, in spite of the declaration of political independence above quoted.

"SOCIOLOGICAL FEATURES.

"The propaganda for social-welfare work was first introduced by making the surgeon general, Dr. R. W. Corwin, the superintendent of the department. The casa vivienda (living house) of the hospital medical staff at Pueblo is a commodious structure, which modern science and a liberal amount of money have made a place of beauty and luxury. It is situated in a 20-acre cultivated wooded campus, with the hospital buildings in the same inclosure.

"The surroundings at Minnequa have had the same effect upon the sensibilities of the leaders there as the anesthetics they administer to patients in the operating room. The lack of comforts, the squalor and filth of the camps, is so far removed from these gentlemen that they are little touched 'with the feeling of infirmity' for those who must endure the hardships of camp life. An appeal to the surgeon general for relief of some despicable situation seldom meets a prompt and adequate response.

"'We are not engaged in the philanthropic business' was the deliverance of the head of the medical department when solicited to assist those near the hospital who were voluntarily supporting a work that Rockefeller's millions should have long ago put on a firm footing.

"After a few years' trial of the above plan a minister, Rev. Walter Morritt, was employed to act as superintendent of the department of sociology, and also business manager of Minnequa Hospital. To advance the religious, educational, and social work of 25 or 30 camps, necessitating the travel of over 1,000 miles to complete the circuit, is a full complement of labor for any one man. To give one-fifth time afield and four-fifths at home was to allow pressing matters to go by default along progressive welfare lines. After a somewhat lengthy tenure of office the second superintendent retired with very meager results as the sum total of his efforts.

"At this period (about two years ago) there was but one small clubhouse in the Trinidad district of nine (C. F. & I. Co.) camps, one also in the Walsenburg district of six camps, that was not cursed by saloon associations, one in a rock quarry, but so far removed from where the men lived as to be little used by them.

"At Redstone, on the western slope, a large amount of money was expended in improvements of all kinds. It is the show place of the two largest coal companies in the State. But for a number of years neither coal nor coke has been shipped from this point; and as a sociological asset for employees, the whole plant is a negligible quantity.

"At the Pueblo Steel Works, which employs from 4,000 to 6,000 men, there is not a semblance of social-welfare advantages.

"Mr. Bigelow, a well-known eastern sociologist, came to Colorado last summer to take notes of the work of the department now being considered. After a visit to a few camps he concluded there was nothing to investigate and returned home.

"One of the board of directors living in Denver candidly admitted: 'We might as well confess it, we have not given them anything but the saloon for the past 25 years.'

"In contrast to the magnificence at casa vivenda, many of miners families are living in hovels, box-car shacks, and adobe sheds that are not fit for the habitation of human beings.

"But this does not interrupt the deduction of rent from the pay check.

"A camp physician thus describes a certain Italian quarter at Sopris, 'Houses up the canyon, so called, of which 8 are habitable and 46 simply awful; they are disreputably disgraceful. I have had to remove a mother in labor from one part of the shack to another to keep dry.'

"The C. F. & I. Co. now own and rent hovels, shacks, and dugouts that are unfit for the habitation of human beings and are little removed from the pigsty make of dwellings. And the people in them live on the very level of a pigsty.

Here is another quotation.

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Is that quotation—all that last?

Dr. GADDIS. No, sir; that is my own words. Well, the quotation from the doctor at Sopris is a quotation, and then the last sentence is my own words. [Continues reading:]

"Frequently the population is so congested that whole families are crowded in the one room; eight persons in one small room was reported during the past year.

"In one of their best paying camps, Walsen, the hotel is such a dilapidated ramshackle trap that the boarders are driven from the place offering accommodations."

The doctor at Walsen describes the conditions of the buildings there last summer. These buildings can be seen—no; I will just add here:

"These buildings can be seen to-day at Segundo, Sopris, Berwind, Morley, Robinson, and Crested Butte. A few years ago Gulch, Marion, and Sunlight furnished a type of dwelling to which Weitzel refers in his letter to Bowers as 'shacks and dugouts almost without light and heat.'"

This is several years ago.

Chairman WALSH. Who is Mr. Weitzel?

Dr. GADDIS. Manager of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.'s fuel department. Mr. Weitzel thus refers, in his letter to Mr. Bowers, to these buildings as "shacks and dugouts almost without light and heat." The Walsen camp's physician reports June 18, 1914, 47 houses in Red Camp are not suitable for occupancy.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the place where the so-called Battle of Walsen occurred?

Dr. GADDIS. The Battle of Hogback took place.

Chairman WALSH. Where there was a continuous firing for 40 hours?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who were they firing at?

Dr. GADDIS. Strikers and militiamen shooting each other. It was a battle between men in the camps and the militia and the strikers.

Chairman WALSH. These men in the camps that were shooting were men that lived in those places?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir; and they were men—50 of these men; I think nearly all of them that were discharged from the Walsen camp. These men had taken their lives in their hands to defend the company and were discharged, and the company, I am glad to say, required the superintendent to restore them.

The superintendent at Berwind, under date of June 4, 1914, reported, or the camp physician reported, 18 four-room houses unfit for occupancy. At Segundo there are 73 one-room shacks and 2 two-room shacks. [Reading:]

"At an altitude of 10,000 feet in Floresta, where the thermometer drops to an extremely low register, there is not a plastered house to be found.

"The man intrusted to answer the lengthy questionnaire sent out from Washington in my hearing was instructed to fill out the blank forms so as not to arouse suspicion that conditions would fall below the standards suggested by the interrogations."

Chairman WALSH. Now, where was the questionnaire sent from? I don't understand that.

Dr. GADDIS. I think it was sent from Secretary Wilson's office.

Chairman WALSH. The Department of Labor of the Government?

Dr. GADDIS. But it was spoken of in Colorado in my presence and hearing as a report from President Wilson.

Chairman WALSH. It was from the Bureau of Mines, as a matter of fact, was it not?

Dr. GADDIS. I know it was spoken of as a report from President Wilson and was a lengthy document.

Chairman WALSH. What do you say the instructions were about that?

Dr. GADDIS. The man was instructed to answer those questions—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). What man? I want to get a little of the details about that. What was done about that?

Dr. GADDIS. This occurred at the camp of the physician's residence, Dr. Corwin, who was the manager of the sociological department, and I always stopped there when I went there, and I was there with Mr. Welborn on this occasion.

Chairman WALSH. He was the president of the company?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir; and Dr. Corwin said, "I want you to fill out those blanks."

Chairman WALSH. He said that to you?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir; and he said, "You know more about these things than anybody," and Mr. Welborn objected, and he said, "I want you to do that, Doctor, and so answer the questions that in camps where we have no social work," which comprised most of them, "they would not investigate." That was practically his instruction.

Chairman WALSH. That the Government would not investigate the conditions?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who did fill it out?

Dr. GADDIS. Dr. Corwin filled it out, and I am pretty sure he sent it to Mr. Welborn to fix it up to suit himself.

Chairman WALSH. I assume, if this was left to you, you would have given the correct and straight information to the United States Government?

Dr. GADDIS. I certainly would, and I have tried to incorporate it in these items here.

Chairman WALSH. You are making your report, in a way, then, to the Government now?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir; it could be so stated.

Chairman WALSH. And you would have made it if Mr. Welborn had not stopped it, at this instance?

Dr. GADDIS. I certainly would, and I would have given them something that would have made them sit up and take notice.

Chairman WALSH. When was that?

Dr. GADDIS. Last summer.

Chairman WALSH. The summer of 1914?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir. [Continues reading:]

"The average underground workman must make the following monthly payments, before the credit side of his account is needed: Powder, caps, and fuses, $5; electric lamp, $1; oil lamp, $1.50, in substitution of the electric light; medical dues, $1; water rent per month in Frederick and Segundo"—

Chairman WALSH. What do you mean by water rent?

Dr. GADDIS. They tap the Trinidad water main at these camps, and charge them $1 a month.

Commissioner LENNON. Is the electric light measured by meter, or so much a month?

Dr. GADDIS. It is on a flat rate, they can burn it all the time if they want to. [Continues reading:]

"Blacksmith, 50 cents; house of four rooms, $8; men's club (voluntary), $1; water at Lester, 35 cents a barrel."

The water at Lester in the hydrants is unfit for use, and turns the vegetables black, and the only use it is fit for is to scrub the floor.

Chairman WALSH. That is not the water they charge for?

Dr. GADDIS. No, sir; they turn good water in at 35 cents a barrel.

Now, I have made an estimate here, and I am sure it is within bounds, during the strike period at least, and I think it would hold good outside. The company's store charged about 35 per cent of the man's pay check; and I had a storeman tell me during the strike he collected 47 per cent of the mine's pay roll for groceries. That, of course, was very exceptional.

Chairman WALSH. Collected 47 per cent of what?

Dr. GADDIS. The total amount of his bill to the miners, what he collected at that time was 47 per cent, over 47 per cent, of the money that was paid to the miners at that time.

Chairman WALSH. That is, the whole pay roll, or individual miners?

Dr. GADDIS. The whole pay roll, for that monthly account.

Chairman WALSH. That is, that out of the total pay received by the collective miners at that place?

Dr. GADDIS. The store got over 47 per cent; it was during the strike. I had this from a store manager, and I saw him working at the books in the main office, and I think he was getting at the figures.

Chairman WALSH. You think that was an exceptionally large amount of deduction?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir; but I believe in place of 20 per cent, which I have seen published many times, that it is nearer 30 or 35 per cent that goes to the company's stores.

We conducted the funeral services of old man Allison near Parmer's that had been discharged because he testified in court that he believed the company were digging coal on property that was not theirs. [Reading:]

"Public schools"—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Before you go into that, in these adobe shacks and box-car houses you spoke of, have you the rent they charge for those places?

Dr. GADDIS. The average rent is $2 a room. The box-car shack, I think was $1, or perhaps 50 cents, I am not positive, but I think they get $1 a room.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many rooms in a box car?

Dr. GADDIS. Two; a dollar a month.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Per room?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir; for a two-room box-car shack. I know it is $2 for the other better houses.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It is $2 a month per room in the better houses?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How does that rent compare, if you know, with rentals in cities and towns where workers live?

Dr. GADDIS. I think it is very reasonable in most places, if the houses are good. Two dollars a room, I think, for instance, in some of the camps they have cement blocks, and the houses are kept up in good shape, and the company furnishes them with free paint and calimine, and the people keep up their houses outside and inside. They take some pride in keeping up the property.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you in your study been able to determine what is the average paid per room by workers in a modern-sized community?

Dr. GADDIS. No, sir; I have not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It has been estimated, as far as I can obtain, from four to five dollars a month.

Dr. GADDIS. This would make the company then, 50 per cent cheaper. I think the rents are reasonable, when they keep the property up.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any civilized place in the world, that you know of, that under the law there are any such conditions allowed? For instance, a place where a woman was about to be confined, that she would have to be taken to another room to keep the water from running on her? In these instances, have the people any choice or selection of the houses where they shall live, or are they chosen by the company where they live?

Dr. GADDIS. They are allowed to choose their homes, if it is possible, and the camp is not too much congested. For instance, people that are living in one house and want to move, if the super. has another house, he will let them do it if he can.

Chairman WALSH. Take in Primero, the camp I was in, they have a fence run all around, and about three rows of barb wire on top, and all of them live inside of that inclosure.

Dr. GADDIS. That was a closed camp.

Chairman WALSH. And I was informed that no other houses were owned except by the fuel and iron company. Is that correct?

Dr. GADDIS. That is correct in all of the closed camps.

Chairman WALSH. Then those people have no selection of homes if they live in that little town?

Dr. GADDIS. It is optional with the super.; if he can, he generally accommodates them.

Chairman WALSH. But the company owns the one that they move from and the one they move into?

Dr. GADDIS. I mean optional in regard to location. You mean in regard to quality of houses.

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Dr. GADDIS. Certainly they have to take what is there.

Chairman WALSH. And they are all owned by the company?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What other method could be followed than the one that is followed under the conditions that exist, by virtue of these mines being away from populated centers?

Dr. GADDIS. I believe, under proper handling, it is not an unmixed evil, the closed camp. It has its advantages and disadvantages.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What are they?

Dr. GADDIS. The advantages?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And disadvantages?

Dr. GADDIS. The company have unlimited means to improve a camp if they wish to, and they furnish everything for the people, and if the people come there, as they do in some places; in Starkville, it is an open camp, and one of the dirtiest places in Colorado; they don't live oftentimes as cleanly as in closed camps, but on the other hand, in time of strike, as I gave an instance at Morley, those people are utterly at the mercy of the company. They are at all times. It is a question of whether they get the ill will of the super. or not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, just a further word of information. You say in time of strike they are utterly at the mercy of the company?

Dr. GADDIS. Certainly they are.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If these men working and living in these closed camps are nonunionists or what are called strike breakers and sometimes called scabs, is it not a sort of advantage to them to be under the protection of the company, so that they will not be assaulted by the strikers?

Dr. GADDIS. It is an advantage to them, but it is a disadvantage to the man who is to be put out because he is a union man.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; that is true; but if he is no longer an employee of the company he has no right, I take it, to occupy space that is demanded for one who is working for the company, unless the company has room enough to accommodate both workers and nonworkers.

Dr. GADDIS. He is willing to work, the man who is put out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On his own terms?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are you prepared to say, if you were an employer, that you would employ men on their own terms regardless of what your terms were?

Dr. GADDIS. My dear sir, I am not prepared to go into a discussion of that question here, I do not think.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. These questions are all important to the commission; it is exactly what we want to find out.

Dr. GADDIS. I have given my impression of the situation.

Chairman WALSH. You were called on and asked to give certain facts in connection with the coal camps.

Dr. GADDIS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What are the facilities for these closed camps having churches and schools and places of amusement?

Dr. GADDIS. They have just what the company furnishes them. No one can go in there without the consent of the company for any purpose; it is different in a closed camp, religious or otherwise.

Chairman WALSH. Can ministers go in and preach?

Dr. GADDIS. He has to secure the consent of at least the superintendent.

Chairman WALSH. Do they furnish a place to preach in?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes; in some instances; they have a church in Primero.

Chairman WALSH. In any instance have they undertaken to direct what they shall preach?

Dr. GADDIS. No.

Chairman WALSH. Once he gets in, if he gets the permission, he can preach any doctrine he believes?

Dr. GADDIS. Do you mean religious doctrine or anything he wants to say?

Chairman WALSH. Anything that is not in conflict with the law or the rights of other persons.

Dr. GADDIS. Are you speaking of a religious worker or anybody?

Chairman WALSH. I am speaking of the religious worker; supposing the religious worker once gets permission to go in, can he speak his mind freely, as long as he does not say anything in violation of law or morals?

Dr. GADDIS. Certainly he could, I think, without any question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have they schools in the closed camps?

Dr. GADDIS. Yes; some of them are very good and some could not be worse. I will speak about them in the next paragraph, which is on public schools. [Reading:]
